American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for pocketing and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the most substantial manufacture, as accurate and reliable time-keepers, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at as low a price as is asked for the flimsy-named pieces and Lepines which some make, slanderously referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

THE WORK DONE BY CONGRESS.

THE Thirty-seventh Congress of the United States has expired, having, in the short session which ended on March 4, passed some of the most momentous measures ever placed upon the statute-book. Those measures, as a whole, are calculated to the very point, in a republican Rome, was taken whenever the state was deemed in imminent danger, and which history calls the appointment of a Dictator. The President of the United States has, in effect, been created Dictator, with almost supreme power over liberty, property, and life—a power nominally as serious and as irresponsible as that which is wielded by the Emperors of Russia, France, or China. And this is well. To succeed in a struggle such as we are waging a strong central Government is indispensable. We now see the advantage which the rebels have had over us in the unity of their purposes, and the despotic power of their chief. We are now armed, not with them in these respects, and we shall see which is the better cause.

The measures which collectively confer upon Mr. Lincoln dictatorial powers consist, 1st, of the Conscription Act; 2d, of the Finance measure; and, 3d, of the Indemnity Act.

The conscription bill enrolls all the males of the loyal States (including Indians and negroes) between the ages of 20 and 45 into a national militia, and empowers the President to call them into the service of the United States for three years or the war. The only exemptions are the President and Vice-President, and one slave in each family where there are no aged parents or infant children dependent on the labor of their adult relative for support. The entire body of the militia, as thus enrolled, is to be divided into two classes: 1st, persons between 20 and 35, whether married or single, and persons between 35 and 45 if unmarried; and 2d, married men between 35 and 45. It is presumed that the latter class will not be called upon until the former has been exhausted. As according to the census there will remain, in the loyal States, after deducting the men now in the field, some 3,500,000 men liable to enrollment under this Act; and as it is quite certain that under no circumstances can such a number be required, Congress has wisely empowered the Executive to receive a sum of $300 from any drafted man who prefers paying to serving. This sum, it is believed, will always secure a substitute. Clergymen, professional men, large merchants and manufacturers, and others who are of more use to the country while prosecuting their various peaceful avocations than they would be if forced to carry a musket, will thus be exempted, while the class of men which take their place will receive money enough to keep their families as comfortably as if they had remained at home.

Under the section of this Act the President will be enabled to recruit our armies to the full standard when the time of the nine months' men expires, and the hopes of the rebels—which have been re-echoed by the correspondents of disloyal journals—that our armies would melt away in the spring will be thoroughly defeated. Under this Act the President may keep a million of men in the field without difficulty.

No allowance is made in the Act to the enlistment of negroes. Other laws are held to cover the case, and to clothe the President with ample power to enroll and arm negroes in any part of the country. Under these laws General Hunter has a brigade, at least, of negro troops at Port Royal; General Banks has several colored regiments at New Orleans and Baton Rouge; General Grant has quite a considerable negro force at Vicksburg, and General Rosecrans—who appears to arm the negro chiefly with M'Clellan's favorite and trusty weapon—the spade—has several thousand at or near Murfreesboro. In a word, we have armed and are using all the rebel weapons we have got, and shall continue to do so. We presume that before the end of the year we shall have 100,000 of them armed, equipped, and in the field.

The second of the measures which have been passed to increase the power of the President is the Financial Bill. This empowers him to issue $500,000,000 more legal tender paper money, in addition to the $300,000,000 authorized at the last session of Congress; of which $550,000,000 $150,000,000 are to be ordinary United States notes similar to those now in circulation, and $400,000,000 interest-bearing notes, to be either a legal tender themselves or to be exchangeable for legal tender on presentation. They are furthermore negotiate, at any rate which he deems fair, United States Bonds to run for not less than ten and not more than twenty years, and to bear a rate of interest not over six per cent. and interest payable in specie. The money-market and the purse of the country are thus placed absolutely at the disposal of the Government. If the Secretary of the Treasury can borrow, he has every opportunity of doing so. If he can not borrow, he has the right to manufacture money. It is true that such money manufactured at the fiat of a Government—invariably depreciates in the ratio of its issues. This is one of the evils which are necessarily involved by great wars, and which are inseparable from the paper-money system. It must be hoped that we may succeed in crushing the rebellion before the point of absolute depreciation is reached.

Besides this measure, another Act—Mr. Chase's Bank Act—transfers the entire control of the bank currency of the country to the General Government. It is not to be expected that individual or corporation to bank on the basis of Government securities, and to issue currency, based on the deposit of those securities, to par in ten per cent. of their market value. It is not expected that this Act will go fully into effect during the war, though some banks in the West will probably be organized under it. But the purpose of the measure is to institute such a connection between the public credit and the banking interest as shall, on the one hand, give the President virtual control of all the banks in the country, and, on the other, make every stockholder and banknote-holder in the land an underwriter, so to speak, for the Government bonds. Of course, pending the war, any issues of bank-notes under this Act will merely operate as a swell the inflation which now exists. But, as we said, this inflation is one of the necessary drawbacks of war.

The purse and the sword of the country thus placed unconditionally in the President's hands, it only remained to invest him with power to protect the Government from attacks in the rear from insidious treason. This was the third purpose, in accordance with the practice of old Rome, of constitutional England, and of the United States themselves. Congress passed an act empowering the President to suspend the Act of habeas corpus whenever and wherever he may deem it necessary. That this Act was necessary no one who has watched the treasonable movements of the Northern Copperheads, or reflected upon the mischief they might do if unrestrained, will venture to deny. At this very moment Southern emissaries and their Northern thiners in Indiana are manœuvring to wrest the control of the State troops out of the hands of the constituted authorities, and leading individuals in New York and Connecticut are engaged in sending arms and supplies to the rebels, chiefly for the sake of gain, but also, in some degree, for love. It is quite obvious that in the face of such a state of things, and when the nation is engaged in a death-grapple of which the issue is very doubtful, the slow and cautious remedies which the law provides for the redress of wrongs in time of peace would be out of place. The country might be ruined while we were empaneling a jury to try a traitor. Inter arma leges silent.

When we undertook the war we tacitly agreed to accept it with all its evils. Prominent among these are a depreciated currency, a temporary deprivation of personal liberty, and a liability to be taken from one's business to carry a musket in the army. These are grave inconveniences. But they are temporary and bearable; whereas the evils which would result from the disruption of the Union are permanent and intolerable. We may suffer, but our children will benefit by our suffering. Whereas if this country is severed in twain the future which lies before us is plainly depicted in the history of Mexico and Central America—incessant wars, constant subdivisions, a cessation of honest industry and agriculture, a decay of trade, a disappearance of wealth and civilization, and in their stead chronic strife, famine, bloodshed, and misery. To avoid these things we can well afford for a few years to have a strong Government.

THE LOUNGER.

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE ADMINISTRATION.

WE read a good deal in these days of supporting the Government and opposing the Administration. We are told with great complacency by orators whose speeches are hailed with delight in Richmond and Charleston, that the Administration is not the Government. We are informed by people in parades great intelligence, if they are charged with lukewarm patriotism, that they will support the war so far as it is Constitutional, but no further; and they gravely add, that it makes no difference whether the Constitution is defied by Jeff Davis or violated by the President.

Now supposing that a bad man takes the case, even as thus stated, to be true, what will he do? The Government is threatened by a furious rebellion. Some members of it, therefore, and civil order itself, are in peril. Practically but two parties are possible—those who attack and those who defend the Government. The Government can have no Constitutional executive existence for two years except in the present Administration. The loyal man will suppose, though that the Administration assumes doubtful powers. But if he withdraws from its support, and attempts to maintain a political organization for the purpose of securing another Administration at the end of two years, at the very time when the Government and national unity are so sorely pressed, does he not do all that he can not only to overthrow the Administration but to destroy the Government? At the worst, is not the question he has to answer a very simple one? Is it not plainly this: "Allowing that every Administration is inclined to maintain the Government is not such as I approve, yet which party is most likely to secure the duration of the Government, the unity of the nation, and the supremacy of the Constitution? Is it the party in active rebellion, or the party of the Administration?" In other words, if doubtful powers are assumed, are they not assumed at a most critical moment by a perfectly patriotic and honest executive for the purpose of saving the nation? and is he not, therefore, entitled to the heartiest support of every man of equal patriotism and honesty? Since for two years he is the Constitutional President, and can only be removed by revolution—since (by the supposition) in his patriotic zeal he has transcended his powers, and therefore his active opposition is fatal, can the refusal to support him be honorably justified upon any other ground than that the Union, the Constitution, and the Government are in more danger from him than from the rebellion? And is not that like the very insanity of folly?

The whole question of the Constitutional authority with which the President is charged is the emancipation order. Yet Mr. Van Buren, a leader of the Democracy, says plainly that the army ought to advance, and that the necessary consequence of its advance will be emancipation. The argument is, that the Commander-in-Chief is bound to order an advance which will result in freeing the slaves, but he has no right to declare them free. Is that such a violation of the Constitution that loyal men ought to protest by refusing their support to the administration?

The other unconstitutional stretch of power is alleged to be the "arbitrary arrests." Some of Baltimore, who, it seems, was privy to a plan to assassinate the President, but whose telegrams, indicating Baltimore as a rendezvous of masonry, are matters of publicity, was summarily arrested, imprisoned, and others, often mere brawlers, whose arrest was extremely foolish and injurious to the Government, have been likewise imprisoned by executive order. We all know the extent of such arrests. Are they also such violations of the Constitution that loyal men ought to refuse to bring their support to the Administration, thereby securing the victory of a rebellion which, in Texas, declares, unwittingly, that the bones of citizens, guilty only of loyalty to their flag and country, "are bleaching in the sun," and "their bodies are suspended in the trees like black-jacks"?

Thus, even were it granted that the Administration had in some points acted without Constitutional warrant, the step was taken to secure the Constitution itself, and to maintain the Government. To refuse to do so is to prove by the position made upon such grounds is in the interest of the rebellion.

"THE TRIAL OF THE CONSTITUTION."

DURING the earnest political canvass of 1856 there appeared some articles in the Philadelphia North American signed Cecil, which were remarkable for the calmness, the moderation, and the profound sagacity of their views upon the territorial question, which was the real pivot of the election. The style was not less notable for its clearness, richness, and incisiveness; while the argument was conducted upon no partisan ground whatever. The substance of these articles, amplified and completed, were afterward published in a small volume, which was most highly appreciated by a few thoughtful readers, but which had, probably, no extensive sale, depending, as it did, exclusively upon its merits, and upon no arts of advertising or puffing.

The chief interest of the little book was the fact which it made known that we had an acute, original, and trained political thinker and scholar, observing and criticising public affairs; but who cared less to publish his name than his thoughts, and who sought to influence his fellow-citizens by reasonable argument rather than by official position. A little pamphlet upon Race followed, in which the author developed his views upon a topic which in her this country of paramount importance. His conclusions were not what is commonly called anti-slavery. The dominant idea of his theory was that civilization is mainly determined by qualities of race; that in this country the Saxon, or superior race, is planted side by side with the African, or inferior race; that the superior must guide the inferior; that it is too late to regret the juxtaposition, but that the part of wisdom being to deal with facts, the true solution of our problem lies in replacing chattel slavery by some humane form of freedom. The question was stated with power and clearness, with perfect calmness and sincerity. It was the friendly tone of a thinker who differed from both of the extreme views of the subject which divided the country, and of a man who was more anxious to know the truth than to be applauded.

The earnest inquiry of those who wished to be thought in a time of shallow rhetoric presently revealed as the author of these treatises a scholar and gentleman of the neighborhood of Philadelphia, and of a family well known in its history, Sidney George Fisher. Such readers were ready to listen with the profoundest attention to whatever he might have to say upon the absorbing topic of the time, and they consequently turn with an interest which no other author could excite to the recent work upon "The Trial of the Constitution," published in Philadelphia, but so entirely without the usual machinery of publication that it is known to a probably unknown to most of those who read these lines. The work is not large, and is composed of five chapters or essays, with a supplement upon the Proclamation. The titles of the chapters are: A Written Constitution—Union—Executive Power—Slavery—Personal Liberty.

In such a paragraph as this we have no intention of attempting to discuss the general law of the Constitution and its working set forth by Mr. Fisher. Our object is to inform the reader of the existence of the work, and to commend it at once unreservedly to his attention as one of the most fearless, profound, thorough, and acute criticisms of our system which has ever been written. The courage of the author shrinks from no inquiry, and is dismayed by no result. He has none of the idolatry which is content with intellectual paralysis, and he regards our great charter not as a fetich to be worshiped, but as an instrument to be judged by its operation. His keen sight of the fact that the Constitution is upon trial; and exactly where and how it is tried he shows with exquisite perception. The style has the same freshness, ease, and lucidity which have been remarked in the former works of the author; but in this volume it is somewhat more diffuse, which will be readily pardoned by the reader, because, in this case, it really helps to fix the impression of the thought.

As the author proceeds the reader inevitably asks, Quis custodiet custodes?—Who shall save the commentators from being commented? For with remorseless logic he subjects every false and fallacious interpretation, and sets forth the necessity of the case. Let the tone of the times be one of inquiry, not of dogmatism. The author's attitude is that of a learner, not of a doctor. And whoever shall be led by these words to listen to Mr. Fisher, and ponder his suggestions, whether he assents to them or not, will confess that he owes something to the Lounger.

UNDER WHICH KING?

In these columns no unkind word has ever been spoken of General M'Clellan. We have therefore the right to ask him if he be seriously believe that the tendency or the intention of the political movements now on foot in his name is the strengthening the hands of the Government for a more vigorous and successful campaign against the rebels? Does he mean that when he addresses the army on the 4th of July, 1863. "On this, our nation's birthday, we declare to our foes, who are rebels against the best interests of mankind, that the victory shall enter the capital of the so-called confederacy; that our National Constitution shall prevail; and that the Union, which alone secures to us equal peace and external security to each State, 'must and shall be preserved,' cost what it may in time, treasure, and blood."

Every brave and loyal heart in the land cries Amen! Is M'Clellan the only man in the country who does not know that the men who surround him, and use his name to paralyze the Government, repudiate those sentiments, and are willing to buy temporary peace with eternal dishonor?

Trading upon his military name and popularity they hope to make him President and then his tool. Has he asked himself at what price, and for what purpose?

A QUERTION.

DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—In looking over the names of the Delmonico Committee for the Diffusion of Copperhead Literature, I observed one which I remember to have seen before. And I write my pen in hand to ask you if, in Professor Brown's lately published Life and Works of Rufus Choate, there is any mention of the famous advocate's remark upon the gentleman who now figures in the enviable light of one who is "equally unpopular, the cassic jury-lawyer replied: "Some men we dislike for cause—him, peremptorily."

Yours truly, TRI-MOUNTAIN.

The Lounger is unable to answer his correspondent's question. But Mr. Choate's remark may have a wider application. For it expresses perfectly the feeling of all loyal American citizens toward all Copperheads.

THE WHIRLIGIG OF FORTUNE.

THE morning papers a few days since contained, in the usual Congressional record, the report of a remark of Mr. Vallandigham that the New York World was an abolition print in disguise! But in the same papers were extracts from rebel papers, and especially from the Richmond Enquirer, which, speaking of the efforts of Mr. Vallandigham and his co-laborers to detach the Northwest from the Union, said frankly, "If they repudiate the debt they have contracted, and abandon the Government they have helped to create, and recast the vows and break pledges, and eat dirt, it is well: we shall be charmed; the movement will suit us perfectly; and although we shall not exactly respect the actors in that affair, yet we shall not be unwilling to trade with them—holding our nose a little [Hear! Vallandigham!] Vallandigham!]—and to show them all proper civilities, but at a proper distance!"

What sorrow a happy family is this, where Vallandigham calls the New York World an abolitionist in disguise, and the Richmond Enquirer says that it must hold its nose when it speaks of Vallandigham's services!

CIRCUMSTANCES ALTER CASES.

SENATOR RICHARDSON, of Illinois, said lately in the Senate that the rebellion was at the beginning causeless. So he and his friends, then, mean to say that it is now justifiable!

He also said at the same time that it might have been avoided by compromise. How? Upon what ground of honor or manliness was it possible to compromise with men who would ceaselessly rebel? The rebellion began after compromise was refused. Still he thinks it possible. Then the failure to compromise was not a cause or justification of rebellion.

Besides, upon what principle would he have compromised? The election had been Constitutionally conducted and concluded. Some of the defeated party said, "Why, we don't like the way we lost, and we are going to break up the Government." Now does Mr. Richardson mean that he would then have offered some sort of Constitutionally defeated part of a party to submit to the laws? Does he mean that when a defeated faction threaten a revolution in 1863, the friends of the Government are of good citizens quietly to allow them to accomplish it?

Suppose the glove had been on the other hand, and his friend Mr. Douglas had been elected. If the Republican party or any part of it had said, "We don't like the way we won't submit," would Mr. Richardson have then advised that the Administration should ask them upon what terms they would submit? It would be base and mad. If they won't submit to a Constitutional election, train every gun in the country upon them and blow the d——d Abolitionist to hell.

Circumstances alter cases, we know, but do they alter them so entirely as this?

BRIEF EXTRACT FROM THE DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES ON THE 22D FEBRUARY, 1863.

"MR. VALLANDIGHAM. I yielded the floor in the spirit of a gentleman, and not to a blackguard. [Excitement very much.]

"MR. CAMPBELL. 'The gentleman himself is a blackguard.' [Applause in the galleries.]

* * * * * * *

"MR. ROBINSON. 'I insist upon the galleries being cleared.'

"MR. COX. 'I hope not. There are only a small number of them, and the fool-killer's heel can keep them in order.'

"MR. VALLANDIGHAM thought it would be admitted by the galleries that this is a legislative and deliberative assembly, and that it is not becoming to express any approval or disapproval of whatever takes place upon this floor."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

AT a crowded concert the other evening a young lady standing at the door of the hall was addressed by an honest Hibernian, who was in attendance on the occasion: "Indade, miss," said he, "I should be glad to give you a seat, but our copy-cats are all full."

A letter was posted at the chief post-office in London a while since, bearing the subjoined minute, though somewhat imperfect orthography: "Mr. Post Master Brigden or else by my brother Tim misery or if not to gaily her mother in law who is very sick misery let this old nut stay here till I come back to the cold country—in care of the Postie who live in the Parish of Inniskeen in Cork or if not to some Decent Neighbor in Ireland."

MR. Parables is not what you may consider an intemperate man by any means, but he calls on the old fire, once in a while, for the boot-jack, to draw his hat off with.

I heard a good thing one evening at a party. A Miss Joy was present, and in the course of the evening some one said sympathetically, "A thing of beauty is a joy forever," when the excitement, "Oh, I'm glad I'm not a beauty, for I shouldn't like to be a Joy forever."

"PATRICK, where's the whisky I gave you to clean the window with?" "Och, master, I just drank it; and I thought if I breathed on the glass it would be all the same."

Why is the circulation of the blood sometimes suspended?—Because it requires to be circulated in vain.

Why is a drunkard, hesitating to sign the pledge, like a skeptical Hindoo?—Because he is in doubt whether to give up the worship of Jug-ger-naut.

It is related of a famous wit that, having been appointed to attend to the removal of a stove, and not having performed his duty as urged, in excuse, "I think it was the warmest friend, and he could not be expected to remove it."

A peddler being asked by a rebel-cracked wag if he had any overalls, replied, "No; but I have a pair of cinder-sacks with which I would just fit you."

"Stop that abominable noise," said a commanding officer to a trumpeter, to the relief of a battle; "we can stand fire, but we can't stand that air."

Rosa gowerby is better than poor pay.

He who dies in the path of duty deserves a nobler name than he who leads a victorious army over the ruins of a conquered kingdom. This is consolatory to drivers of stagecoaches who freeze to death on the box.

MR. PARTINGTON expresses her apprehensions that the people of the gold regions will bleed to death, as papers are constantly announcing the opening of another vein.

"WHAT object do you see?" asked the doctor. The young man hesitated for a few seconds, and then replied, "It appears like a jackass, doctor, but I rather think it is a post mistake."

Many persons think themselves perfectly virtuous because, being well fed, they have no temptation to vice. They don't deserve praise, because they can't help it.

FOR a lady to sweep her carpet with embroidered underclocks would be considered dirty, but to drag the parasols with her skirts seems to be very genteel.

"PLEASE, Sir, give me a penny to keep me from starving."

GRUFF. "Can't stop—in a great hurry—I've got to make a speech at the Society for the Relief of the Destitute."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Wednesday, February 25, in the Senate, the Indian Appropriation bill was passed. Bills authorizing the President to confer brevet rank, and to promote the health, comfort, and efficiency of the army, were also passed. The bill amendatory of the Pacific Railroad act was passed. Several important bills and resolutions were introduced and appropriately referred, and, after an executive session, the Senate adjourned. On Thursday, the consideration of the Senate bill to organize the militia of the nation was resumed. Amendments involving the view of active service to three years, providing for the punishment of spies, and striking out the clause requiring the president-militia to inquire into and report to the President-Militia-General all treasonable practices, were adopted, and the bill passed by a vote of 118 against 49. The Senate Committee on Finance reported a bill appropriating $10,000,000 in aid of the emancipation of slaves in Maryland. It was recommitted. The same Committee reported a bill appropriating $15,000,000 for the emancipation of slaves in Missouri. A motion to make Mr. George W. Bridges to a seat as the representative of the United District of Tennessee was agreed to. The bill amendatory of the Internal Revenue act was taken up in Committee of the Whole, and a number of amendments adopted.

On Tuesday, 26th, in the Senate, a resolution for a select committee to inquire into the conduct of Colonel Gilbert, who dispersed a meeting at Frankfort, Kentucky, recently, was laid over. Bills to carry into effect the treaty with Peru, and providing additional rights for the courts of California and Oregon, were passed. The resolution of James Harlan, late Secretary of the Interior, and others was indefinitely postponed—21 against 18. The bill organizing the militia was resumed from the House, and amendments ordered to be printed. A motion to take up the Sackargo bill was agreed to by a vote of 20 against 16, and the Senate then went into executive session, and, on the second ballot, confirmed the nomination of Benjamin Stanton to be Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-office Department. In the House, a bill to punish frauds on the Government was passed. The Senate bill for the appointment of additional general and limited brigadier-generals; also that the appointments shall be made by the President alone, was taken up. The report was agreed to by a vote of 71 yeas to 59 nays. The House concurred in the Senate bill to amend the Judiciary act. In Committee of the Whole the amendments to the Internal Revenue bill were considered. An amendment reducing the duty on paper was offered by Mr. Lovejoy, but was not acted on. The committee subsequently rose.

On Friday, 27th, in the Senate, the Conference Committee on the bill to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, reported that in striking out the points at issue between the two Houses, except the tax on bank-notes. The report was agreed to. The same conference committee on the bank-tax appointed. The Conference Committee on the bill limiting the number of generals made a report. Seventy major-generals and two hundred and seventy-five brigadiers are allowed by the report. A motion to take up the Militia bill was rejected—17 against 18. The joint resolution giving the thanks of Congress to General Rosecrans and his army for gallantry at Murfreesboro' was passed. Various unimportant subjects were disposed of, and after an executive session the Senate adjourned. In the House, the Conference Committee on the subject of taxing bank-notes reported they were unable to agree, and recommended that the House recede from the disagreement to the Senate's proposition to levy the tax. The House refused to recede, and asked for another conference committee. In Committee of the Whole the amendments to the Internal Tax bill were perfected, and the bill reported to the House. The Committee on Government Contracts reported a resolution, which was adopted, that the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to decline any further payment to the parties interested on account of chartering the steamer Catalone in April, 1861. Mr. Stevens, from the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes on the bill to indemnify the President and others for acts committed under the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, made a report thereon. It authorizes the President, during the present rebellion, and when the public safety requires it, to suspend this writ of habeas corpus in any State or parts of States, and therefore the bill passed the House. The tax discharged to take the oath of allegiance. The Senate concurred in the report by a vote of 26 against 16, and was successfully resisted by the Opposition, and at two o'clock a. m. the House adjourned.

On Saturday, 28th, in the Senate, a joint resolution giving the Secretary of Commerce and Commander Ringgold was reported. The Committee on Foreign Relations made a unanimous report on the subject of foreign mediation and intervention. The bill reorganizing the Engineer corps was reported back by the Committee on Military Affairs. Grimes introduced a bill for the purchase of the Stevens floating battery. The bill to reorganize the Ordnance Department was passed, and a bill to regulate proceedings in prize cases and to amend the acts of Congress on the question thereto was introduced. The Conscription bill was then taken up, and a long debate ensued, in which the measure was hotly assailed by the Opposition; but a motion to fix the adjournment of the House was all carried in and the bill passed.—In the House, the amendments to the Internal Tax bill were gone through with, and the bill passed. The Naval Appropriation bill, and the bill organizing the Pacific Telegraph Department were also passed. The Conference Committee on the bill pending for additional major and brigadier generals made a report, which was adopted. The report agrees to appoint thirty of the former and seventy-five of the latter. The House proviso is also modified, so that the officers to be appointed under the act shall be selected from those conspicuous for gallantry and meritorious conduct in the line of duty. The Committee on Elections made an unfavorable report on the credentials of Alvin Hawkins, claiming a seat as representative from the Ninth District of Tennessee. In the evening session the Miscellaneous Appropriation bill was taken up, and an interesting discussion on the rebellion and political questions generally ensued.

On Monday, March 2, in the Senate, the bill to regulate proceeding in prize cases was passed. Senator Wilky presented the credentials of the Hon. B. S. Bowden, elected United States Senator from Virginia for six years from the 4th of March. The President sent in correspondence about the suffering working-men of England. The Conference Committee on the bill to indemnify the President reported. The Internal Revenue bill was reported back with amendments. The Engineer Corps bill was taken up. A long fight followed; an amendment was carried on an equality but by one man should be a commissioned officer in the national army; this was modified by the House amendment, providing that by a majority, but a block was should be commissioned except as company officers over companies and of Africans only. The bill then passed. The National Revenue bill was taken up, and the income on retail liquor dealers was fixed at $50, as at present. An amendment was carried that no collector should have more than $6,000 per year besides the expenses of his office. In the House, the Senate bill granting lands to Wisconsin and Minnesota for military road purposes was passed. The Senate bill to organize a Signal Corps was also passed. The House, by a vote of 71 to 71 against 45, concurred in the report of the Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the Senate and House to indemnify the President and others for suspending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. In the evening session a bill was passed authorizing the Acting Governors of Tennessee and Arkansas to call on the loyal men of those States, and of Congress, according to the local laws. The Senate bill to establish the Pacific Railroad graduated rate and right of way, etc., etc., etc. The New York Central Railroad grade—was passed. The House bill providing for the appointment of a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States shall hereafter consist of one Chief Justice and eight Associate Justices, one of whom shall hold Court in the new Circuit of California, owing to the long-pending difficulties of travel to Kansas by railroad and telegraphic purposes. One with the amendments of the Senate. Providing that there shall be appointed one midshipman, between fourteen and twenty years of age, for each Member and Delegate in the House, recommended by the Members and Delegates of the present Congress, to immediately form a class according to the present regulations and qualifications for admission, giving the right of pre-examination to settlers on the Sioux Ranch, California. One session. Morning hour was resumed to take such measures as may be advisable to avoid losses to the Department, owing to the frauds of the foreign correspondents. Giving to soldiers discharged in consequence of wounds or sickness one bounty and to their widows and heirs two years. One providing for the removal of certain banks of Sioux Indians. Years of age. Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, moved that the House recede from the disagreement to the Senate's brevet rank on such commissioned officers as have or may hereafter distinguish themselves by gallant action; such brevet not to carry additional pay. One to carry into effect the recent convention with Peru for the settlement of claims, providing for the appointment of two Commissioners and other officers.

On Tuesday, 3d, in the Senate, an effort was made to have the previous day's journal corrected, the Opposition insisting that the vote had not been fairly taken; but it was proved conclusively that the proceedings in the matter were perfectly correct, and the motion was not pushed. To make the matter certain, however, a roll-call was taken on recalling the Internally bill from the House, and was carried in the negative—10 to 31. The bill to modify the existing laws for the collection of duties on imports was passed, with various amendment. The nomination from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, on mediation and intervention, were adopted, and the Senate went directly five dissenting votes.—Senators Carlile of Virginia, Powell of Kentucky, Nesmith of Oregon, Saulsbury of Delaware, and Wall of New Jersey. The bill to establish a branch mint in Nevada Territory was passed. A Committee of Conference was appointed on the Internal Revenue bill. The Senate refused to take up the resolution to investigate the conduct of Colonel Gilbert in dispersing the secession meeting in Kentucky. The bill to incorporate the National Academy of Science was passed. A resolution was adopted requesting the President to appoint a day of national fasting and prayer. The bill to establish a Court of Claims, consisting of three judges was voted up. A motion to lay it on the table was lost. It was, however, subsequently laid. The bill for the admission of Nevada was passed. The bill to establish a Territorial Government for Arizona, including parts of Texas, was also passed.—In the House, the Senate's amendments to the Internal Revenue bill were considered, and all agreed to—consequently, a Committee of Conference was ordered. The Senate bill to amend the revenue laws relative to sales of town sites, etc., was passed. The Miscellaneous Appropriation bill was further considered. In Committee of the Whole the Senate bill to amend the Judiciary act was frequently reported to the House. At three o'clock, according to order, the call of States for miscellaneous cases was called up. A motion to lay it on the table was lost. It was, however, subsequently laid. The bill for the admission of Nevada was passed. The bill to establish a Territorial Government for Arizona, including parts of Texas, was also passed.—In the House, the Senate's amendments to the Internal Revenue bill were considered, and all agreed to—consequently, a Committee of Conference was ordered. The Senate bill to amend the revenue laws relative to sales of town sites, etc., was passed. The Miscellaneous Appropriation bill was further considered. In Committee frequently reported to the House. At three o'clock, according to order, the call of States for miscellaneous cases of the District was again taken up, and was finally passed by. At the evening session the bill was reported by the Committee on Elections, against Mr. Grubbs and Mr. Hawkins, of Tennessee, respectively, and both of Tennessee, were unseated in. A report was made from the Committee on Elections, affirming that the Constitutional law cannot be exclude from the music applendable Senators, Messrs. Saulsbury and Wall, who voted in opposition to the report. The House passed the Senate bill to establish a Territorial Government for Idaho. A great variety of minor matters were acted upon, and both Houses were in session until after 4 a. m.

OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The concurrent resolutions reported by Senator Sumner, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, in relation to the subject of mediation by France or any other foreign power, have been the chief stand against Congress this winter, declaring that Congress can not hesitate to reject any proposition which looks to intervention in the present contest so as for unreasonable and inadmissible that the President ought not to be found in the unfortunate list of the true state of the question and of the real character of the war, and that the policy of the United States is non-interference is injurious to the national interests; and that Congress will be obliged to take further and further steps in the same direction so as sufficiently act.

LOSS OF THE "INDIANOLA."

U. S. STEAMSHIP Indianola, Pat W.

Hon. Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy, etc.

SIR,—I regret to inform you that the Indianola has also fallen into the hands of the enemy.

On the night of the 24th the Wat attacked her 25 miles from here and rammed her until she surrendered. I have ordered the vessel to a non-compliance with my instructions.

I do not know the particulars.

DAVID D. PORTER, Commander.

THE CALL AT VICKSBURG.

The reports from the cut-off at Vicksburg are most favorable. It is said that the channel has been cut to a depth of nine feet. On the 27th a gunboat and a large coal steamer, passed through, and that most of the fleet lying above were about to follow.

THE LATEST FROM VICKSBURG.

As we go to press we have a report that the rebels have attacked Grant's communications, and it is we have a rebel report that a great battle has been fought there within a few days.

ROSECRANS MOVING.

We learn from Murfreesboro', Tenn., that an expedition of a thousand cavalry and sixteen hundred infantry left there on the 24th previous, and encountered the enemy at Brady's. After severe fighting, the rebels—a force of Georgia Cavalry—were driven from the field with the loss of eight killed and twenty wounded, and nine officers and eighty prisoner captured. Several wounded rebels died of injuries received, and were also captured. Our loss is killed and wounded was about one half that of the rebels. The Richmond papers of the 28th announce that General Rosecrans has advanced to Middleborough, halfway between Murfreesboro and Shelbyville.

ATTEMPT TO MURDER GENERAL BANKS.

General Banks was fired at by some unknown person on the night of the 13th ult., as he was leaving the City Hotel at Baton Rouge, where he attended the Grand Ball, however, did not take effect either upon the General or any one else; neither has there been any trace of the would-be assassin.

CAPTURE OF THE "JACOB BELL."

The Express steamer Jacob Bell, left New York the 11th ult., in latitude 24°, longitude 68°, bound from China to the port of New York. The Jacob Bell had a cargo of 22,000 packages of tea, 3500 rolls of matting, 5000 boxes of floor-cloth, 400 boxes of fans, 1000 casks of cassia, and 210 boxes of camphor, the whole being valued at about a million of dollars, and was taken by the United States Government last over $177,000 or $200,000 in revenue, as that would be about the duty on the goods aboard. The rebel privateer burned the vessel, and transferred her passengers and crew to a Dutch vessel, which conveyed them to St. Thomas. The United States steamer Alabama and the ship Howard Knapp were both in sight on the 20th ult., and were then about to start on a cruise in search of the privateers Alabama and Florida.

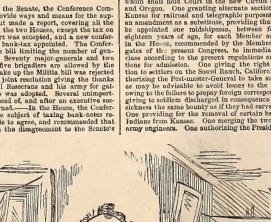
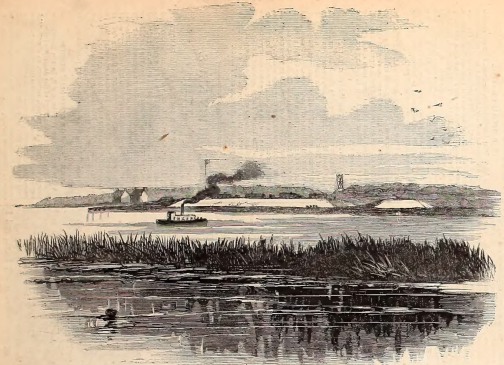
FOREIGN NEWS.



ENGLAND.

MR. MASON AT THE LORD MAYOR'S BANQUET.

MR. MASON, the rebel Commissioner to London, had been entertained by the Lord Mayor of the city at his annual banquet. Mr. Mason responded to the toast of "Our Visitors," after a complimentary call from the Lord Mayor and the guests. The Commissioner expressed the regret that England had not recognized the Southern Confederacy, spoke of the immense trade which the South would do with foreign nations, and prophesied that the day was near at hand when the most intimate relations were to be established between the city of London and the Southern Confederacy. London Herald claims, in an editorial, that neither the remarks of Mr. Mason nor the fact of his being present at the entertainment have any political significance.



THE "GEORGE GRISWOLD" DISPUTE.

A Liverpool letter of February 9, in the Manchester Examiner, noticing the arrival of the American foot-ship George Griswold at Liverpool, remarks, as showing the way in which some people reciprocate the sympathy of our Government, by which, the fact that the George Griswold was coming into port with succor for our distressed operatives, the steamer Delphi was allowed to go with a cargo of munitions of war, etc., en route, on Nassau, for a Confederate port.

THE APPROACHES TO SAVANNAH.

We are indebted to several correspondents in the Department of the South for the pictures which we publish on page 164. The situation of the Neahville, lying ensconced close to the railway line, is shown; she is temporarily blockaded in her refuge by the Montauk, but before long other means will be devised to render her helpless. Beulah Battery, a work of some pretensions, intended to impede the operations of our gun-boats, is shown on the same page.

The new rebel iron-clad Turtle, of which a picture is also given, was launched a few days since at Savannah. We are not at liberty to disclose the means by which our picture was obtained. As we said before, very little transpires either in Charleston or Savannah which is not soon known to our officers. The Turtle is said to be a very strong and formidable vessel. She is 200 feet long, 58 feet wide; her hold is 7 feet deep. She mounts eight 7-inch rifled guns, which are said to be of British manufacture and of the Armstrong pattern. Admiral Dupont will probably soon be able to give a good account of the Turtle.

MAJOR-GENERAL HUNTER, U.S.A.

We publish herewith a portrait of MAJOR-GENERAL DAVID HUNTER, U.S.A., commanding the Department of the South.

General Hunter was born about the year 1802, in the District of Columbia, and was appointed from thence to West Point in 1818. He graduated in the infantry in 1822, and served eleven years with his regiment. In 1833 he was appointed Captain of Dragoons. After three years' service he resigned, and settled in Illinois, which State has ever since been his home. In 1842 he was offered, and accepted, the post of Paymaster in the army.

After the election of Mr. Lincoln to the Presidency Captain Hunter was one of the army officers appointed by the War Department to escort him to Washington. On the reorganization of the army he was appointed Colonel of the Sixth Cavalry, and on 15th August, 1861, Major-General of Volunteers, thus ranking all the Major-Generals of Volunteers except Banks, Dix, and Butler. He had just previously taken part in the battle of Bull Run in command of his regiment, and received a severe wound in the throat, which compelled him to quit the field. On his recovery he was dispatched to the West, where he served as second in command under Frémont in the latter's brief campaign in Missouri. General Hunter was one of the first to denounce Frémont's incapacity; and, on the removal of that officer, he succeeded him in command of the army. He had no opportunity to distinguish himself, however, as he was himself very shortly afterward superseded by General Halleck. On his return to Washington he soon found a vacancy in the command of the troops at Port Royal, over "Port Royal" Sherman, who was removed. While in this command he achieved no military triumphs; but he attracted more attention than any other man in the country by issuing a short order emancipating all the slaves in the Department of the South. This order was revoked by the President, and General Hunter returned home in consequence.

MAJOR GENERAL DAVID HUNTER, U.S.A.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

After a brief holiday he was again assigned to the command of the Department of the South, and is now at Port Royal. When the attack is made upon the city of Charleston or Savannah, it is expected that General Hunter will direct the operation of the land-forces.

General Hunter, though sixty years of age, is a veteran of remarkable vigor, energy, and iron will. He tolerates no insubordination in his command, and is as much feared by his officers as by the enemy. Bred in extreme pro-slavery views, the war has converted him into a firm abolitionist. He has always been in favor of arming the negroes, and has now quite a little negro army under his command at Port Royal. "Black Dave," as the soldiers call him, will make or mar himself in the course of the next ninety days.

The Tribune correspondent states that General Hunter has organized an expedition of 5000 negro troops to penetrate one of the most thickly-populated districts of the Department of the South with a view to rouse the slaves. The invaders are to carry extra muskets, and are to be supported by an adequate force of regular troops. Though the scheme in itself seems feasible, the story is generally discredited at the North.

SMITH'S BRIDGE.

On this page we illustrate THE OVERFLOW OF THE TUSCUMBIA RIVER, near Corinth, Mississippi, from a sketch by Mr. Flournoy of the Second Iowa Volunteers. Mr. F. writes:

"CORINTH, MISSISSIPPI, Feb. 17, 1863.

"Please find inclosed a guard-post at Smith's Bridge, 4½ miles northwest from Corinth, Mississippi, across the Tuscumbia River, on the road leading from this place to Kossuth. To use the native expression, the 'river's riz' and flooded the 'bottom' or swamp, which at this place is some 2½ miles in width, and in order to reach the post it is necessary to 'take the water' about 'waist deep.' The shelter, or 'shebang,' as the boys term it, is located upon the only dry spot, about 10 feet square, on the east side of the stream. There is a corresponding knoll on the opposite side.

"With respect, yours truly,

"SILAS FLOURNOY,
"Company I, Second Iowa Infantry."

THE BEWITCHING WIDOW.

THE rights and privileges of non-combatants—the claims such may have upon the military authorities in regard to protection, is now, as it has been during the rebellion, a troublesome question. The "tender mercies" of an army are often cruelties, as the presence of a large force in any locality will witness. An appeal for protection is sometimes made to our Generals that can not be resisted, and guards have often proved themselves to be any thing but distinct in regard to duty and its execution.

Instances frequently occur where the willful lawlessness of the soldiers does make and havoc with the property of citizens; and a fancied right will prompt the timid to solicit protection, and sure to Illustrate the difficulties that cluster along the dividing line between the military and civil authorities. To act with just discrimination in disposing of the claims of loyal and disloyal applicants for protection, is not the least of the difficulties attending the progress of our army. A little story from this source will occasionally relieve the substantial and rigid ruling, and may perchance be relished by those not subject to camp fare; and I give you this illustration:

Our division was one of the many to make up the grand army under General Grant, and held our place, as ordered, in the advance on the march from La Grange, through Holly Springs, across the Tallahatchie to the bank of the Yacona patalfa.—In every retreating only as they were driven by a strong force from their chosen positions. An enterprising meddlesomeness, by the rebels, with the supplies stored at Holly Springs for the use of the army, suggested the propriety of postponing the capture of Vicksburg, or, rather, the co-operation in that undertaking by a land-force, and we all changed front and made our way back to Memphis, as a better position to await further orders. While near the Tallahatchie River on our way down, an earnest appeal for protection and a guard was made to General Q—by a widow lady. Mrs. W——'s plantation was about two miles from the road upon which we were marching—about the right distance to be subject to pilfering by soldiers, who, regardless of orders, will ramble in search of something for "the mess," no matter how well supplied from the Commissary Department, and where they would be comparatively safe from detection by the officers of the regiment.

The construction of the bridges across the miry "bottoms" made it necessary that we camp here several days. A number of the officers of the staff rode over to Mrs. W——'s spacious home, and found in her kindly proffered civilities a sure promise of a delightful exchange for the fare of "headquarters."

A substantial house told unmistakably of wealth and taste, and the urgent solicitations of the ladies induced them to "light." A short call revealed to our officers that this was a home of education and refinement; that the ladies were beautiful representatives of Southern hospitality. Mrs. W——, the owner of the plantation, was a "widow," perhaps thirty years old; a noble woman, and particularly pleasing in address and manner. Her niece, Miss —— (yet in her teens), a chatty little body, as wild as the wind, and the most intensely rebellious rebel they had yet seen; full of life, witty and sweet, excepting, of course, her rantings about the Federal army, subjugation, and the tantalizing comments she made in praise of "our noble army," and to the disparagement of the "Lincoln hirelings," she was quite screnable. The other "defenseless lady" was a friend of Mrs. W——'s, the widow of a rebel captain that was killed in one of the first battles of the contest—was here on a visit—she was exquisitely beautiful. Ah, her soft black eyes, brilliant complexion, and fascinating grace and dignity, made extravagant drafts upon the descriptive powers of the staff officers when they attempted to describe her loveliness. As they consciously failed to satisfy themselves that we could see her as she appeared to them, I shall not attempt a further description; doubtless she was a lovely, sweet woman.

The house was luxuriously furnished; the grounds around tastefully laid out. Strawberry in all the variety of Southern growth gave evidence of great care and selection, and the assurance that this would be a delightful spot when winter had released its grasp. The servants about the house, the well-built "quarters" and their occupants, gave proof of the abundance of help to keep all this in thrift and good order.

During the time occupied in building roads across the Tallahatchie bottoms and the bridge across the river, a few of the staff officers found time, as a relief from duty occurred, to visit Mrs. W——'s plantation, and enjoy an afternoon or evening in a social visit. The known protection has afforded the ladies was demunicy to the property on that plantation from the foraging expeditions of the soldiers. The ladies were grateful for the chivalry of the staff, and the staff no less grateful for the kind and cordial welcome always extended to them.

The bridge was finished but too soon, perhaps, to those most interested in the occupants of the "Widow W——'s house. Who can say that all marched on without reluctance, day after day, over to Oxford, and away beyond to the camp on the Yocanopatafa? What wonder that a regret would arise in the mind of more than one at this separation from the only place that seemed like home, and from voices and eyes like those of remembered ones away up North!

While on the wing for a march from the camp last named southward to Grenada orders came to retrace our steps. Van Dorn had attacked Holly Springs, taken Colonel Murphy and his force prisoners (excepting only the gallant Second Illinois Cavalry, two companies of which had fought their way out, after a desperate resistance), burnt and destroyed all the army stores; and evidently the expedition to Jackson and Vicksburg was at an end, for we countermarched rapidly along our newly repaired roads, burning the bridges behind us, and one night found us again encamped at the Tallahatchie.

Before we had fairly made snug arrangements for night Mrs. W—— sent an urgent message for "a guard," or, "if some of the officers could make it convenient to stay at her house that night she would feel safe from molestation by the soldiers." Some of "the staff" heard the message to General Q—ley, and although he was not in humor to be very considerate of matters outside of his division, yet he granted a reluctant consent to Captain R—t—n, who offered to go and protect the ladies from all harm. "Remember, Captain, the guerrillas are hovering along, and it is hardly safe to be outside the lines. Take care of yourself. Every woman is a 'defenseless widow' in this country."

With Captain M-lv-n, the Assistant Quartermaster of the division, who confessed to a solicitude for unprotected "widows," Captain B-rt-n was in high condition for guarding defenseless women; and they sprang into their saddles, gave spurs to their horses, and away they galloped beyond the picket line to Mrs. W——'s plantation.

A cordial greeting awaited them, and after tea our officers whiled away the evening with music and whist until a late hour. The charming presence in which our officers revelled was enough to turn the heads of the chivalry of any age; what fect it had upon the valorous captains remains to be seen.

At bedtime they were shown into a large room across the hall from the parlor, and they soon were snugly in bed. The object of their escorting quarters at last suggested a thought to Captain M-lv-n, somewhat in accordance with their duty, and after the quiet of a few minutes of rest he broke the silence in this way:

"B-rt-n, are you asleep?"

"Asleep? no! I was just thinking which I would rather be, the man to crush this unholy rebellion, or the glass that the sweet widow raised to her lips when she proposed that glorious toast for peace. Oh! paradise, what lips!"

"Pshaw! nonsense! if you had your boots on I should say you were tight; but say, B-rt-n, I don't feel quite easy here."

"I can tell you why that is, Captain M-lv-n: you didn't get the General's permission to come here, and I did—that's all. I'm almost entirely comfortable here, not quite. Can't she be sweet, though!"

All is quiet again, until Captain M-lv-n says: "B-rt-n, the Colonel of the regiment I first enlisted in always told me I never should be taken prisoner unless it was while running after women away from the command. I don't feel quite easy here; what if the guerrillas should attack us tonight?"

"Oh! the d—l, Cap, go to sleep. The guerrillas aren't going to attack this house: there's nothing here but women and niggers, and the rebs are only after Government stores. They won't dare come up near our army."

"I'd rather be inside the army lines than where we are. If they should make a dash this way they might pick us up. I say, B-rt-n, where did you hitch your horse?"

"Oh, I hitched him at the gate."

"At the gate! You d—d fool. Why, your horse is white, and they'll see him a mile off!"

"Well, Captain M-lv-n, A.Q.M., where did you hitch yours, if you please?" said B-rt-n, indignantly.

"I took him through the garden and tied him behind a clump of evergreens, and he is out of sight. Where are your pistols, B-rt-n?"

"Pistols? Pistols? Let's see, what, my pistols?"

"Yes, yes, your pistols, where are they?"

"In the holsters on my saddle."

"Where is your saddle?"

"On the porch, I suppose; the nigger threw it there when we first came in. Now, Sir, where is your pistol, your only one, if you will gratify my inquisitiveness?"

"Under my pillow, of course. Get up and get yours, so you can use them if necessary."

"Couldn't do it, Cap. Don't catch me prowling around the house this time of night, and ladies only in the house, and we almost strangers to them. Ain't you crazy?" Couldn't do it, Cap; sha'n't do it! You prowl."

And so we will leave them to sleep, with a white horse at the gate and a brace of pistols snugly in the holsters on the front steps!

At supper-table at head-quarters, Capt. R—ch—ter, the Assistant Adjutant-General, proposed being one of four to go and capture the chivalric captains, and put a stop to this kind of duty by staff officers of this division. It met with a hearty response, and the party was made complete by increasing the number to fifteen.

Colonel St-rr-ng, of the Seventy-Second Illinois, was to command the expedition, while Captain ——, of the same regiment, should be "Captain G. L. Orton, of First Tennessee Cavalry, Jackson's Brigade, Southwest Division," two of the division teamsters to act as guerrillas with "Captain Orton," to enter the house, take them prisoners, rob them and parole them; the rest of the force was to make no noise enough outside to represent at least a regiment of rebel cavalry.

The paroles were written out ready for signatures, and nothing was needed but the General's consent to the excursion.

Captain R—ch—ter knew that General Q—by was exceedingly annoyed by the applications for "guards," and was distrustful of the numerous "widows" who craved protection along the route, and as the General had made no objection at the tea-table to the proposed plan, now ventured to gain his consent.

"But some men would shoot you if you undertook that game," said the General.

"Can we go, General?"

"Adjutant, the order of march to-marrow morning will be the same as to-day; march at 7 o'clock precisely."

"Yes, Sir. I have sent orderlies to the several brigades with the order; but, General, can we go?"

"You will see, Captain R—ch—ter, that the order in regard to straggliers is sent to the commanders of each brigade," and that was all that R—ch—ter could gain in reply, though he imagined he could see a relish for the proposed trip in the General's eye.

The guerrilla party, made up of officers who were the daily associates of those they proposed to capture, found some difficulty in passing out of the lines, but succeeded about midnight, and went cheerfully, cautiously on.

"Captain C. L. Orton" was disguised in a "butternut" coat and secesh cap, the two teamsters who were to enter the house were disguised as guerrillas, although all were fearful they might be recognized by Captain M-lv-n, the Assistant Quarter-master, who from his duties had personal knowledge of every teamster in the division.

While passing through a deep ravine they heard voices in the dark woods ahead and stopped. Here was something not provided for. A genuine guerrilla party might be now in their way; a moment's consultation and they dashed along through the mud at a gallop, determined to fight it out and capture the rebels if they could.

This proved to be a dozen of contrabands, men and women, old and young. "What are you doing here this dark night, you black rascals?" called out Colonel St-rr-ng.

"We's only niggers," but seeing the United States uniform the negro changed tone of voice instantly, and added,

"We's contrebans!"

"But who do you belong to?"

"We 'longs to Missus W——, and we's done come clar out, cierry one eb us."

"Where are you going?"

"To de Yankee army."

"How many are there of you?"

"About twenty-five head, ole an' young, massa."

By this time matters all around were clearly understood, and the escort to this black squad proved to be, as they emerged from the thicket by the roadside, two soldiers from the Third Michigan Cavalry, who had been foraging at Mrs. W——'s on their own account, and had run off the whole slave force of the plantation.

"But aren't there some Federal officers there?" asked Colonel St-rr-ng.

"Lor', yes, massa! dey comed dar about a hour by sun, and dey 'gor des selves wid de ladies all de ebenin'; dey hab de gayest kind ob a time."

"Where are they now?"

"Golly! de ben bed more'n two hours; dey's fas' 'sleep shuah, kase I seed dem."

"In what room?"

"I knows," called out a negress. "I waits on de company in de parlor all de ebenin', and makes de bed for de gemmen, an' it's in de front ob de house, jus' 'cross de hall from de parlor, at de left han', when you go in de fron' door."

"Is there any one about the house besides your mistress?"

"Oh yes. Dere is ole Missus and young Missus, and de sweet Missus what's visitin', and de two officers; dat's all."

"Are there no servants about the house?"

"Not a one, massa, only Jes, and he's in de furdest quarters. He laid out to stay and bil' de fire in de mornin' for de ladies before dey's up; den he's cumin' too. Dey's got to get de breakfas' des selves, dey han. I fix it all ready for Missus, 'cause she's allers gued to me. But we's free now! we's goin' Nort! But I feels mos' sorry for Missus."

Here were the slaves of that plantation, all their baggage packed upon four mules, as none other than niggers do pile it up, under guidance of two thieving cavalry men, on their way to the Federal lines! It afforded a forcible evidence of the vigilance of the worthy captains who had volunteered to protect the ladies from the soldiers. It was a rich prelude for the "Guerrilla Band" were now ready for music.

They now dashed along the road to the house; the clanging of sabres and rapid clattering of hoofs made a terrible certainty that something was in the wind.

"Surround that house!" shouted Col. St-rr-ng; and the "guerrillas" plunged through the yard and up to the windows with pistols drawn.

"Captain Orton, dismount with your men! Go in and take the abolition scoundrels prisoners! Shoot them if they resist!" roared the Colonel, with fearful distinctness; the words and tone startled even the eager "guerrillas," and echoed through every room in the house.

While a part of the force stood guarding the windows, with pistols touching the glass, the rest galloped back and forward through the yard, making all the noise possible. A pile of plank near by served this purpose; it was pushed down, and the "guerrillas" took special care to gallop their horses upon and over the loose boards. The horses were frantic with excitement. This was about the state of the weather when "Captain Orton" pounded against he bedroom door.

"Who's there?" called out Captain B-rt-n.

"Captain C. L. Orton, First Tennessee Cavalry, Jackson's Brigade."

"All right!" answered Captain B-rt-n.

Resistance to such a force was worse than folly, particularly if they remembered there that they had one pistol for defense. So the officers unlocked the door and yielded a reluctant assent to the demand of "Do you surrender peaceably?" So the "guerrillas" strode into the room with pistols cocked and pointed at the heads of their victims.

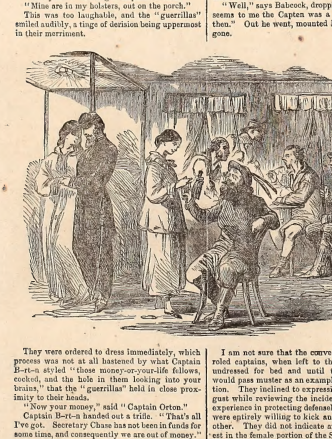
At the first alarm the ladies had called for their servants; but not a reply, nor could they find one about the house; concluding that they were frightened and left the house at the first sound of the attack, with lamps trimmed and burning they were down in the hall in their night-dresses.

Miss —— was in a perfect ecstasy of delight. "How did you know they were here? You've caught them nicely! That's right! You're in a holy cause, and God will bless you!" and dancing around and patting the "guerrillas" approvingly.

The "widows," both of them, plead earnestly for the Federal Captains—"not to kill them; they were perfect gentlemen—had treated them very kindly—had protected them from the ruffian soldiery: the officers behaved like gentlemen, but the soldiers so shamefully!"

"Give our arms, gentlemen," said "Captain Orton."

"Here are their swords, on the table in the hall," said one of the "widows."



Captain M-lv-n gave up his pistol.

"Is that all?"

"Yes, Sir."

"And you—?" turning to Captain B-rt-n.

"Mine are in my holsters, out on the porch." This was too laughable, and the "guerrillas" smiled audibly, a tinge of derision being uppermost in their merriment.

They were ordered to dress immediately, which process was not at all hastened by what Captain B-rt-n styled "those money-or-your-life fellows, cocked, and the hole in them looking into your brains," that the "guerrillas" held in close proximity to their heads.

"Now your money," said "Captain Orton."

Captain B-rt-n handed out a trifle. "That's all I've got. Secretary Chase has not been in funds for some time, and consequently we are out of money."

Captain M-lv-n denied having any of his own.

"But you are Division Quarter-master, and must have Government funds."

"All I have was due deceased soldiers, and belongs to their families, and I'll see you d——d, Sir, before I'll give that up! If you are soldiers, treat us as soldiers. Our private property is sacred. I want to see your General. I understand he is a gentleman. Take us to him."

"Well, well," says "Captain Orton;" "hurry up! We're no time to lose: it is fifteen miles to camp."

This was an unexpected turn. The "guerrillas" had not reckoned on taking them to camp. Lieutenant L—ll from the door called out, "Come, boys, run out your halter-straps. We ain't to be bothered with these Yankee cusses long. It's woods all the way, and strong limbs are plenty on the road to camp."

Just here an orderly ran up with a message to "Captain Orton."

"Dismount orders you to parole the prisoners and fall in at once for camp."

The parolees were laid on the table, and our captains having assented to this arrangement were now seated, reading over what they were required to sign—reluctantly they concluded to do it, and each signed the paper.

While this was taking place the rebel Miss —— was chatting with one of the teamsters and pouring out whisky for them all, expressing her regrets that she had nothing better, as the Yankees had drank up every thing else.

"Captain Orton" took occasion to slip his arm around the fascinating widow, and drew her in a decidedly affectionate, if not familiar, hug toward him, asking her if she was not "glad to see him." He says she whispered, "I never was so happy in my life." The captive prisoners stoutly deny that part of it.

After an affectionate exchange of civilities with the ladies, and the taunt that so soon as they were gone they would be "claiming Yankee protection" again, "Captain Orton" required the solemn pledge and word of honor that neither of the Federal officers should leave that house before eight o'clock next morning; then taking Captain B-rt-n's horse and equipments they mounted and galloped off.

Our captains were congratulating each other at the heroic pass which they had escaped death, when one of the "guerrilla" party came stumbling into the room and gathered up the cloaks. It was the gentleman who had received so much attention from Miss ——.

"What do you propose to do with these cloaks?" asked Captain M-lv-n, as the "guerrilla" was walking out with them.

"I reckon they'll be about right to keep some of our boys warm; you men can get more of them, and we uns can't do it."

"See here," says Captain M-lv-n, "are you a Major?"

"No, Sir!" (And he drew upon his face a most insulting grimace.)

"A Captain?"

"No, Sir!" (Another grin.)

"A Lieutenant?"

"No, Sir!" (Grinning still.)

"A Sergeant?"

"No, Sir!" (More grinning.)

"Then what are you, Sir?"

"I'm a private, Company A, Captain C. L. Orton, First Tennessee Cavalry, Jackson's Brigade, Southwest Division!" (This was in the most impudent manner possible.)

"And your name?"

"Bab-cock, Sir!"

"Well, then, Mr. Babcock, you just put down those cloaks. Your Captain has allowed us to keep our personal property, and you can't take any from here without his orders."

"Well," says Babcock, dropping the cloaks, "it seems to me the Captain was a leetle too fast just then." Out he went, mounted his horse, and was gone.

I am not sure that the conversation of our paroled captains, when left to themselves, as they understood for bed and until they were asleep, would pass muster as an example of pious resignation. They inclined to expressions of profane disgust while reviewing the incidents of their recent experience in protecting defenseless women. They were spitefully willing to kick any body, even each other. They did not indicate any desirable interest in the female portion of the Southern Confederacy, and they divided their malevolictions between "Babcock" and women generally.

They were startled from sleep about daylight by the sudden raising of a window; and now wide awake they awaited another attack in silence.

A great negro pushed about half his body into the room, and in a loud whisper, said—"Massa! Massa! dem keavy dose gone and steal cheery nigger on de plantation; de home servants, ole and young, and de bess mules, and all de plunder dey could tote, and vegetonals, and I'se gwi-in to see what's de matter. I tote de fire in de kitchum fue, an now Jpo's off too." He drew himself carefully out of the window, as carefully set down the sash, and was gone.

They looked at each other, drew long breaths. "Cap," says B-rt-n; "ain't this the state of sin and misery?" So they pondered over the news in silence.

The domestic arrangements of the house in the culinary department being now under new management quite a late breakfast was the result; indeed our warriors had lost some of their former interest in the ladies who occupied a part of that house, and remained in the room until called to breakfast. I would not intimate that they were entirely unmindful of a word of honor, given during the past night, that they would not leave the house until after eight o'clock, as they made no preparation for marching until that hour had fairly passed.

At the breakfast-table, the only position assumed that was at all creditable to either of the persons there assembled was in the indignant threat made by one of the captains against the often-made charge "that our troops run off slaves from loyal owners." It was in reply to some tart remark of Miss ——. "You have," said Captain B-rt-n, "indisputable evidence that your own troops are engaged in stealing slaves; they certainly have made a clean sweep here." This was "a clincher" in the way of justification. The "widows" were astonished at this evidence, particularly Mrs. W——, who was now without a slave. This incident placed each of the parties upon about an equal footing, so no matter about giving the details of that breakfast chat.

Our staff officers saddled their one horse; one of them mounted; the other, as high private, on foot, bade the ladies "Good-morning!" (with the mental accompaniment of good-by to any and all offers of protection to defenseless women in future), and marched off for camp. They noticed a great deal of mud in the road not there the afternoon before. "It must have rained, but we did not hear it—mud was awful!—what horrid roads!" etc.

"How are we to manage this at head-quarters?" "Own up, of course, that we were captured, tell the whole story, excepting the paroles. Guerrillas have no business to parole an officer or private; they are prisoners any how: not owning in their own 'slebang' of a Confederacy as soldiers. No, Sir! deny that we were paroled until [a very warm place] freezes over, and we have to go there on skates!"

So it was agreed upon.

"There comes the General and Lieut. Wh-te! M-lv-n, now remember about the paroles. Whew! [wiping the perspiration from his forehead] I wish we were very well into the middle of next week!" I never fully appreciated that idea before."

The division had filed out from camp at seven o'clock that morning, and taken the line of march northward. The General inquired for his aids, but no one knew where they were. Eight o'clock came and passed, and yet they had not made their appearance. About nine o'clock, and with the Provost Marshal's escort for their escort, he rode rapidly down the road toward Mrs. W——'s plantation.

"Something must have happened to them."

"Gentlemen," said the General, as he rode up, "what does this mean?"

"Prisoners, by G-d!" answered both at the same breath.

"Tut, tut, tut! young gentlemen, no profanity. Captain B-rt-n, where is your horse?"

"Gobbled, General; GOBBLED! Captain C. L. Orton, First Tennessee Cavalry, Jackson's Brigade!"

"Guerrillas! General," says Captain M-lv-n.

"What do you mean by guerrillas?"

"Mean that we have been taken prisoners—robbed of every thing! They surprised us, overpowered us both, and we had to surrender."

"Where were you?"

"At Mrs. W——'s."

"Probably she sent word to the rebels that you were there."

"No, no, General! The women plead for us like good fellows. We would have been hung at once, or shot, if it had not been for them. No, Sir! no, Sir! Why, the lousy butternuts stole every one of her negroes, and all!"

"What! while you were there? I thought you went there to guard her premises?"

"Yes; but what could we do against a whole company?"

"How many were there?"

A whole regiment surrounded the house, and four straggling great fellows burst open the door and upon us before we had time to do any thing."

"Yes," said Captain B-rt-n; "and with these money-or-your-life fellows, the holes in them looking right through you."

"What kind of looking fellows were they?" asked Lieutenant Wh-te.

"The most devilish set of infernal cut-throats! Long-bearded, dirty scoundrels! but armed to their teeth. All had revolvers!"

"But how did you get away? You say they took you prisoners, did they parole you?" asked the General.

"No, Sir!" (At one breath both.) "They tried to rob me of my money, the lousy thieves!" said Captain M-lv-n. "Cap here hadn't any; and I swore they should not have to their cargo, I wouldn't submit to it; and we swore we wouldn't be paroled, they might hang us first. Something must have alarmed them. Some one rode up and called to them from outside. They must have expected an attack from our army, and they left as quick as they came."

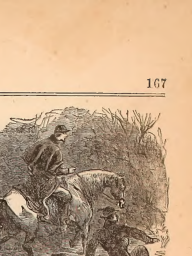
This was too much for General Q—by, who had listened with apparent incredulity to their earnest explanations—and, lest he should rejoice in laughter at them, whirled his horse and galloped back to the marching column.

"Yes, and stole my horse, saddle, bridle, pistols, and sword—saddle cost me ninety dollars!" shouted Captain B-rt-n after him.

Lieutenant Wh-te turned back and asked how the women acted. "It was a plan by them to save you captives."

"No, indeed! Why the women were frightened half to death. They begged and plead for our lives—and for their gentlemen, who had treated them well and protected them; and all of them stood between us and death—between us and death, Sir!"

The Lieutenant here just then made a tremendous spring ahead—probably from having the vowels of the spurs plunged into his side—and the Lieutenant soon overtook and joined the General.



"They don't believe us, Cap," said M-lv-n.

"Well, I do," answered B-rt-n.

"Wonder if the General would feel if he was taken prisoner as we were?"

"Well, Captain M-lv-n, I don't wonder how he'd feel, for I know how I feel! Some of those lazy escort might have let me have a horse. They never offered us one."

When they overtook the division Captain B-rt-n jumped into the first ambulance and rode there until a horse was sent for them, when he hurried along and took his place with the rest of the staff at the head of the division.

Captain M-lv-n rode along rapidly by the files of privates, but had to stop at the hand of each regiment and tell his adventure. All laughed at it; wouldn't believe it. He had commenced with telling that four came into the room, and reached forty or fifty by the time he joined the staff. Having acquired a facility by frequent repetitions, he rapidly told his story. Every body was incredulous. Captain B-rt-n must be sent for, and his story must be heard.

When Captain B-rt-n came they only agreed on the subject of paroles—here precisely. Can you imagine the fun we had all that day? Such Munchausen-like additions as were piled on at each succeeding repetition of their adventure; so vexed and angry would they become when we doubted any or all of it—such descriptions of the guerrilla, "the out-throats," a drunken rowdy set of beggars (and we were hearing our own looks described), "Babcock" was the special object of Captain M-lv-n's ire; all he wanted to live for was to meet "that Babcock some time!" I can not describe that day's ride but by saying we laughed all day long.

When night came and camp ground selected, Lieutenant Eric—n would not be satisfied that the prisoners escaped without being "paroled," and, as we were all awaiting the pitching of the tents, flatly told them he didn't believe them, and called out, "Captain Rob—ter, how did the parole run?"

"About like this," said R—b—ter. "I—and A. Q.M., and I, Captain —— and A.D.C., "repeating the exact words of the parole.

Both of the victims looked amazed. "But," said Captain M-lv-n, "any one knows how to make up a parole" (even a little fool). "But don't you know that you have been sold? Here, M-lv-n," said Captain R—b—ter, reaching down and handing it to him, "is your pistol; and B—t—n, here are yours, that were in your holsters on the porch. There comes your horse that was hitched at the gate, and your swords are in that ambulance. (Bring them here, Will.) Do you TAKE, GENTLEMEN?"

It was watching M—n as he took the pistol: he turned deathly pale; felt of it as though about to use it; looked up at Captain R—b—ter, and his eyes looked wicked. The General said, "Take it kindly, M-lv-n, as a practical joke." A moment more, and the Captain dropped the pistol and sat down. "It's all right, gentlemen; I'm sold!"

"Yes," said the persistent Eric—n, "and there's Babcock' pitching camp!"

A few nights after this all were invited to a certain tent; the Guerrilla Band were there—a table laid to suit the subject was given by the choir—all joined in the chorus; and thus ended all guarding rebel property in this division.

The "Widow W——" is still in ignorance of the truth of that night's adventure, and will be until, perhaps, this record meets her eye. The "sweet widow" will please accept "Captain C. L. Orton's" compliments. Miss —— does not deserve any.

LIFE'S ANSWER.

I KNOW not if the dark or bright
Shall be my lot:
If that wherein my hopes delight
Be best, or not.

It may be mine to drag for years
Toil's heavy chain:
Or day and night my meat be tears
On bed of pain.

Dear faces may surround my hearth
With smiles that glad;
Or I may dwell alone, and mirth
Be strange to me.

My bark is wafted to the strand
By breath divine:
And on the helm there rests a hand
Other than mine.

One who has known in storms to sail
I have on board:
Above the raving of the gale
I hear my Lord.

He holds me when the billows smite,
I shall not fall:
Sharp, 'tis short: if long, 'tis light;
He tempers all.

Safe to the land—safe to the land,
The end is this:
And then with Him go hand in hand
Far into bliss.

CHAPTER IX.—(Continued.)

MEANWHILE Mr. Corbet was at the Parsonage, where he was received by the new servants that he had no difficulty in having the spare bedchamber made ready for him, late as it was, and by the absence of the master, who had taken a little holiday, now that Lent and Easter were over, for the purpose of fishing. While his room was getting ready Ralph sent for his clothes, and by the same messenger he dispatched the little note to Ellinor. But then it was the letter he had promised her in it still to be written; and it was almost his night's employment to sit down and write. Somehow, as he expressed it to himself, he was half-way over the stream, and it would be folly to turn back, for he had given nearly as much pain both to himself and Ellinor by this time as he should do by making the separation final. Besides, after Mr. Wilkins's speech, and coming—but no, no candid enough to acknowledge that, bad and offensive as they had been, if they had stood alone they might have been condoned.

His letter ran as follows:

"DEAREST ELLINOR,—for dearest you are, and I think will ever be—though I have exerted myself to a very high degree in giving me great pain, greater than you will readily believe. I am convinced that it is better that we should part; for circumstances have occurred since we formed our engagement which, although I am unaware of their exact nature, I can see weigh heavily upon you, and have materially affected your father's behavior. Nay, I think, after so-night, I may almost say have entirely altered his feelings toward me. What their circumstances are, I am ignorant, nay further than that I know from your own admission that they may be of some future disgrace. Now, it may be my fault, it may be in my temperament, to be sensitive, shrinking, and over-nice; to mount, perhaps a high reputation. I can only say that it is so, and have yet to see the man who overcomes as much as you like. But any thing that might come between me and this object would, I see, be idolized by me; that the very dread of such an obstacle intervening would paralyze me. I should become nervous, and by my very efforts to ask always must be toward you. I could not promise you a happy, peaceful life. I should be continually haunted by the idea of what might happen in the way of discovery and shame. I am the very reverse of this from my character; one of your father's altered character—an alteration which I trace back to the time when circumstances that have since affected his place to which you have alluded. In short, if I do for your sake, my dearest Ellinor, even more than for myself, that I feel compelled to affix a final meaning to the words which your father addressed to me as implying that he desired me to leave his house forever. God bless you, my Ellinor, for all you have been to me. I will write to you soon as you can the unfortunate tie which has bound you for a time to me dissolved, and believe I ought to say no unworthy of you.—RALPH CORBET."

Ellinor was making breakfast when this letter was given her. According to the wont of the servants of the respectable households of the Parsonage and Ford Bank, the man asked if there was any answer. It was only custom; for he had not been desired to do so. Ellinor went to the window to read her letter; the man waiting all the time expecting her reply. She went to the writing-table, and wrote:

"It is all right—quite right. I ought to have thought of it all before. I do see that you will forget me in a very easily, but I entreat you never at any future time to blame yourself. I trust you will be happy and successful. I only pray I may never write to you again, but shall always pray for you. I am very, very sorry, and sorry for having spoken angrily to you. You can forgive me—there is great need for forgiveness in this world.—ELLINOR."

She kept quiet watch on her self after thought just to prolong the last pleasure of writing to him. She sealed the note and gave it to the man. Then she went and waited for Miss Monro, who had gone to bed on the previous night without awaiting Ellinor's return from the raising-cross.

"I am late, my dear," said Miss Monro, on coming down, "but I have had a bad headache, and I don't care for a pleasant companion." Then looking round she perceived Ralph's absence.

"Mr. Corbet not down yet!" she exclaimed. And then Ellinor had to tell her the outline of the facts so soon likely to be made public; that Mr. Corbet and she had determined to break off their engagement; and that Mr. Corbet had accordingly been with himself to the Parsonage, and that she did not expect him to return to Ford Bank. Miss Monro's astonishment was unbounded. It was some time over and over all the little circumstances she had noticed during this last visit, only on yesterday, in fact, which she could now see to be tokens of the notion that two, apparently so much attached to each other but a few hours before, were now to be forever separated and strangers. Ellinor sickened under the torture, which yet seemed like torture in a dream, from which there must come an awakening and a relief. But that felt as if she could not bear any more; yet there was more to bear. Her father, as it turned out, was very ill, and had been so all night long: he had evidently had some kind of attack on the brain, whether apoplectic or paralytic it was for the doctors to decide. In the hurry and misery of this day of misery succeeding to misery she almost forgot to wonder over the letter which were still at the Parsonage—still in Hamley it was not till the coming visit of the physician that she learned that he had written to Mr. Monro as he was taking his place in the morning mail to London. Dr. Moore alluded to his name as to a thought that would cheer and comfort the fragile girl during her night-watch by her father's bedside. But Miss Monro stole out after Dr. Moore to warn him off the subject for the future, crying bitterly over the forlorn position of her darling as she spoke—crying as Ellinor had never yet been able to cry; though she was silent, in the pride of her sex, she was endeavoring to persuade the Doctor it was all Ellinor's doing, and the wisest and best thing she could have done, as he was not good enough for her—only a poor barrister struggling for a livelihood. Like many other kindhearted people, she fell into the blunder of lowering the moral character of those whom it is their greatest wish to exalt. But Dr. Moore knew Ellinor too well to believe all that Miss Monro said; she would never act from interested motives, and it was more likely to cling to a man because he was down and unsuccessful. No! there had been a lover's quarrel; and it could not have happened at a sadder time.

CHAPTER X.

BEFORE the June roses were in full bloom Mr. Wilkins was dead. He had left his daughter to the guardianship of Mr. Ness by some will made years ago; but Mr. Ness had caught a rheumatic fever with the funeral, and Ellinor had been unable to be moved home from the little Welsh inn where he had been staying when he was taken ill. But when last attack Mr. Wilkins's mind had been much affected; he often talked strangely and wildly; but he had rare intervals of quietness and full possession of his senses. At one of these times he must have written a half-finished pencil-note, which his nurse found under his pillow after his death and brought to Ellinor. Through her tear-blinded eyes she read the weak, faltering words:

"I am very ill, I sometimes think I shall never get better, so I wish to ask your pardon for what I said the night before I was taken ill. I had had my angry words and misunderstood between you and Ellinor, but I think you will forgive a dying man. If you will come back and let all be as it was, I will humbly acknowledge my error and require. If I go she will be so very friendless; and I have looked to you to care for her ever since you flew to her assistance when illegible and apparently incoherent writing, ending with, "From my death-bed I adjure you to stand by my friend; I will beg pardon on my knees for this thing—"

And there strength had failed; the paper and pencil had been laid aside to be resumed at some time when the brain was clearer, the hand steadier. Ellinor read the letter, reverently folded it up, and laid it among her sacred treasures, by her mother's half-finished sewing, and a little scarf the latter had been knitting.

Mr. Johnson, who had been one of the trustees for Mrs. Wilkins's marriage settlement, a solicitor, also inherited from his father, and Mr. Ness, had been appointed as executors of his will and guardians to Ellinor. The will itself was a very simple document, leaving to his wife what had imagined himself the possessor of a hundred fortune, the bulk of which he bequeathed to his child. But her interest in the marriage-settlement Ford Bank was held in trust for the children of the marriage; the trustees being Sir Charles Dunster and Mr. Ness. These had allegacies to his executors; a small annuity to Miss Monro, with the expression of a hope that it might be extended for her devotion to the living with Ellinor as long as the latter remained unmarried; all his servants were remembered. Upon deposit with most trustworthy.

What remained of the handsome fortune once possessed by the testator? The executors asked each other; there was nothing. They could hardly make out what had become of it, in such utter confusion were all the accounts, both personal and official. Mr. Johnson had been entertained by his companion for the orphan from throwing on the executorship in disgust. Mr. Ness roused himself from his usual indifference from all business to labor at the examination of books, parchments, and papers. Ellinor's uncle, Sir Frank Hoister professed himself ready to assist for the Ford Bank.

Meanwhile she went on living at Ford Bank, quite unconscious of the state of her father's affairs, but sunk into a deep plaintive melancholy, which affected every one who spoke of her voice in such a manner as to distress Miss Monro exceedingly. It was not that the good lady did not quite acknowledge the propriety of her pupil had for grieving—deserted by her lover, her father dead—but that she could not bear the outward signs of it, since no one knew what had told on Ellinor. Her love for the poor girl was infinitely distressed by seeing the daily wasting away, the increasing sadness and want of spirit, and she grew impatient of the continual pain of sympathy. If Miss Monro could have done anything, she would have done it; but now she would have been less inclined to scold her for giving way to it.

The time came when Miss Monro could act, and after that there was no more irritation on her part. When all hope of Ellinor's having any thing beyond the bare maintenance at Ford Bank was gone; when it was proved that of all the legacies bequeathed by Mr. Wilkins not one farthing could ever be paid; when it came to be a question how for the beautiful pictures and other objects of art in the house were not legally the property of unsatisfied creditors, the sister of her father's affairs was communicated to Ellinor as delicately as Mr. Ness knew how.

She was drooping over her work—she always drooped now—and she left off sewing to listen to him, bending her head on the arm which rested on the table. She did not speak when he had ended his statement. She was silent for whole minutes; he went on speaking out of very agitation and awkwardness:

"It was all the rascal Dunster's doing, I've no doubt," said he, trying to account for the entire loss of Mr. Wilkins's fortune.

To his surprise Ellinor lifted up her white stone face, and said, slowly and faintly, but with almost solemn calmness:

"My dear father cannot never allow Mr. Dunster to be blamed for this!"

"My dear Ellinor, there can be no doubt about it. Your father himself always referred to the losses he had sustained by Dunster's disappearance."

Ellinor covered her face with her hands. "God forgive us all!" she said, and relapsed into the old unbearable silence. Mr. Ness had undertaken to discuss her future plans with her, and he was obliged to go on.

"I am very dear child, I have known you since you were quite a little girl, you know—we must try not to give way to feeling"—he himself was finding that very quite quiet—"I don't think what is to be done. You will have the rent of this house; and we have a very good offer for it—a tenant who has lived seven years at a hundred and twenty pounds a year—"

"I will never let him have it!" said she, standing up suddenly, as if defying him.

"Not let Ford Bank! Why? I don't understand—I don't know—Ellinor, the rent of this house is all you will have to live on!"

"I can't help it, I can't leave this house. Oh, Mr. Ness, I can't leave this house!"

"My dear child, you shall not be hurried; I know how painfully all these things are coming upon you (and I wish I had never seen Corbet; with all my heart I do!)"—this was almost to himself, but she must have heard it, for she quivered all over—"but leave this house you must. You must eat, and the rent of this house must pay for your food; you must dress, and the rent of this house is sent to clothe you. I will gladly, thankfully have you to stay at the parsonage as long as ever you like; but, in fact, the negotiations for Mr. Osbaldistone, the gentleman who offers to take the house, are nearly completed—"

"Is my house!" said Ellinor, fiercely. "I know it is settled on me."

"No, my dear. It is held in trust for you by Sir Frank Hoister and Mr. Dunster: you to receive all moneys and benefits accruing from it:" he spoke gently, for he almost thought her head was turning: "and you remember you are not of age, and Mr. Johnson and I have full power."

Ellinor sat down, helpless.

"Leave me a little, Ness, at length. "You are very kind, I know; but you don't know all—I must and must stay more talking now," she added, faintly.

Mr. Ness bent over her and kissed her forehead, and went away without another word. He went to Miss Monro.

"Well! and how did you find her?" was her first question, after the greetings had passed between them. "It is really quite sad to see how she gives way: I speak to her, and speak to her, but I fear there is neglecting all her duties, and it does no good."

"She has had to bear a still further sorrow to-day," said Mr. Ness, "in the part of Mr. Johnson and myself I have a very painful duty to perform to you as well as to her. Mr. Wilkins has died insolvent. There is no use to say there is no hope of your ever receiving any of your annuity."

Miss Monro looked very blank. Many happy little visions faded away in those few moments; then she roused up, and said, "I am but forry; I have a good deal more of work in me left yet, think God! Insolvent! Do you mean he has left no money?"

"Not a shilling. The creditors may be thankful if they are fully paid."

"And Ellinor?"

"Ellinor will have the rent of this house, which is hers by right of her mother's settlement, to live on."

"How much will that be?"

"One hundred and twenty pounds."

Miss Monro looked into the form of a mouth prepared for whistling. Mr. Ness continued:

"She is at present unwilling enough to leave this house, poor girl. It is but natural; but she has no power in the matter, even were there any other course open to her. I can only say how glad, how honored I shall feel by as long a visit as you and she can be prevailed upon to pay me at the parsonage."

"Where is Mr. Corbet?" said Miss Monro.

"I do not know. After breaking off his engagement with Ellinor, a long letter—explanatory, as he called it; exculpatory, as I termed it. I wrote back, curtly enough, saying that I regretted the breaking off of an intercourse which had always been pleasant to me; but that he must be aware that, with my intimacy with the family of Ford Bank, it would be both awkward and unpleasant to all parties if he and I remained on our previous footing. Who is that going past the window, Miss Monro?"

Miss Monro went to the window. "Yes! I am thankful to see her on horseback again. It was Mr. Corbet's groom riding after them to ride."

"Poor Dixon! he will suffer too. His legacy can no more be paid than the others; and it is not many young indies who will be as content to have so old-fashioned a groom riding after them as Ellinor seems to be."

As soon as Mr. Ness had left, Miss Monro went to her room and wrote a long letter to some friends she had at the cathedral town of East Chester, where she had spent some happy years of her early life. Her thoughts had gone back to this time even while Mr. Ness had been speaking; for it was there her father had lived, and it was after that that her cares in search of subsistence had begun. But the recollections of the peaceful years spent there were stronger than the remembrance of the weeks of sorrow and care; and, while Ellinor's marriage had seemed a probable event, she had made many a little plan of returning to East Chester, and obtaining what daily teaching she could there meet with, and the friends to whom she was now writing had promised her their aid. She thought that, as Ellinor had to leave Ford Bank, a home at a distance might be more agreeable to her, and she went on to plan that they should live together, if possible, on her earnings and the small income that would be Ellinor's. Miss Monro loved her pupil so dearly that, if her own pleasure only were to be consulted, this projected life would be more agreeable to her than if Mr. Wilkins's legacy had set her in independence, with Ellinor married, and herself left alone, and interests in which her former governess had but little part.

As soon as Mr. Ness had left her, Ellinor rang, and startled the servant who answered the bell by her sudden sharp desire to have the horses at the door as soon as possible, and to tell Dixon to be ready to go out with her.

She felt that she must speak to him, and in her nervous state she wanted to be out on the free, broad common, where no one could notice or remark their talk. It was long since she had ridden, and much wonder was excited by the sudden movement in kitchen and stable-yard. But Dixon went gravely about his work of preparation, saying nothing.

The pretty pony had till they reached Monk's Heath, six or seven miles away from Hamley. Ellinor had previously determined that here she would talk over the plan Mr. Ness had proposed to her with Dixon, and he seemed to understand her without any words passing between them. When she reined in he rode out of his place, and met the gaze of her sad eyes with sympathetic, wistful silence.

"Dixon," said she, "they say I must leave Ford Bank."

"I've afeared on it, from all I've heered say o' the town since the master's death."

"Then you've heard—then you know—that papa has left nothing any money to pay debts, dear Dixon, you won't have your legacy, and I never thought of that before!"

"Never heed, never heed!" said he, eagerly; "I couldn't have touched it if it had been there, for the taking it would ha' seemed too like—" Blood-money he was going to say, but he stopped in time. She guessed the meaning, though not the word he would have used.

"No, not that," said she; "his will was dated years before. But oh, Dixon, what must I do? They will make me leave Ford Bank, I see. I shall be thrown upon the world to get bread."

"But you'll have the rent, ma'am, I reckon?" asked he, anxiously. "I've many a time heered it was said as it was settled on the missus first, and then on you."

"Oh yes, it is not that; but, you know, under the circumstances—"

"Ay!" said he, heavily. "It's been oftentimes on my mind, seeing; and I think there's ne'er a one as I don't know on of it."

"But how can I leave it?" Ellinor cried. "They may let it a hundred times over, but I'll be the shrubbery—oh! Dixon, I feel as if it was sure to be found out! Oh! Dixon. I can not bear any more disgrace on papa; I will kill me—and such a dreadful thing, too!"

Dixon's face fell into the lines of habitual pain that it had acquired every assumed of years whenever he was thinking or remembering any thing.

"They must ne'er ha' reason to speak ill of the master for his carriers," said he, "but Wilkinses have been respected in Hamley all my lifetime, and all my father's before me, and—surely, Miss Ellinor, there's ways and means of tying tenants up from alterations both in the house and out of it, and I'd beg the trustees, or whatever it's called, to be very particular. I'll say it you, and not have a thing touched either in the house, or the gardens, or the meadows, or the stables. Ah, Miss Ellinor, it's a weel thing, I say'd maybe keep me on I' the stables, and I could look after things a bit; and the Day o' Judgment will be a hard day, when all our secrets will be made known wi'out our having the trouble and the shame o' telling 'em. I'm getting rather tired o' this world, Miss Ellinor."

"Don't talk so," said Ellinor, tenderly. "I know how sad it is, but, oh, I cannot bear it shall make a friend when you're gone to advise me as you have done to-day. You're not feeling ill, Dixon, are you?" she continued, anxiously.

"No; I'm hearty enough, and likely for t' live. Faythee was eighty-one, and mother above the ground-sheet at eighty-four. It's cold as ever is got to feel so heavy; and as for that matter, so is yours, I'll be bound. And it's a comfort to think that I've been at home to look after my care of ours, for he were such a bright, handsome lad, with such a cheery face, as never would have known shame."

They rode on without much more speaking. Ellinor was silently planning for Dixon, and he, after caring as best he could for the future, was bringing up before his fancy the time, thirty years ago, when he had first entered the office of Mr. Wilkins's father as stable-boy, and pretty Molly, the scullery-maid, was his daily delight. Pretty Molly, who had turned in Hamley church-yard, and few living except Dixon could have gone straight to her grave.

CHAPTER XI.

In a few days Miss Monro obtained a most satisfactory reply to her letter of inquiries as to whether a daily governess could find employment in East Chester. For once the application seemed to have come just at the right time. The canons were most of them married men, and their families, those at least in the residence welcomed the idea of such instruction as Miss Monro could offer for their children. They could almost answer for their successors in office. This was a great step gained. Miss Monro, the daughter of the precentor, to this very cathedral, had considered advantageous to being engaged as a teacher by any wealthy tradesman there, but to be received into the canons' families was almost any capacity was like going home. Moreover, besides the empty honor of the thing, there were many small pieces of patronage in the gift of the chapter—such as a small house opening on to the Close, which had formerly belonged, ex officio, to the verger, but which was now vacant, and was offered to Miss Monro at a merely nominal rent. Ellinor had once more sunk into her old depressed passive state; Mr. Neal and Miss Monro, modest and undecided as they both were in general, had to fix and arrange every thing for her. Her great interest seemed to be in the old servant, Dixon, and her great pleasure to lie in seeing him, and talking over old times; so the two friends talked about their little knowing what a bitter stinging pain her "pleasure" was. In vain Ellinor tried to plan how they could live Dixon with them in East Chester. If he had only been a woman it would have been a feasible step; but they were only to keep one servant, and Dixon, capable as a valet as he was, would not do for that servant. All this was what passed through Ellinor's mind: it is still a question as to whether Dixon would have felt his love to his native place, with all its associations and remembrances, or his love for Ellinor the stronger. But he was not put to the proof; he was only told that he must leave, and, seeing Ellinor's extreme grief at the idea of her separation, he set himself to comfort her by every means in his power, reminding her, with tender choice of words, how necessary it was that he should remain on the spot, in Mr. Osbaldistone's service, in order to frustrate, by any small influence he might have, every project of alteration in the garden that contained the dreadful secret. He persisted in this view, though Ellinor repeatedly, with passionate anxiety, the more excited Mr. Johnson had taken, in drawing up the lease, to provide against any change or alteration being made in the present disposition of the house or grounds.

People in general were rather astonished at the engagement of Miss Wilkins to one of the Ford Bank furniture. Even Miss Monro was a little scandalized at this want of sentiment, although she said nothing about it; indeed justified the step, by telling every one how wisely Ellinor was acting, as the large handsome tables and chairs would be very much out of place and keeping with the small, oddly-shaped rooms of their future home in East Chester Close. Those few strong words were the result of self-preservation, it may almost be called, which impelled Ellinor to shake off, at any cost of present pain, the incubus of a fatal remembrance. She wanted to go into an unhaunted dwelling, in a free, unknown country—she felt as if this was her only chance of safety. Sometimes she thought her senses would not hold together till the time when all these arrangements were ended, as she did not regard any one save about her feelings, poor child!—to whom could she speak on the subject but to Dixon? and she did also allow them to herself. All she knew was that she was as nearly going mad as possible; and if she had heard that her father had killed her father's guilt. All this time she never cried or varied from her dull, passive demeanor. And they were blessed mercies for relief that she shed when Miss Monro, herself weeping bitterly, told her to put her head out of the pocket-handkerchief for at the next stage on the road they would catch the last glimpse of Hamley church-spire.

Late on October evening Ellinor had her first sight of East Chester Close, where she was to pass the remainder of her life. Miss Monro had been looking out forward between the Ford Bank and East Chester more than once, while Ellinor had remained as the parsonage; so she had not only the chance of proprietorship in the first view of the beautiful city, but something of the desire of hospitably welcoming Ellinor to their joint future home.

"Look! the fly must take us a long round because of our luggage; but behind these high old walls are the cathedral gardens. And high-pitched roof, with the clumps of stone-crop on the walls near it, is Canon Gibson's house, where the girls live. Ah, there is Hark, the great cathedral clock! How proud I used to be of its great boom when I was a child! I thought there was other church clocks in the town sounded so shrill and poor after that, which I considered quite superficial. There are rooks flying home to the elms in the Close. I wonder if they are the same that used to be there when I was a girl. They say the rook is a very long-lived bird, and I feel as if I could swear to the way they are cawing. Ay, you may smile, Ellinor, but I understand now those lines of Gray's you used to say so prettily:

> 'I fast the gales that from ye blow,
> A momentary youth bestow,
> And breathe a second spring.'

Now, dear, you must rest quiet. This flagged walk leads to our front-door; you see Ness and Dixon are there, and the housekeeper, and the Close, and the cathedral, and the lime-tree walk, and the rooks, and the rookery."

It was a mere slip of a house; the kitchen being wisely placed down to the front-door, and so reserving the pretty view for the little dining-room, out of which a glass-door opened into a small walled-in garden, which led out into an entrance into the Close. Up stairs, a bedroom to the front, which Miss Monro had taken for herself, because, she said, she liked old associations with the back of every house in the High Street, while Ellinor mounted to the pleasant chamber above the tiny drawing-room, built of which looked on to the vast and solemn cathedral, and the peaceful, dignified Close. East Chester Cathedral is Norman, with a low massive tower, a grand majestic nave, and a choir full of stately historic tombs. The whole city is in quiet keeping decorous as that the perpetual daily chants and hymns of praise seemed to sound far and wide over the lords of the houses. Ellinor became a regular attendant at all the morning and evening services. The sense of worship calmed and soothed her aching, weary heart, and to be punctual to the cathedral hours she roused herself exerted herself when probably nothing else would have been sufficient to this end.

By-and-by Miss Monro formed many acquaintances; she picked up, or was picked up by, old friends, and the descendants of old friends. The grave and kindly canons, whose children she taught, called upon her with their wives, and talked over the former deans and chapters, of whom she had had both a personal and traditional knowledge, as far back as the time when they talked about her silent, delicate-looking friend Miss Wilkins, and perhaps planned some little excursion out of their fruitful garden or bounteous stores which should make Miss Monro's table a little more tempting to one apparently so frail as Ellinor. The household was always spoken of as belonging to Miss Monro, the active and prominent person. Ellinor's name was referred to but by her words and meek demeanor as they passed her regular attendance at cathedral service: and when they heard of her constant visits to a certain parochial school, and of her being sometimes seen carrying a little covered basin to the cottages of the poor, they began to try and tempt her with more urgent words to accompany Miss Monro in her distribution of drinkings at their houses. The old dean, that courteous gentleman and good Christian, had greatly become impaired in health, and he would watch at the windows of his great vaulted library till he saw her emerge from the garden into the Close, and, after a certain interval, knock at her door, and then, she softly adjusting the mesures of her face to his. The time of his departure from East Chester became a great blank in her life, although she would never accept, or allow Miss Monro to accept, his repeated invitations to stay and pay her visit at the deanery-house. Indeed, having once tasted comparative peace again in East Chester Cathedral Close, it seemed as though she had a fear of ever again leaving out of those calm precincts. All Mr. Ness's invitations to visit him at his parsonage at Hamley were declined. Indeed, as it was welcomed at Miss Monro's on the occasion of his annual visit by every means in their power, she slept at one of the neighboring houses, and lived with his two friends, who made a yearly festivity to the best of their means in honor of his coming. Each of the cathedral clergy as were in residence; or, if they failed, condescending to the town clergy, Dissenting ministers and all, as the presents were so acceptable as those sent to them while Mr. Ness was with them; and from the dean, who would send a present from his splendid trout—all did their best to help them to give a welcome to the only visitor they ever had. The only visitor they ever had, for as to the stately gentry knew. There was one visitor who came as often as his master could give him a holiday long enough to admit of his coming such a distant a place; but few knew of his being a guest at Miss Monro's, though his welcome there was not less cordial than that of Mr. Ness or Dixon. Ellinor had convinced him that he could give her no greater pleasure at any time than by coming over to East Chester for a visit. East Chester. Whenever he came they were together the greater part of every day: she taking him hither and thither to see all the sights that she thought would interest or please him; but they spoke very little to each other during all this companionship. Dixon was happier and more to say to him. She questioned him right and left whenever Ellinor was out of the room. He learned that the house at Ford Bank was splendidly furnished, and no money spared on the garden; that the wife was a fine lady, and very well married; that Brown had succeeded to Jones in the haberdasher's shop. Then she hesitated a little, and asked after the new curate.

"I suppose Mr. Corbet never comes to the parsonage now?"

"No, not he. I don't think as how Mr. Ness would have him; but they write letters to each other by times. Old Job—you'll recollect old Job, ma'am, the shepherd—he and Mr. Ness sat waited in the parlor when there was company—did say as one day he heered them speaking about Mr. Corbet's going to live at the parsonage now—one of them as goes about at asize-time, and speaks in a wig."

"A barrister, you mean," said Miss Monro.

"Ay; and he's something more than that, though I can't rightly remember what."

Ellinor could not help listening. They had the Times lent to them on the second day after publication by one of their friends in the Close, and Ellinor, in reading it, had seen that there were otherwise engaged, always turned with trembling hands and a beating heart to the reports of the various Courts of Law. In them she found—at first rarely—the name she sought for, the name she dwelt upon as if every letter were a study. Mr. Losh and Mr. Duncombe appeared for the plaintiff, Mr. Smythe and Mr. Corbet for the defendant. By-and-by that very name appeared more frequently, and generally took precedence of the other, somewhat as Corbet v. Corbet for the defendant. Then the two names were repeated at full length, as if his words were accounted weighty; and by-and-by she saw that he had been appointed a Queen's Counsel. And this was all she ever heard or saw of him; his once-familiar name never passed her lips except in hurried whispers to Dixon when he came to stay with them. Ellinor had had no idea when she had parted from Mr. Corbet how much she separated between them was henceforward to be, so much seemed left unfinished, unexplained. It was very difficult at all times to herself of the habit of constant mental reference to him; and for many a long year she kept thinking that surely some kind fortune would bring them together again, and all this heartsickness and melancholy estrangement from each other would then seem to both only as an ugly dream that had passed away in the morning light.

The dean was an old man, but there was a canon who was older still, and whose death had been expected by many, and speculated upon by some, any time for ten years. Canon Holdsworth was too old to show active kindness to any one; the good dean's life was full of thoughtful and benevolent deeds. But he was taken and the other left. Ellinor looked out as the vacant canonry with fearful eyes: he lost thing at night, the first in the morning. But it is pretty nearly the same with church dignitaries as with kings: the dean is dead, live the dean! A clergyman from a distant county was appointed, and all the Close was astir to know what kind of neighbor was coming to settle him. Luckily he came in at the tag-end of one of the noble families in the peerage; so, at any rate, all his future associates could look with tolerable certainty that he was forty-two years of age, married, and with eight daughters and one son. The dean, formerly so quiet and sedate a dwelling of the one old man, was now to be filled with noise and merriment. Iron carriage-weights were placed before three windows, evidently to be the nursery. In the summer publicity of open windows and doors the sound of the busy occupants was perpetually heard all over the Close; and by-and-by wagon-loads of furniture and carriage-loads of people began to arrive. Evidently the canon nor Elliston by themselves of sufficient importance or station to call on the new-comers, but they were as well accustomed as the daughters of the family to if they had been in daily intercourse; they knew that the eldest Miss Beauchamp was seventeen, and very pretty, only one shoulder was higher than the other; that she was dootingly fond of dancing, and had been at a ball—a little ball, it is not much if her mamma was by, and never opened her lips at all if the dean was in the room; that she was very cheerfully civil—nay, and was supposed to know all the governess could teach her, and to have private lessons in French and accomplishments from her father; and so on down to the little boy at the preparatory school and the baby girl in arms. Moreover, Miss Monro, who, she said, could have stood an examination as to the number of servants at the deanery, their division of work, and the hours of their meals, generally a very well-behaved, haughty-looking lundy made appearance as the Close, and in the dean's pew. She was said to be the wife of the new canon's brother, or his brother, General Beauchamp, come to East Chester to reside for the necessary time before her marriage, which was to be performed in the cathedral by her uncle, the new dignitary. But as callers at the deanery did not see this beautiful bride-elect, or the Beauchamps generally, as yet fallen into habits of intimacy with any of their new acquaintances, very little was known of the circumstances of this approaching wedding beyond the particulars given above.

Ellinor and Miss Monro sat at their drawing-room window, partly screened by the muslin curtains, watching the busy preparations for the marriage, which was to take place in the noon. All morning long hampers of fruit and flowers, boxes from the railway—for by this time East Chester had left its stage-coach associations—hired assistants, kept passing backward and forward in the busy Close. Toward afternoon the bustle subsided, the scaffolding was taken away, the terials for the next day's feast carried out of sight. It was to be concluded that the bridesmaid's wreaths and dressing of the cathedral had been helped by the merry multitude of cousins, and that the servants were arranging the dinner for the day of rejoicing for the morrow. So Miss Monro had settled it, discussing every detail and every probability as though she were a chief actor, Ellinor only a distant, uninterested spectator of the coming event. Ellinor was a little tired, and now that there was nothing more interesting going on she had leaned back to her sewing, when she was startled by Miss Monro's exclamation:

"Look, look! there are two gentlemen coming along the lime-tree walk: it must be the bridegroom and his friend." Out of much sympathy and some curiosity Ellinor bent forward, and saw just emerging from the shadow of the trees on to the full afternoon sun the pavement the younger taller man, and talking eagerly. The other gentleman was doubtless the bridegroom. Ellinor sat with suspended breath, her anxious heart did not believe her words. Even before the bright beauty at the deanery looked out of the green door-way into the cathedral precincts, and blushed, and smiled, and kissed her hand; a gesture replied to by Mr. Corbet with much expressiveness, for the other man only took off his hat, almost as if he saw her there for the first time. Ellinor's greedy eyes watched him from the shade of the window, as he descended, unheeding Miss Monro's eager, incoherent sentences in turn entreating, apologizing, comforting, and upbraiding. She slowly turned her painful eyes upon Miss Monro's face, and moved her lips without a sound being heard, and fainted dead away. In all her life she had never done it before, and when she came round she was not like herself: in all probability the persistence and willfulness she, who was usually so meek and docile, showed during the next twenty-four hours was the consequence of fever. She resolved to be present at the wedding; numbers were going; she would be unseen, unnoticed in the crowd. In her perverse befell, as it usually and neither the tears nor the prayers of Miss Monro could keep her back. She gave no reason for this determination of hers; indeed, in all probability she had none to give; so there was no arguing the point with her; she was inflexible to entreaty, and no one had any authority over her except, perhaps, distant Mr. Ness. Miss Monro had all sorts of forebodings as to the possible scenes that might come to pass. But all went on as quietly as though the fullest sympathy prevailed every individual of the great numbers assembled. No one guessed that the muffled veiled figure, sitting in the shadow behind some of the great pillars, was that of one who had once hoped to stand at the altar with the same bridegroom as he now cast such tender looks at the beautiful bride, her veil white and fairy-like, Ellinor's black and shrouding as that of an eremite.

Already Mr. Corbet's name was known through the country as that of a great lawyer; people discussed his rise in the profession, so early and wide; and the well-informed in legal gossip spoke of him as sure to be offered a judgeship the next vacancy. He was, though quite young, and middle-aged, and somewhat gray, divided attention and remark with his lovely bride and her pretty train in the crowded cathedral. Many more need not have feared for Ellinor; she saw and heard all things as in a mist—a dream; as something that had no real life in it. Once she could waken up to a reality of brightness in which her youth, and the hopes of her youth, should be restored, and all these intervening years of heaviness and woe should be revealed as nothing but the nightmare of a night. She sat motionless enough, still and silent, as East Monro left her watching her as intently as a keeper watches a madman, and with the same purpose—to prevent any outburst, from fear of the consequences if such restraint be needed. When all was over—when the principal persons in the procession had filed into the vestry to sign their names; when the swarm of towns-people were going out as quickly as their individual interests, or the restraints of the sacred edifice permitted; when the great chords of the "Wedding March" changed and, from the organ, and the bells pealed overhead, Ellinor laid her hand in Miss Monro's. "Take me home," she said, very softly. And Miss Monro led her home as one leads the blind.

GREAT UNION MEETING AT EXETER HALL.

WE publish on page 173 an illustration of the Great Union Meeting at Exeter Hall, which was held at Exeter Hall, London, England, on 29th January last. It was one of the largest and most enthusiastic meetings ever held in London. The reporter of the Illustrated News is enthusiastic about the immense crowds that assembled. No less than seven such meetings were formed of people who could not get into the building. He goes on to say:

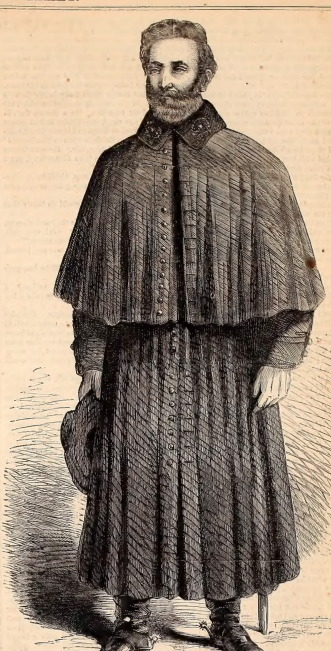
If it had been possible, after watching the reception given to the first sentences from the chairman, the Rev. Dr. Lewis, to note the tone and temper of the excluded multitude, it was clearly impossible to do so when he referred in a perfectly dispassionate manner to those who wished to see America divided into two confederacies. He was interrupted by a general voice that cried out "Immediation and Union!" and then, as if that phrase had been a kind of electric shock that went to every heart, there broke forth the most tremendous outburst of popular enthusiasm I have ever known our fellow-subjects. It could not stop, but went on and on, the whole audience having leaped to their feet as if to stamp the foundations of the building, having apparently only waited for some such signal to excite the loudest cheers. The shouts of applause were repeated, enthusiasm with which they overflowed. This incident told all that the reporter had the slightest desire to know as to the feelings and views of the meeting. When the facts were to more or less extent misrepresented. When the chairman happened to use the words "Mr. Lincoln's position," again the tumultuous response arose.

Another incident of the meeting was interesting. Mr. Lewis, in the course of his impassioned speech, which, however, was not distinctly heard, stopped to announce that the news of the defeat of the rebels at Vicksburg and Memphis holding a similar meeting; and he proposed, to the great amusement of the audience, "Three cheers for Grant," saying, "We are for emancipation and the Union; what are you?" Exactly the same thing was proposed at a later hour with regard to Sirsod, where, also, an enormous meeting was assembled. Mr. Lewis's speech, while, with those arising from the constant re-echoing of the cheers from the two other meetings below and outside, gave quite a tone to the evening.

He adds:

Concluding the crowning speech of the evening was Mr. Newman Hall's. His voice alone of all the speakers was more than ordinarily powerful, and it possesses great. And as he was perhaps the most highly-finished and certainly the most practiced speaker of the evening, we quote the generation of his speech, with its magnificent perorative passage, where he says of himself:

That "God has made of one blood all nations to dwell on the face of the earth" (Cheers); that it is a sin to be a rebel to God and to rebel against Him (Hear, hear) then for a man to hunt his brother for his own profit (Loud cheers); that it is an abomination to expose man and woman to the auction block, to tear the husband and head them over to the highest bidder as you would cattle (Cheering); that it is an abomination to sell a woman the rights of chastity and maternity (Hear); that it is an abomination to sell a child from its mother's breast; that no rights which a white man need respect (Hear, hear); that it is an abomination to deny a human being, whether she be a Hungarian Countess or an African slave (Hear); that it is an abomination to make God's Bible a reference of men fighting in order to commit those abominations (Cheers); and, lastly, as the recognition of an empire inviolate reception of it embounder, that the tyranny of free Britain builds the very idea of such an indignity being offered to the Royal Lady we delight to venerate as our her yare, maternally, and widowed hand, which wields only the scepter of love over the free, should not be contaminated by the kiss of any representative of so foul a conspiracy against humanity and God.



We should despair of any attempt to give our readers an adequate impression of the feeling that existed for Queen or against slavery by the Exeter Hall meeting.

THE REBEL GENERAL STONEWALL JACKSON.—FROM A LATE DRAWING BY MR. VIZETELLY.—(SEE PAGE 174.)

THE WRATH OF MISTRESS ELIZABETH GWYNNE.

IN the days when King George III. was still a blooming young prince, the family of the Gwynnes, after growing less and less numerous for several generations, came to be represented by two brothers. The elder ruled, as his ancestors ruled before him, in the ancestral manor. The younger adopted the traditionary career of the cadets of his house, and served in the army. Both married very suitable helpmates. The soldier lived long enough to speed the last sigh of his wife, and welcome the first smile of his son, and was then killed by a fall from his horse. The Squire's lady presented him with an heir, and five years afterward with a daughter, and then died. The widower was left in his home to train and teach his own children and the child of his dead brother.

The Squire was haughty and passionate, but withal a just man. He clung to his opinions with all the tenacity of an Englishman, and, above all, of an English Tory. He hated a Whig, and he hated a Frenchman. With these exceptions, it might be said that he loved his neighbor. He was condescendingly affable to my Lord Marquess of the adjoining acres, as it became a Gwynne to be to a man who dated his rank not even from the comparatively ancient period of Hastings, but merely from the more recent invasion of Tertiny. He was very friendly to the Vicar, and loved the toast of "Church and King." He was equitable in his dealings with his tenants, and "ne'er forgot the poor." He swore at his grooms, but they none of them left him. He was as fond of his nephew as of his own son and daughter, and children have rarely had a fonder father.

So matters went on quietly at Gwynne, till gray hairs began to grow on the head of the Squire (though it is almost an anachronism to talk of gray hairs in days of powder) and down to sprout on the cheeks of his boys. His own son Horace went to Christchurch, and was then sent to Paris. The young Squire was committed to the care of a great lady who had known the old Squire at St. James's. It was hoped that under the auspices of Madame la Duchesse de Hautenbus Mr. Horace Gwynne would receive that mysterious coat of French polish which could only be administered at the Court of Maria Theresa's beautiful daughter. For a time the Squire had nothing to complain of. The Duchess wrote that the young Englishman had the true cir. He had been noticed at the Trianon. He had made a success. Mr. Horace himself thought Paris a charming place. He had performed in a private play as a Milord Anglais, in which a Royal Personage had appeared as a Griselte Française. He was very well seen. Nevertheless this was not altogether pleasant to the Squire. He had the notions of a Roman on the subject of the stage, and would never have acknowledged the celebrated comedian of his name as a kinswoman, even if she had honestly raised herself to fame by her acting, and not by—by other means. He did not like the idea of his boy's capering before an audience of grinning Frenchmen, though a Queen had capered at his side. Indeed, was it well for the queen so to occupy her most Christian Majesty's leisure? All this was not quite satisfactory. But worse news followed. Mr. Horace was seen no more at the little Trianon. Madame de Hautenbus was compelled to ignore him. He had imbibed the strangest ideas, and was associating with the most unnoticeable people. He openly professed sympathy with the third estate. Less openly he became skeptical as to the advantages of monarchy, and, so far from preserving the principles of the paternal toast in a strange land, he was suspected of being acquainted with men who thought as little of Church as of King. At last a letter arrived from him in which he avowed himself an Atheist. It was a bitter trial to the Squire, but he did not flinch from his duty. He forbade the name of his son to be mentioned in his hearing. The estates of Gwynne would descend to the male heir, only in default of direct testamentary disposition on the part of the head of the house. The Squire could leave the property away from his unworthy son if he so willed. No Gwynne had made a will for many generations. Whether the Squire had broken the custom no one knew.

The Squire had lost his heir, but he was not childless. He had still his nephew to ride with him to cover, and discuss the stirring history of the times over his not immoderate cups. And Harry Gwynne was a bold and merry lad, frank and outspoken, modest and true, and in all respects such as might comfort a fatherly old uncle's heart. Harry and his uncle were great friends, but not such friends as were the Squire and his daughter.

Mistress Elizabeth Gwynne, at nineteen years of age, was said to have been particularly beautiful. I have described the features of the woman, and from them may be guessed the loveliness of the girl. She was very beautiful, and very clever; but her temper was high and passionate. The visitor, who should see her unruffled and serene, might deem it impossible for so gentle a being to transcend the ordinary limits of the anger of her sex. But on the comparatively rare occasions when her passion mastered her, her paroxysms of rage were fearful. Few cared to encounter her, and none to offer opposition. The presence of her father was the only influence which stilled her wrath. When her father approached her love conquered her rage, and she was speedily calmed.

This untamable damsel Harry Gwynne had worshiped with an untiring constancy ever since he had been old enough to hold any opinions at all. He was a year or two older than his mistress, but from the days when they both wore frocks she had been, in imperial sense, the mistress, and he the slave. He had played with her, and ridden with her, and quarreled with her, and obeyed her. He had broken-in a mare for her; he had planted an Italian garden for her; he had acted in all things as one whose existence was ordained for her convenience. All this she had received as her due. She admitted to herself, if ever she thought about the matter, that she was very fond of her cousin; but she was not, on that account, disposed to play the meek maiden, waiting modestly for the kerchief of the sultan. She used her slave's services with magnificent indifference, and rewarded him sometimes with a smile, and sometimes with a fit of rage.

When no more letters came from Paris, and the Squire began to act as though he had no son, Mistress Bessie evidently deemed herself of increased importance. She had never pretended any love for the disinherited Horace. His airs and graces annoyed her. He could say prettier things than Harry, and he danced a minuet better than—hardly, at least, better than Harry, for that more rustic gentleman could not dance at all. But he had once craned at a hedge; and, on the whole, his sister did not regret his loss. She began to esteem herself the heiress of Gwynne. Papa would do something for Harry, of course, independently of the fortune left by Harry's mother; but she would be the great lady.

The Squire said not a word of his intentions, but the greater the gulf between him and his son, the tighter appeared the bond that united him to his nephew; and the fonder he grew of his nephew, the oftener did his daughter wax wroth with her cousin, and indeed with every one else. She was but twenty years old, but she was a notorious termagant; and the old housekeeper at the manor surmised that she would be the last of her branch of the house, for no one would woo so wild a bride—no one, that is, but Master Harry, and she seemed daily less inclined to stoop to the faithful cousin. Unless some terrible lesson should tame her, she would live a cheerless life.

The oftener this willful lady was told to be a good child the more pertinaciously she asserted her independence. Poor Harry still worshiped, but he received more frowns than smiles for his pains. One day when he was more than ordinarily definite and demonstrative in his professions of attachment, his mistress stamped her little foot and vowed she hated him—that her father gave too much love to the nephew and too little to his child, and that so far from having any intention of surrendering her heart, she regarded her suitor as the chief bar to her earthly happiness. Of course this was not true. Of course she loved every hair on the head of her yellow-pated cousin. But the statements of young ladies are as mysterious as the dispatches of diplomatists. They use language to conceal their thoughts, though happily their art is not always skillful enough to conceal itself. But whether it was or was not true, it made Harry very miserable. He was in a dilemma. If he was cold to his uncle, his uncle looked pained. If he was not cold to his uncle, he was accused of winning away a father's love from the personage whom, more than any other, he desired to encircle with all love. On the whole, the household was a stormy one; but now and then a patch of blue sky smiled through the clouds. Bessie forgot her grievances, and spent a merry day with her old play-fellow. These intervals were, however, sorrowfully rare.

And now the Squire fell ill. The career of his son had afflicted him more than had been supposed. He was struck with paralysis, and lost the use of his lower limbs. Stretched in his bed or on a couch, he was dependent on others for his necessities and for his pleasures. Harry and his cousin vied with one another in unwearied attention, but a state of things which ought to have healed all breaches seemed to widen the gulf between them. When the Squire called for Harry to read him the Gazette, or to write a letter to the bailiff, the fair Bessie sulked over her harpsichord. And if, perchance, the Squire said, "Bessie, will you write as I dictate?" or, "Bessie, I am going to be lifted into the coach, and to be driven to Minchester," it was, "Papa, won't Harry do it better?" or, "Papa, Harry knows all about the crops, and will be a more amusing companion."

These observations were, unlike some others of the young lady's, perfectly true; and the Squire was gradually and unconsciously beginning to act upon them. His great affliction made it hard for him to bear with the caprices of his daughter, and day after day he became less able to endure Harry out of his sight. He was growing prematurely old and prematurely peevish, and his exactions taxed all the patience of his dutiful nephew.

Miss Bessie's temper, too, grew worse instead of better. Once she had even flown into a passion before her crippled father, and had not been calmed by his appealing look. She remembered the day when she was all in all to her parent, and now she was as nothing. Nor were there wanting those evil influences of gossip and flattery which are never wanting in a court or in a large household. There were voices which whispered, "Madam, look out for the estate, the Squire's health is fast failing. Will you like to leave the manor, or live in it as Master Harry's guest? For to Master Harry the Squire will assuredly leave it."

At this Mistress Elizabeth Gwynne quite forgot that she desired nothing better than to stay at Gwynne all her life, with this treacherous Harry, as his wife, and forgot also her firm faith that his wishes entirely agreed with her own. She only remembered that she was the daughter of the elder branch; that there was a suspicion that she was to be disinherited; that—that—indeed she was not very clear what. But enough had been said to rouse all her rage, and from that day the notion of a will never failed to raise the devil at her heart.

She and her cousin dined daily in her father's own study. It was the only occasion on which the three were long together. On a certain day, in the course of the meal, the Squire looked across the table contrived to fasten to his couch, and said:

"Harry, lad, has Griffiths gone to Minchester?"

"He went at ten o'clock, Sir. He rode Brown Hanover. He wanted to have Strawberry, but I know she isn't up to his—"

"Papa, what have you sent Griffiths to Minchester for? You know I was going to ride over this afternoon."

"Something that Griffiths could do better than you, my Bessie."

There was a significant look in the invalid's eyes.

"Harry, what did he go for? Oh! very well. If you won't tell me, pray keep your secret!"

And she cooked her spleen. It was not, indeed, a very merry meal.

"Hannah, do you know why Griffiths has gone to Minchester?"

"Griffiths, ma'am? Minchester, ma'am? I think I heard him say he was going to take a letter to Mr. Deeds."

Now Deeds was the family lawyer. The plot was out. The Squire was going to make a will in Harry's favor. The despised daughter of the house sat brooding in her own room, and her face grew very dark. The groom brought round her mare, but she said she had changed her mind. She would not ride that day.

Late in the afternoon she saw Mr. Deeds and a clerk drive up the avenue in a chaise. She heard them ushered into her father's bedroom. The Squire had felt weaker than usual, and had retired to his room immediately after his mid-day meal. The noise of the footsteps on the marble, and the shutting of the doors, was as oil on fire. Elizabeth Gwynne was all but in the last stage of passion. She chafed and fumed in her own room till suspense became unbearable. She rang a hand-bell that summoned a maid, and sent a message.

"Tell some of the people to ask Mr. Harry if he will speak with me immediately."

Presently the girl returned.

"Mr. Harry was busy with the Squire and could not come." Had it come to this? Was she, the once-loved daughter, to remain silent in her room, while her natural father was signing away her patrimony to her cousin? Had not she a right to be with her father? He was doing something important or he would not have sent for Deeds. It was her plain duty to be with him.

"He shall not do it!—he shall not do it!" she muttered between her teeth, and in a violent paroxysm of passion stalked along the corridor to her father's rooms. As she crossed the hall she met Deeds and his acolyte, conducted by a lackey, on their way to their chaise. The old lawyer bowed low.

"Hypocrite!" she hissed, and passed on.

She flung open her father's door. When all motion had become irksome to him he had taken up his quarters in what was called the state bedroom on the ground-floor. Queen Anne had passed a night at Gwynne, and the room had been sumptuously furnished for her. On the lofty bed, rich with curious needle-work, and canopied by dingy plumes, lay the old chief of his clan, helpless and wan. A fire burned loweringly on the cunning smith's work that lay at the bottom of the huge fire-place, and threw a changeful light on the high-backed chairs, the black cabinets, the heavy hangings, and the painted ceiling of the great gloomy room. At the side of the bed stood a table littered with pens and writing materials. An extinguished taper still poisoned the air. At the foot of the bed stood Harry, holding in his hand a clean, new parchment document, folded, tied, and sealed.

All her fears were then realized. She was the despised and disinherited dependent. There lay the father who had abandoned her. There stood the scheming villain who had ousted her from her own. Her cousin stood still for an instant, startled by her sudden appearance, and awed by the white passion of her face. She strode to where he stood, snatched the packet from his hand, and flung it into the glowing coals. Ere her cousin had recovered from the shock she had thrust the vellum deep into the great fire. He started forward to rescue his charge before it was consumed, but she stood with outstretched arm before the grate, and shrieked in a voice hoarse with rage—"Robber! robber! robber! Would you rob me of my birthright? You have stolen my father's love! Would you steal my inheritance too? Stand back, Sir; you shall not touch it! My father never meant to do it. He does not know what you have made him do—he always loved me—he never would—" She looked up at her father as she spoke; and Harry, who had stood dumb beneath her torrent of abuse, and down whose cheeks two hot tears of gentle pity for her, and utter anguish for self, were slowly trickling—Harry looked round at the Squire too. He was sitting up in his bed; his arms were stretched out, and his hands were clasping and unclasping themselves in the air, while his lips mumbled in vain, and his eyes seemed to burn to speak. So he sat for a minute, his children rushing to his side and seizing his hands. It seemed as though his brow would crack in the agony of desire to speak. For a moment the eyes shone with a brighter lustre in the flickering flame of the burning packet, his mouth made a convulsive effort to form a word, and he fell heavily back on his pillow, dead.

There was an awful silence for a space, and then Elizabeth burst forth in a wail of sorrow and remorse. She had killed her father. She had better die to join him.

"Kill me, kill me, Harry!" she shrieked. But the utter desolation of grief that was expressed in her cousin's face silenced her own sobs. Kneeling down by the side of the bed she hid her head in her hands, and was still.

Then came doctors and domestics. "Another stroke!" "Poor Squire; and only five-and-forty." "And how did Miss Gwynne get to her father's room?" "Did he know her before he died?"

All these things were said as she was borne in a dull stupor to her room. Harry alone knew the truth. He saw her laid on her bed and in the custody of her women, and then retired to his own grief and the many duties he had to perform.

In the morning the old housekeeper came to him and brought tidings of her lady. Elizabeth had slept a little in the night, and was calm now. She wished to see her cousin. She received him with great gentleness, and as one who had had her life-lesson. She knew that no apology could atone for what she had said and done. She trusted her grief would be sufficient punishment. She could not insult her cousin in his own home with her presence after what had occurred. Immediately after the funeral she should leave Gwynne. Mrs. Griffiths had promised to go with her. She had enough to maintain her in decent respectability from what her mother had left her for pocket-money. She should not require much, for she should not live long.

"And, Harry," she added, "when you hear that I am dead, will you let me be buried with papa in our own church-yard?" She looked him tearfully in the face.

"O Bessie, Bessie!" he broke out; "you go away!—you leave Gwynne! It is I that must go! It is yours—it is all yours! The will left it all to you. O Bessie! How could you—how could you—?" But he stopped in the middle of his reproach. "Bessie, I am come to bid you good-by. You would not have me stay! It is better for us to part."

I can not chronicle the precise words in which Miss Gwynne, as soon as she was satisfied that she was mistress, and not guest, invited her cousin to stay. But he did stay. It was perhaps undignified in him; he had surely had warning. But he did stay. He staid some half a century longer; and there is no record in the family of his wife ever having flown in a rage with her lord.

When Mr. Deeds had driven over from Minchester he had brought over the draft of a will, unsigned, leaving the whole estate to Elizabeth. So he had been ordered; but he strongly deprecated the notion of the Squire's disinheriting his son for what he termed the errors of youth. He had some stormy discussion with his client, and at last left the house, leaving the will yet unsigned, and declaring that, if Mr. Gwynne was determined, some other lawyer must be employed to do the work. The Squire immediately signed the will that was afterward burned, and Harry's was the only evidence that could secure the property to his cousin.

Before, however, any difficulty could arise as to the succession, news arrived at Gwynne that Horace had been killed in a duel. He had married a French lady, who bore him no children, and who, at his death, came to reside in London, and was said to have made a great impression at Carlton House.

NEGROES AS SOLDIERS.

We devote pages 161, 168, and 169 to illustrations of the negroes as soldiers. So much ignorant prejudice is still entertained in many parts of the North to the employment of colored troops that it is due to the country that the capacity of the negro to drill and fight can not be too strongly insisted upon.

The picture on page 161 represents the negro learning the use of the Minié rifle. The drill masters in the Department of the South report that the negroes in the South Carolina regiments evince great aptitude at learning the manual of arms. They are more docile than white recruits, and when once they have mastered a movement they retain the knowledge perfectly. Similar testimony is borne by officers in the West. One of them predicts that with proper drill and training the negroes will be the steadiest rank and file in the world.

With regard to their fighting qualities we can not do better than reproduce the following extracts. The first is from a letter to the New York Times, describing the battle, or rather the skirmish of Island Mounds, where a detachment of the First Kansas Colored Volunteers attacked and routed a band of rebels. He says:

> The detachment under Gardner was attacked by the foe, who swept down like a whirlwind upon it. One volley was fired in concert, which emptied several saddles, and then this devoted body was separated by the force of that sweeping charge. The fight thus became a hand to hand encounter of one man to six. The rebels were mostly armed with shot-guns, revolvers, and sabres, our men with the Austrian rifle and sabre-bayonet. The latter is a fearful weapon, and did terrible execution in the hands of the muscular blacks. Six-Killer, the leader of the Cherokee negroes, fell with six wounds after shooting two men, bayoneting a third, and laying a fourth hors du combat with the butt of his gun. Another one, badly wounded, Sergeant Ed. Lowrey, was attacked by three men; he had discharged his rifle, and had no time to load again, when they fell upon him with revolver and sabre. He was then badly hurt with a shot-gun wound. One man demanded his surrender, to which the reply was a stunning blow from the butt of the rifle, knocking him off his horse. The negro, when approached, had his sabre-bayonet in hand, about to fix it on his gun. The prostrate man got a crashing blow from it on the skull as he fell, and then, as the other charged, the bayonet was used with effect on the nearest horse, and the butt of the gun on the next man.

> Captain Crew, retaining his position at the head of the few men who keep together, retreated with his face to the enemy, firing his revolver as he did so. He fell with a terrible wound in the groin, but again rose and retreated. Surrounded by half a dozen of the foe, he was ordered to surrender. "Never!" he shouted, at the same time calling to the half dozen negroes around him to die rather than give up. He then fell dead with a bullet in his heart. His body was instantly rifled of revolver and watch, though his purse was not found. Five minutes afterward the rebel who took the watch was killed by one of the negroes, who again took the watch from him and brought it into camp.

> So ended the battle of Island Mounds, which, though commenced through the rash and impetuous daring of the officers, yet, under most unfavorable circumstances, resulted in a complete victory to the negro regiment.
> What I narrate I saw myself, and having witnessed several engagements since this rebellion commenced, I know what fighting amounts to. H.

The other extract is from the official report of Colonel Higginson of the First South Carolina Volunteers (colored), describing an expedition into the interior undertaken by him:

> On board Steamer "Ben Deford," Sunday, Feb. 1, 1863.
> Brigadier-General Saxton, Military Governor, etc.:
> General,—I have the honor to report the safe return of the expedition under my command, consisting of 462 officers and men of the First Regiment of South Carolina Volunteers, who left Beaufort on January 23, on board the steamers John Adams, Planter, and Ben Deford.
> The expedition has carried the regimental flag and the President's Proclamation far into the interior of Georgia and Florida. The men have been repeatedly under fire; have had infantry, cavalry, and even artillery arranged against them, and have, in every instance, come off not only with unblemished honor, but with undisputed triumph. At Township, Florida, a detachment of the expedition fought a cavalry company which met us unexpectedly on a midnight march through pine woods, and which completely surrounded us. They were beaten off with a loss on our part of one man killed and seven wounded, while the opposing party admits twelve men killed (including Lieutenant Jones, in command of the company), besides many wounded. So complete was our victory that the enemy scattered, hid in the woods all night, not returning to his camp, which was five miles distant, until noon next day—a fact which was unfortunately unknown until too late to follow up our advantage. Had I listened to the urgent appeals of my men, and pressed the flying enemy, we could have destroyed his camp; but in view of the darkness, his uncertain numbers, and swifter motions, with your injunctions of caution, I judged it better to rest satisfied with the victory already gained.

> Nobody knows any thing about these men who has not seen them in battle. I find that I myself knew nothing. There is a fiery energy about them beyond any thing of which I have ever read, unless it be the French Zouaves. It requires the strictest discipline to hold them in hand. During our first attack on the river, before I got them all penned below, they crowded at the open ends of the steamer, loading and firing with inconceivable rapidity, and shouting to each other, "Never give it up!"

THE REBEL GENERAL LEE.

We publish on page 173 a portrait of the rebel General Robert E. Lee, commanding the rebel army on the Rappahannock. It is from a drawing recently made by Mr. Vizetelly, the correspondent of the London Illustrated News, and, as will be seen, differs very materially from the portraits which are current at the North, which are taken from old photographs made before the war.

Robert E. Lee was born in Virginia about the year 1808. He entered West Point, where he received the usual military education at the cost of the Government of the United States. He graduated honorably in 1829, and received an appointment as Second Lieutenant of Engineers. For eighteen years he served in the army, drawing the usual pay from the Government, and rising to the rank of Major and Lieutenant-Colonel of Cavalry. In the Mexican war he was further honored by a brevet of Colonel, and on the appointment of Albert S. Johnston to the command of the Utah expedition, Lee succeeded him in command of the Second Cavalry. After filling this honorable and agreeable post in the military service of his country for several years, he crowned his career by deserting his flag at the moment of his country's sorest need. When the Richmond politicians passed what they called an Ordinance of Secession, Robert E. Lee threw up his commission, and accepted the rank of General in the rebel army.

In Mexico Lee had been Chief of General Scott's Staff, and won high praise for his skill. It was a common remark in our army, before the war, that "Bob Lee" was the ablest strategist we had. His first performances in the rebel army did not confirm his reputation: he was eclipsed for a time by both Beauregard and Johnston. After the latter was wounded, however, at Fair Oaks, Lee took the whole command of the rebel army in Virginia, and directed its operations during the seven days' battles before Richmond. He likewise led the rebels into Maryland, and commanded them at Antietam, and subsequently at Fredericksburg. At present he stands very high in their esteem.

THE REBEL GENERAL STONEWALL JACKSON.

We publish on page 173 a portrait of the famous rebel General Thomas Jefferson Jackson, better known as Stonewall Jackson, from a recent drawing by Mr. Vizetelly of the London Illustrated News.

Thomas J. Jackson was born in Virginia about the year 1825, and is consequently about thirty-nine years of age. He graduated at West Point in 1846, and in the following year accompanied Magruder's battery to Mexico. At Contreras and Churubusco he distinguished himself so highly on the field that he was brevetted Captain for gallantry. At Chapultepec he again won laurels, and was brevetted Major for gallant and meritorious conduct. On his return from Mexico he was for some time in command at Fort Hamilton; but in 1842 he resigned his rank. At the outbreak of the rebellion Major Jackson was one of those Southerners who were greatly embarrassed to discover the true line of their duty. He had married a Northern wife, was an honorable and conscientious man, and long hesitated what course to pursue. It is stated that his father-in-law, a Northern clergyman, visited him, and urged him to remain faithful to his country and his flag. They spent several hours in prayer together, and Jackson confessed that the struggle was sore. But finally the pernicious doctrine of State Rights, which Jackson, like so many other gallant Southrons, had imbibed early in life, won the day: "I must go with Virginia!" he cried, and plunged headlong into the vortex of treason.

As a rebel officer he has been energetic, lucky, and skillful. At Bull Run he won his cognomen of "Stonewall" by promising Beauregard that his brigade should stand like a stone-wall before the enemy; the promise was kept. He fought Shields near Winchester, in March, with rather indifferent success. But his pursuit of Banks down the Shenandoah Valley was very successful, and infused some heart into the rebel cause. Again, in June, his attack on M'Clellan's right wing at Mechanicsville helped his fame among his people. At Cedar Mountain his design showed skill, but the steady courage of Banks's troops foiled his purpose.

When Lee invaded Maryland Jackson commanded a corps under him, and it was he who forced the little garrison of Harper's Ferry to surrender. He fought at Antietam, and again at Fredericksburg, but the glory of the latter victory was of course appropriated by his superior, General Lee.

It is beginning to be doubted whether Jackson really possesses claims to the reputation he enjoys. Some of our readers seem to think he is nothing more than a lucky soldier and a good disciplinarian.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION IN THE UNITED STATES.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS are now prepared to commence the regular issue of the Numbers of this important NATIONAL WORK, to the Literary and Artistic preparations for which many months of labor have been devoted. These are now so far advanced that the Publishers are warranted in promising that this work will be a thorough, careful, and impartial History of the War, based upon a laborious collection and comparison of all accessible materials.

Numbers I. and II. are now printed; Numbers III. and IV. will be ready in a short time. These four Numbers are a fair specimen of the character and execution of the whole work. Succeeding Numbers are in such a state of forwardness that the Publishers will be able to issue them regularly and rapidly.

NUMBER I.

Which is introductory to the whole work, gives a history of the Colonization of the country which became the United States; a condensed sketch of the War of the Revolution, showing that Independence was won by the United Colonies, not by separate ones; that from the first we were a NATION in fact, though not in form; and that we never attained prosperity until a NATIONAL GOVERNMENT, not a mere Confederacy, was formally inaugurated. This is followed by a full narration of the Slavery Question, of the Compromises which grew out of it, and of the various Presidential Elections, closing with brief but masterly sketches of the rapid rise of a Secession Party, consequent upon the election of Mr. Lincoln, and the feeble measures of Mr. Buchanan; closing with the formal Secession of South Carolina, which fairly opened the War.—This Number contains the following

ILLUSTRATIONS:

Nathaniel Greene.—Horatio Gates.—William Pitt.—Edmund Burke.—Portraits of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence.—Governeur Morris.—Alexander Hamilton.—John Jay.—Patrick Henry.—Charles Cotesworth Pinckney.—Fac-similie of the Declaration of Independence.—John C. Calhoun.—Stephen A. Douglas.—Henry Clay.—James Buchanan.—John Brown.—John C. Breckinridge.—Howell Cobb.—John B. Floyd.—Isaac Toucey.—John Bell.—Edward Everett.—Judge Magrath.—Robert Toombs.—Lewis Cass.

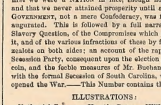
NUMBER II.

Details at length the circumstances connected with the Investment of Fort Sumter: the commencement of decided action by Mr. Buchanan, after his Cabinet had been purged from its traitorous members: the balance of Force and Arsenals; the rapid Secession of the Gulf States: the Formation of a Confederate Provisional Government: the Inauguration of Mr. Lincoln; his inaugural address, and the early Measures of his Administration: closing with the Bombardment and Evacuation of Fort Sumter.—This Number contains the following

ILLUSTRATIONS:

Portraits of the Federal Officers at Fort Sumter.—Fort Sumter, seen from the Rear, at low Water.—Key of the Fort Moultrie Magazine.—Major Anderson's Gunlocks.—Entry of Major Anderson's Command into Fort Sumter on Christmas Night, 1860.—Major Anderson's Quarters in Fort Sumter.—The Prayer at Sumter, Dec., 26, 1860.—Fac-simile of the Superscription and Frank of Senator Yulee's Letter.—Fac-simile of the Letter.—The United States Sloop of War "Brooklyn."—Lieutenant General Winfield Scott.—The Steam-ship "Star of the West."—Firing on the "Star of the West" from the Iron Coast Batteries on Morris's Island, January 10, 1861.—The Palmetto Flag of Texas.—Governor Pickens.—Jefferson Davis.—Alexander H. Stephens.—David E. Twiggs.—Abraham Lincoln.

MODE AND TERMS OF PUBLICATION.



The work will be issued in Numbers, as rapidly as is consistent with thorough and careful preparation. The Publishers hope to be able to issue two Numbers each month.

Each Number will contain 64 pages, of the size of Harper's Weekly, profusely illustrated, and printed in the best manner, from new and legible type.

The price of each Number, containing matter equivalent to an ordinary volume, will be Twenty-five Cents.

Four Numbers (Nos. I., II., III., and IV.) will be sent by mail, post-paid, upon the receipt of One Dollar.

Booksellers, News Dealers, and Canvassing Agents will be supplied on the most liberal terms.

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

Common sense tells us that unless the stomach is kept in good working order, no man, woman or child, is capable of the elements of the blood, can not be vigorous and healthy. Nothing has been discovered or invented that so effectually and invariably cures and prevents imp-rfect digestion as HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS. Dyspepsia, flatulency, oppression after eating, and the feeling so often described by the sufferer as "all-gone" sensation, are removed in a few days by the use of this most healthful of all stimulants. No man, woman or babe, need fear it, for it contains no fiery ingredient. It excites neither the circulation nor the brain. On the contrary, its effect is genial and soothing. It promotes sleep as well as to strengthen the digestive powers, and may be taken not only without danger, but with a certainty of the most desirable results by the feeblest lady invalid.

Lyon's Kathairon.

This delightful article for preserving and beautifying the human hair is again put up by the original proprietor, and is now made with the same care, skill, and attention, which first created its immense and unprecedented sales over our countless heads annually. It is sold at 50 cents in large bottles. Two million bottles can easily be sold in a year when it is again known that the article is not only the most delightful hair dressing in the world, but that it cleanses the scalp of scurf and dandruff, gives the hair a lively, rich luxuriant growth, and prevents it from turning gray. These are considerations worth considering. The Kathairon has been tested for over twelve years, and is warranted as described. Any lady who values a beautiful head of hair will use the Kathairon. It is finely perfumed, clear and delicate. It is sold by all respectable dealers throughout the world.

American Watches

For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

The American Watch Company give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for packaging and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of the most substantial manufacture, an accurate and durable time-keeper, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting patterns, at as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Ancres and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, Wm Ellery, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States.

Wholesale orders should be addressed to

THE NORTH UNITED.

WE regard the mass meeting of the people which was held at Cooper Institute in this city, on 6th March, as securing the consolidation of the North on the great question of the war; and we therefore take occasion to lay before our readers the portraits of the two principal speakers, MR. JOHN VAN BUREN and MR. JAMES T. BRADY, both well-known men, lawyers of the highest rank, gentlemen of high character, and the most influential leaders of the Democracy in this city.

The meeting itself is conceded on all hands to have been a great success. The Herald of 7th said:

The largest and most enthusiastic war meeting ever held in this city since the memorable open-air gathering at Union Square in 1861 took place at the Cooper Institute last evening. The meeting was called for eight o'clock, but long before seven the large hall of the Institute was besieged on every side by citizens of every rank and condition in life. To say that the building was crowded to repletion is to convey a very inadequate idea of the number. Less numbers than were packed within its walls. Such unity of feeling, and warm, outspoken enthusiasm for the vigorous prosecution of the war against the rebellion have rarely been seen at any loyal and patriotic gathering.

The Times of the same day said:

An immense meeting of loyal citizens was held last night at Cooper Institute, embracing some four thousand of our loyal citizens, who are in favor of sustaining the Government in its efforts to suppress the rebellion; who are faithful to the Union and the Constitution; determined to preserve the integrity of the national laws and national territory, and to maintain the power of our flag. The hour appointed for the gathering was eight o'clock P.M., but by seven o'clock the great hall of the Institute was so thoroughly crowded that it became necessary to station policemen at the doors to prevent even further attempts on the part of thousands present to obtain admission.

The Tribune said:

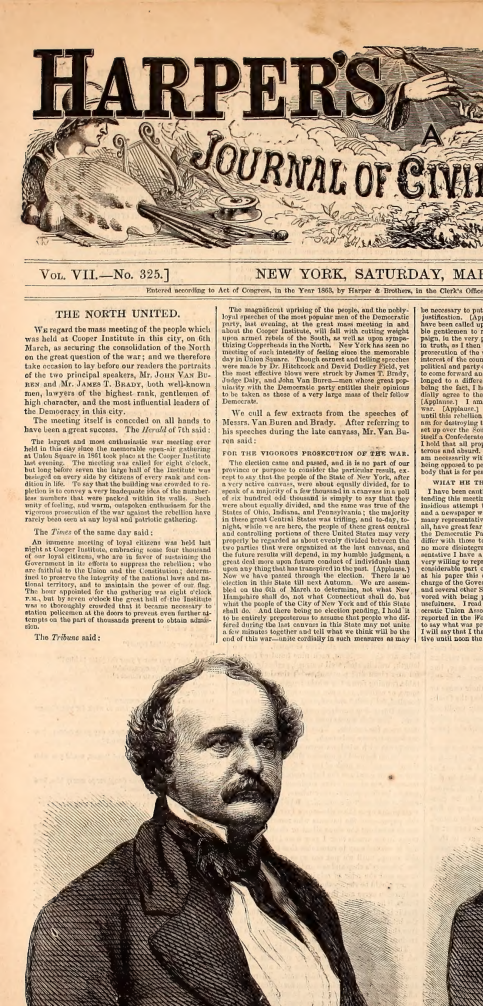
The magnificent uprising of the people, and the noble-loyal spectacle of the most popular men of the Democratic party, last evening, at the great mass meeting in and about the Cooper Institute, will fall with cutting weight upon armed rebels of the South, as well as upon sympathizing Copperheads in the North. New York has seen no meeting of such intensity of feeling since the memorable day in Union Square. Though earnest and telling speeches were made by Dr. Hitchcock and David Dudley Field, yet the most effective blows were struck by James T. Brady, Judge Daly, and John Van Buren—men whose great popularity with the Democratic party entitles their opinions to be taken as those of a very large mass of their fellow Democrats.

We cull a few extracts from the speeches of Messrs. Van Buren and Brady. After referring to his speeches during the late canvass, MR. VAN BUREN said:

FOR THE VIGOROUS PROSECUTION OF THE WAR.

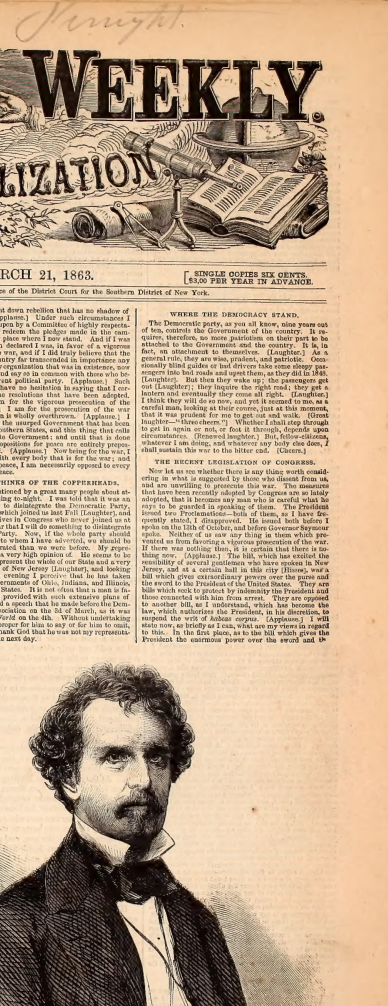
The election came and passed, and it is no part of our province or purpose to consider the particular results, except to say that the people of the State of New York, after a very active canvass, were about equally divided, for to speak of a majority of a few thousand in a canvass in poll of six hundred odd thousand is simply to say that they were about equally divided, and the same was true of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Pennsylvania; the majority in these great Central States was trifling, and to-day, to-night, while we are here, the people of these great central and controlling portions of these United States were very properly be regarded as about evenly divided between the two parties that were organized at the last canvass, and the future results will depend, in my humble judgment, a great deal more upon future conduct of individuals than upon any thing that has transpired in the past. [Applause.] Now we have passed through the election. There is no election in this State till next Autumn. We are assembled on the 6th of March to determine, not what New Hampshire shall do, not what Connecticut shall do, but what the people of the City of New York and of this State shall do. And there being no election pending, I hold it to be entirely preposterous to assume that people who differed during the last canvass in this State may not unite a few minutes together and tell what we think will be the end of this war—unite cordially in such measures as may be necessary to put down rebellion that has no shadow of justification. [Applause.] Under such circumstances I have been called upon by a Committee of highly respectable gentlemen to redeem the pledge made in the last campaign, to the very place where I now stand. And if I was in truth, as I then declared I was, in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war, and if I did truly believe that the interest of the country far transcended in importance any political and party organization that was in existence, now to come forward and say or in common with those who belonged to a different political party. [Applause.] Such being the fact, I have no hesitation in saying that I cordially agree to the resolutions that have been adopted. [Applause.] I am for the vigorous prosecution of the war. [Applause.] I am for the prosecution of the war until this rebellion is wholly overthrown. [Applause.] I am for destroying the usurped Government that has been set up over the Southern States, and this thing that calls itself a Confederate Government; and until that is done I hold that all propositions for peace are entirely preposterous and absurd. [Applause.] Now being for the war, I am necessarily with every body that is for the war; and being opposed to peace, I am necessarily opposed to every body that is for peace.

WHAT HE THINKS OF THE COPPERHEADS.



I have been continued by a great many people about attending this meeting to-night. I was told that it was an insidious attempt to disintegrate the Democratic Party, and a newspaper which joined us last Fall [Laughter], and many representatives in Congress who never joined us at all, have great fear that I will do something to disintegrate the Democratic Party. Now, if the whole party should differ with them to whom I have adverted, we should be no more disintegrated than we were before. My representative I have a very high opinion of. He seems to be very willing to represent the whole of our State and a very considerable part of New Jersey [Laughter], and looking at his paper this evening I perceive that he has taken charge of the Governments of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and several other States. It is not often that a man is favored with being provided with such extensive plans of usefulness. I read a speech that he made before the Democratic Union Association on the 5th of March, as it was reported in the World on the 6th. Without undertaking to say what was proper for him to say or for him to omit, I will say that I thank God that he was not my representative until noon the next day.

WHERE THE DEMOCRACY STAND.



The Democratic party, as you all know, nine years out of ten, controls the Government of the country. It requires, therefore, no more patriotism on their part to be attached to the Government and the country. It is, in fact, an attachment to themselves. [Laughter.] As a general rule, they are wise, prudent, and patriotic. Occasionally blind guides or bad drivers take some sleepy passengers into bad roads and upset them, as they did in 1848. [Laughter. But then they wake up; the passengers get out [Laughter]; they inquire the right road; they get a lantern and eventually they come all right. [Laughter.] I think they will do so now, and yet it seemed to me, as a careful man, looking at their course, just at this moment, that it was prudent for me to get out and walk. [Great laughter.—three cheers.!] Whether I shall step through to get in again or not, or find it through, depends upon circumstances. [Renewed laughter.] But, fellow-citizens, whatever I am doing, and whatever any body else does, I shall sustain this war to the bitter end. [Cheers.]

THE RECENT LEGISLATION OF CONGRESS.

Now let us see whether there is any thing worth considering in what is suggested by those who dissent from us, and are unwilling to prosecute this war. The measures that have been recently adopted by Congress are as lately adopted, that it becomes any man who is careful what he says to be guarded in speaking of them. The President issued two Proclamations—both of them, as I have frequently stated, I disapproved. He issued both before I spoke on the 13th of October, and before Governor Seymour spoke. Neither of us saw any thing in them which prevented us from favoring a vigorous prosecution of the war. If there was nothing then, it is certain that there is nothing new. [Applause.] The bill, which has entitled the sensibility of several gentlemen who have spoken in New Jersey, and at a certain hall in this city [Hisses], was a bill which gives extraordinary powers over the purse and the sword to the President of the United States. They are bills which seek to protect by indemnity the President and those connected with him from arrest. They are opposed to another bill, as I understand, which has become the law, which authorizes the President, in his discretion, to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. [Applause.] I will state now, as briefly as I can, what are my views in regard to this. In the first place, as to the bill which gives the President the enormous power over the sword and the pose. I agree that it makes him almost a dictator. I agree that it is a very great stretch of power.

Mr. Van Buren then went on to show that when the Boundary dispute arose, in 1839, Congress conferred upon the President precisely similar powers to those which have lately been placed in Mr. Lincoln's hands. He spoke of the passage of the bill (in 1839) as follows:

Now how do you suppose that bill passed? It put the whole pures and sword into the absolute power of the President of the United States. Clay, Webster, and Calhoun, men perhaps inferior to the sohns of our day [Laughter]—were members then from Senaca. The bill passed the Senate, and there three statesmen—although all violently opposed personally and politically to the then President of the United States—voted for the bill, and it passed the Senate unanimously. [Applause.] It passed the House of Representatives, after a full discussion, by a vote of 201 to 6, and the leader of that 6 was Mr. Henry A. Wise, [Hiss] the bold Brigadier who distinguished himself so greatly at Nagoot Head [Laughter] while his brigade was fighting and his son dying. [Applause.]

HE SEES NOTHING WRONG IN IT.

Now, gentlemen, there is nothing to be made judgment, therefore, in the law passed putting this enormous power in the possession of the President of the United States to deter me for searching in a vigorous prosecution of the war. I say, I can very well understand how M'r sympathies with the rebellion—if I deemed that this war should fail—could prompt him and others in opposing flaws in this act. But if I believed that substantial judgment required the great ends of prosecuting the war demand that the whole power of the Government shall be lodged in the Congress of the United States in the President of the United States. I would bow in silence to the act whether I approved of it or not. [Prolonged cheers.] If the President of the United States had usurped these powers there might be a degree of propriety in complaining it; but when the representatives of the people, legally elected, in the exercise of discretion, assume the responsibility of lodging these trusts in him, in my humble judgment, and certainly in view of the precedent to which I have referred, no wise man will ever complain of the act. [Applause.]

CHARGE ALONG THE WHOLE LINE.

He concludes as follows:

Gentlemen, we must depend upon ourselves, if we can fight this battle to victory; we shall—if we win it, it shall be defeated. But beyond all earthly considerations we must look to our highest considerations—whether we are united I have no doubt about the result. I do not look forward to a long war, because many people in the North in the habit of modern times to have long wars. The great Superpowers in the regions of destruction and creation to bring war rapidly to a close. The Russian campaign was not long; from its campaign was a million men. It is my judgment the war will be a short one if we are united to put forward the whole power of the loyal States of the Union. With our immense population and resources we ought to end this war in many days. Sherman is now in New Orleans, at Vicksburg, at Charleston, and in Tennessee. Nothing stops him. He marches through the country and will—Union—and my word for it, in ninety days every body will wonder that this rebellion was not upheaved as formidable in any portion of the United States. [Prolonged cheers.]

Mr. Brady was equally decided. After referring to his position as the descendant of an Irishman, and an American citizen, he went on to say:

FOR THE UNION ALWAYS.

That grave of mine, however unnamed or unnoticed, I want to be identified by some humble stone that will tell some heart that cleaves to the recollection of him who came to this land of freedom, whose country was the first cause of America. (Loud cheers.) That is my country, and I am a citizen of that country. There is no man who will attempt that there is to be flag except ours that I can ever accept. I will never be a slave from it, but I want to be aided to it without murder. I agree—[Cheers]—rights to be accumulated till the day when the United States, in fact as in law, shall be the gallant history of its past and the glorious associations of its present—no glory of the prospects equal to—[Cheers]—that this country for us, now and hereafter, one country, one constitution, and one destiny. (Cheers.) Gentlemen, I am afraid I have trespassed to me from the Express—[A terrific burst of hooting, yelling, and hissing followed the allusion to the Express.] You may think, my friends, that I made this joke expressly for this occasion, but I assure you that the war is not for abolitionists, and that Brady would not be present. [Great laughter and cheering.] I am satisfied to see such men as—[Continued laughter]—for there is so much individuality, and spiritual purity, and tendency to grow more pure in meeting, charged with patriotism and devotion to country that I prefer to associate with them [Laughter]—with the plaisez.] But, so far as I am capable of knowing myself, I am here with the Democracy—[Cheers]—here with the undimmed applause. And although from the very first time I ever took the stump in public to this time when I address you, many of you know opposed to me, as I well understand, in the political associations that existed, and the general question which has determined who should hold the highest offices in the republic—nevertheless, I say that the assertion of a hand who have loved this country even better than their own lives, and not whether there be fifty may obtain the mind of any man, or any number of men in this assembly, that I am not a patriot to-day. I do not present on an occasion when any human being would attack hypocrisy or cant. I have said that I have always been, and I have ever done, to the preservation of the Union and the Constitution. [Applause and three cheers for Brady the name of Yankee applied to me. I accept it in the spirit of our fathers, who were revolutionary patriots, and if there can be found no more of disgrace to be attached to it than the name of Yankee, I am willing to accept it with contentment, whether slavery exists or falls, I thank God for it. [Great applause.] Three cheers for Brady!

HE WOULD SPIT ON A COPPERHEAD.

When this war broke out, I knew that it was urged on by the rebels. I spoke it might terminate, but I protested that they had prepared an attack. When they prefered the issue, and made other feels, I was ready to go with for the National dignity to retain these fortresses. They forces—and I am willing to be counted one of them—that I speak to the Northern men who take any political except the rebellion. [Applause.] Gentlemen, I am not a politician. Since this meeting I surrender all party considerations, all thoughts of party, to be Governor of the State. Abstract in the hope of patriotic and oppressed people every where. I invoke you to the best efforts of every man here who would destroy this refuge for the oppressed. [Cheers.]

WHAT HE CARE TO THE NEGRO.

I was beset by a gentleman for whom I have a great respect, who wondered whether I would speak to-night as a meeting where gentlemen always opposed to me and his wife would be present, and where, perhaps, a more free from stronger than ever entered our nature might be exhibited. I differ with many of you with regard to the cause and conduct, prosecution and probable result of the war in which we are engaged. But, with this difference, however others may applaud, however censure me, I would be false to the faith I have long cherished wrong, who found here a home and a refuge from the persecution and oppression of that doctrine I will not name. In a first speaker referred, if I did not use my first and last breath, and every power I had power of my heart in advance of words in praying Heaven for the preservation of the American Government and country. I shall not mention the name, but I will say that he did not belong to this State.

THE SOUTH TO BE OCCUPIED.

You ask me how this thing is to end? You propose, gentlemen of the South, that there shall be two governments on this soil, armed governments, striving with each other in the presence of the great lesson of history, in which every school-boy is acquainted. I refer you to the Federalist, to the articles of Alexander Hamilton, in regard to the possibility of maintaining separate organizations of government upon this continent. And now, gentlemen, in conclusion, I propose to answer that question to my Southern friends—what will come of this war? You say that you will never consent to be united with us. We say that we will never agree to the existence of two military governments arising out of the same people on the same territory. The issue is distinct. What is this thing to be resolved? I will tell you my prophecy, and yet I am confident we will differ in opinion with me. I remember, on an occasion when we celebrated St. Patrick's Day, whom we called Irish quack Dr. Brady and Judge of Sessions, General Shields—whose name is honored—looked to the Irish green flag, which, having located a blacksmith's shop, a tavern, or school-house, he saw was known as the Irish flag. I will tell you. There is no humorous terms of the Yankee out West who cooked a chicken to the Irish flag. Gentlemen, I propose to tell my Southern friends, continued Mr. Brady, from the position I occupy, that you will never destroy a single institution which they call slavery—which, unlike many in this assembly, I would propose to abolish by law, and declared upon his breast announced him "a drunkard." The hostess of the wife woman was touched, and she expressed her opinion of the discipline in the most violent terms. It was not consistent with good order, of course, that such censure of official acts should be recklessly made, and the guard politely told her that he had orders not to suffer such talk. Upon which the apparent lady wheeled upon him suddenly, and roared out, "You go to h—!" which is not a part of the hospital. The soldier only proved that he was a gentleman, and the wellbred woman that she was no lady.

The regular female nurses in this hospital are Sisters of Charity, who are required to be over age of the sick. They move noiselessly about in their plain garb and stiff, white-winged caps. No breath of slander disturbs them. The women's organ and lady had never heard an injurious whisper about them. There is a little room at the entrance of each ward for the office of nursing. As they glide by the vision of Evangeline follows them:

"Thither, by night and by day, came the Sister of Mercy to visit the poor.
Lookel up into her face, and thought, Indeed, to behold there
Stories of celestial light encircle her forehead with splendor, such as the artist paints o'er the brows of saints and apostles."

The dress of every sister needs no special moral heroism of the finest quality, whether it actually exist under it or not. To devote one's self entirely to the care of the sick and the dying, without fame or great reward, and with only the consciousness of simple duty done, is a kind of heroism which any who work in the way that seems most agreeable, and for the highest attainable rewards of fame, position, or money, can not well understand.

It is not possible to describe such a vast hospital as this very intelligibly. Yet you may have some idea of it, if you fancy a letter H with very long sides and narrow cross-piece. The cross-piece is the building of offices and rooms of the director and surgical staff are situated. The two sides are the corridors, each nine hundred feet in length, well lighted, well warmed, perfectly theoretical and clean and pleasant, with the long meestable running down the whole length. The commissary is well and on a generous scale. For the hospital, fully filled and officered, would contain between thirty-five hundred and four thousand persons. The sick wards open out of the long corridors upon the outside. They have sixty or a hundred-and-twenty beds each. Each ward is a spacious house with a large open both sides, and with a ventilation secured by opening slides along the entire ridge-pole or peak of the roof. At the further end of each ward is a large bath-room and closet for ter-work,'in charge of an engineer section which secures perfect purity every where. The beds are comfortable, and the sheets airy and odorless. There were prints upon the walls—some I recognized from Punch paper—and other pictures which remained. In the wards sat about the stove silent or chatting. Not many in the wards that I saw were lying in bed; and it was not unusual to encounter that it was a huge sick camp, until we put our eyes and noses into the potentary's shop and saw and smelled the jars of drugs and the array of medicine bottles. Nothing happy would be the apothecary of any other village of thirteen acres and three or four thousand inhabitants, if he should see the practice done in this shop. But it is only in an apothecary's paradise that all the inhabitants take pills and potions daily. Is it true that the physicians have done that best to introduce that beaven on earth?

There was the guard-room into which we looked like the interior of any city guard-room or prisons upon some monstrum ingens of a man-of-war such as Gustave Doré would draw. There were the kitchens—the great kitchen for cooking the daily rations, with vast boilers in which Behemoth himself might be boiled down like strong soup; and the clean, comely cisterns of milk in the milk-room; and then the laundry, and the storerooms of the commissary, pulls, clothing, drugs—the village "store," in fact, without the groceries; and the magazine of choice gifts from the benevolent. Every thing was in order—every thing neat, bright, and accessible. The machine was in full play, and worked so perfectly that you heard no creak, felt no jar, and smelled no oil. There was immense activity, but little apparent effort, and no visible friction. Was it because the main shafts, the principal wheels, and the motive power of the executive office, was of such solid force and impulse?

The medical staff of the hospital has been recently opened. It was full of quiet readers and lookers and players, for the room of games came out of it, and there were grave adepts in chess-checkers, and dominoes. The observation of the literature most in request touched a tender cord. It was the illustrated paper; and I know not how many numbers of Harper's Weekly I saw in most active demand, and undergoing the most thorough inspection. At the end of the reading-room is a little room devoted to the library, from which the books are given out to the soldiers by ladies of the vicinity and of Philadelphia, who gladly give the necessary time and care. But the hospital is not content to take only: it gives; and there is already a number three and four of the West Philadelphia Hospital Reporter, which is written by the patients mainly, set up and printed by them. It is an extremely pretty paper in form and aspect. Its vignette is properly the Good Samaritan, and its contents are various, cheerful, and excellent. I mean to introduce it more fully to the great fraternity of Loungers next Saturday, perhaps, or next very soon. Let this plaintive sigh from a sick soldier show that it lacks neither truth nor solemnity; and waft us for the present gentle rest of the hospital:

"ni hak is sif and sore ml legs are thin and woke and when I trr to eat anything
I hecs ml ne pans kreke.

"and I want to be discharged and get me go whale on and ill give a green-back kwik
if I eal get out then."

FROM A DIARY.

A QUIET man of the world, who frequents clubs and our best society, who sits in a diner out and lover of the Opera, a patron who does not shrink at by sneering at the Government, and a gentleman who does not prove it by toadying rascals, should be backless, keeps a diary. He makes notes of what he sees and hears in these important days; and he permits the Lounger to extract from them what he may with propriety be printed. The Lounger hopes, therefore, to enliven his columns occasionally with passages of general interest; and he begins to-day:

Dined at ——'s. Future, a Fifth Avenue Democrat, not opposite Cato, a Democrat of another school. Fiction Cato could be no better than an Abolitionist. Cato smiled pleasantly, and quietly smoked. At last Fiction demanded that, as a consistent, Cato ought to marry his daughter to a Congo bridegroom.

"That doesn't seem to me to be the alternative," said Cato, smiling.

Oh yes! oh yes! Let's have a little gentian as well as preaching," retorted Fiction, winking at the rest of us.

"Stop a moment. You are a Democrat, I believe, Fiction?"

"Of course."

"A Jeffersonian Democrat, or a Jeffersonian-Davis Democrat?"

There was a little more smiling, and Plutus drank his wine.

"No matter," resumed Cato. "You have a cousin named ——"

"Yes."

"He is an Englishman?"

"Yes."

"He is an honest, industrious fellow?"

"Yes."

"And a voter?"

"Yes."

"And your political equal?"

"Yes."

"Why don't you marry your daughter to him?"

"They wouldn't be congenial."

"Do you have him to dinner?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"Because I choose my company."

"Yet you wouldn't want him to work for you without wages?"

"Certainly not."

"And not him and his family to pay your debts? Nor separate them to settle your estate?"

"God forbid!"

"Nor, as he is intelligent and honest, would you wish to deprive him of his vote?"

"No, of all things."

"Yet you don't with your daughter to marry him, and you don't have him to dinner?"

"No; why should I?"

"There's no reason in the world; and why should I?"

At ——'s magnificate. The story has got into the papers. There was a Marquis of Carabbas, an Englishman, among the company. A woman tempted him, and he did wear a rollat bodge. Did he mean to insult the host and the party? Probably not. Did he know what he was doing? Of course he did, unless you suppose that he would have worn a Union badge at a party in Richmond. Then had he perhaps read Russell's Diary, and therefore supposed that the company were quite loyal? Certainly not, and heavily favorable to the rebellion? If so, he was rapidly undeceived in one instance, at least. For a young officer in many engagements, the cousin of the Englishman's confidant in a very unmistakable manner, lunkhaus, and, in fact, bowed without touching him drinkings, and bows into trinkets, did not perceive that if an American had worn a badge of any English political party, he risked at the house of an English gentleman, or at the house of one at war with a foreign or domestic enemy, and had worn at table the enemy's colors, he would not have been at all unreasonably reproof from the host of the house. An English gentleman, but at least self-respect, if he had worn the badge of the rebellion.

As for the woman who insisted upon placing on the badge, I suppose the best informed of her sex did not know and would not guess that she was no longer welcome in his house. He could not have failed to make her understand it from his whole manner. Other hosts, hostesses, and lovers were exposed to death in defending their country's cause, and the host knew that many were drinking-cups and bows into trinkets, did not perceive the force of the innocency of wearing the colors of the murderers in battle-array unrebuked.

Such disagreeable events came of assuming that because people are rich they are well-bred. One may not be too careful in choosing his company.

Last week ——'s with the — — Ellen Minister, Colonel Ernest Roumaine, and his Secretary, Dr. Bruno. The Colonel is a very pleasantly handsome man in the Spanish style, and of the most pleasing and polished manners. His wife is intelligent and accomplished, speaking English with English purity and accuracy. The qualities of brother, Secretary, and forms were fully shown at the time of Garibaldi's visit to London, and the Lounger had therefore the opportunity of encountering him with the Wigfield, and Stofield, and Tonsell, and Mason school of gentlemen. Dr. Bruno, his secretary, was educated in Paris, and is a man of great originality and information. I am sure that he finds the weather that a man of his blood and color should be a gentleman infinitely amusing. The other day Fiction asked Cato, who was sitting next to him, how he should feel if he sat next to a Hayden at dinner. "Feel!" answered Cato, "why, in the first place, I should have no feel between two of them, and if they were gentlemanly and intelligent, I felt exactly as I do with a gentleman and intelligent. I felt exactly as I do with a gentleman and the color of a man, as in his conduct, that makes him a gentleman. I don't care to sit next to an old-clo' man; but if a Jew is well-bred and intelligent, Plutus, he is as good to sit next to as any man!"

A few of us dined Colonel Roumaine and Dr. Bruno at the Club. The dinner was delightful. Roumaine told us of the condition and prospects of Hayti, and of his friend Geffrard. Afterward we played billiards, at which the Colonel is a master. I understand some of the youth who dined Bull Run Russell at the Club were amazed to hear of our party. Probably. Chacun à son goût.

This morning John Bull came into the Club. "Well!" said he, "I understand that niggers have been dining here."

"Have they?" answered Alcibiades, quietly, making rings of his cigar smoke, apparently more interested in them than in Bull's remark.

"Yes, by Jove!" continued John, "and I should like to know how the gentlemen behaved?"

"Oh, quite decently," said Alcibiades, blowing fresh rings. "They didn't steal the spoons, nor sneer at people of a different color—no, and they didn't wear secesh badges on their coats, Bull. If they had, I, for one, would have kicked them out."

John moved on into the next room, and Alcibiades continued blowing rings.

NICKNAMES.

It is an awful thought that the citizens of the United States who are resolved to preserve their Government and country, even if slaves must be freed in the process, are to be called Abolitionists by General Beauregard at the South, and Niggerheads by the reactionists at the North. But it is one of those overwhelming blows to which we must all submit with the best grace we can. "Woollyhead" and "Black Republican" were very fearful epithets; "Fanatic," "Radical," "One-idea Men," were also terrible terms. But "Abolitionist" and "Niggerhead" are an ingenious refinement of cruelty.

Still, let us not despair. A people which, although denounced as Woollyheads, elected, by great majorities in every Free State, a President, whose election was a sign that human decency and political consistency were to have a chance in the Government, will perhaps be able to bear up under the sneers of a party which is trying to build a Republic upon the denial of human rights. Those who do not fear rebel batteries in front will not be troubled much by reactionary blackguarding in the rear. Hard names are by no means the hardest burdens to carry. Christian, Puritan, Methodist, were all contemptuous epithets; but they are not exactly contemptible facts. So there is no gentleman in Europe who does not pride himself upon being an Abolitionist. He would as soon defend cannibalism as slavery. Every wise party catches the nicknames hurled at it like the stones at St. Stephen, and proudly binds them on its forehead, where they blaze like diamonds.

It is truly dreadful to be called an Abolitionist, of course; and to be denounced as Niggerhead might well drive the coolest man to suicide. But there is one epithet which is not merely a spirt of rage and spleen like these. It is a name which burns and brands with infamy. There is many a man who, years hence, will proudly say to his children, "I was an Abolitionist in '63." But what man, who does not wish Benedict Arnold were his ancestor, will say with pride to his children, "I was a Copperhead in '63?"

A VERY THIN MASK.

When a wanton and wicked rebellion is aiming to destroy the Government, to ruin the country, to establish a political community upon the bloody denial of the rights of man, to annihilate every guarantee of civil liberty, to substitute endless and ferocious war for permanent peace, and to replace national unity, power, and prosperity by the sheerest anarchy, and a citizen of that threatened country has no word of condemnation for the effort, and expresses no fear of its consequences to the liberty of the citizen and the existence of the Government, but by all that he says, and all that he dares to do, comforts and aids that fierce assault of disorder and barbarism upon order and civilization, the indignation of every sober man and loyal citizen is kindled against him as one with all the guilt and more than the cowardice of an open rebel.

But when this man, who has not a solitary word of sympathy nor a feeling of generous forbearance toward the Government which is battling to sustain itself and save his country, declaims bitterly against any extreme but regulated measure of supreme authority necessary for that purpose as destroying all the liberties of the citizen, the feeling of indignation changes into one of utter and inexpressible contempt.

What other emotion could any faithful American citizen possibly have upon reading the Congressional speeches and the Copperhead editorials against the Conscription and Habeas Corpus acts?

"PRETTY GOOD HIT."

Mr. Lounger,—I read with interest the note of your correspondent Tri-Mountain last week, and I hope he will equally enjoy my anecdote.

A certain man who has long done the work of those who are now in rebellion, and has had his various rewards—a man who frankly says that if the rebellion succeeds he hopes his State will go with the rebels—meets a gentleman upon the street and says to him, jauntily:

"Well, I believe I will try Patriotism."

Quick as lightning the gentleman coolly replies: "In Dr. Johnson's sense?"

You will remember, as the person in question did, the definition given by Dr. Johnson, who was a high Tory, to the word Patriotism, which was then used as a party name: "Patriotism; the last refuge of a scoundrel."

Stung by the prompt retort, the man turned green; thought better of it; grinned a ghastly grin, and said, "Pretty good hit."

Yours, with respect,

FAIRMOUNT.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A correspondent in the Seventy-sixth Ohio writes: Away down here in Dixie we sometimes learn some funny things about the doings of our Southern brethren when they held the country now occupied by us. For instance: When General M'Cown (rebel) was commanding at New Madrid, he was greatly alarmed one night at the reported approach of General Pope with a large force to attack the place. At once every thing was in commotion, and the General commenced making arrangements for defense. He soon found, to his horror, that he had no percussion-caps for his field-pieces. He forthwith dispatched a steamer in hot haste bearing a letter to a Colonel, an ordnance officer at Island No. 10, directing him to bring down a supply immediately. The boat reached the island in about an hour; the Colonel was found in a state of "wild but sweet ebriety." The letter was delivered to him, and he soon came aboard with a box under his arm, and the steamer returned to New Madrid. In about fifteen minutes after she landed the Colonel returned on board, and ordered the Captain of the boat to return at once with his boat to Island No. 10. The Captain said he did not think he would go, as he had other orders from Commodore Hollins. "But," says the Colonel, "you must and shall go, for by —— they sent up to me for a box of percussion-caps, and I have brought down a box of cigars!"

Again: A transport took on board at Eunice, Arkansas, a regiment of Secesh troops bound for Fort Pillow. The night before reaching their destination the bar-keeper found that a ten-gallon keg of whisky had been stolen from the bar by some one of the soldiers, and made complaint to the Colonel. The Colonel said he would try to discover the thief; and so, when the men were landed next day, ordered that every box, barrel, or package capable of containing the missing keg should be searched on its passage ashore. The search was made, but the keg could not be found.

About two weeks afterward the Colonel had occasion to take passage on the same boat. He was asked whether he had found out any thing about the keg of whisky. He replied: "Yes, I know all about it. I found the keg empty in camp the day after we landed. Suspecting a roguish whisky-loving scamp of having something to do with its theft, I called him up and said to him if he would tell me how he got the keg ashore I would let him off. 'Now,' says he, 'Colonel, if you'll be as good as your word, I'll tell you. I just put the keg in the bass-drum, headed the drum up, and carried the whisky ashore in that.'"

"Katy, have you laid the table-cloth and plates yet?" "An' sure I have, mem—every thing but the eggs; an' isn't that Biddy's work, surely?"

Old Bones is strongly opposed to exertion of any kind. In fact, he is one of the laziest men alive. Not long since he was taken ill very suddenly, and he sent in hot haste for Doctor Dobbs. The Doctor is a wiry little man, ever on the move, and rather sarcastic in his remarks. On arriving he asked Bones how he felt. "Ah, Doctor," said he, with a most wobegone visage, "it's all up with me. I feel that I can not survive long." "Bosh!" interrupted the Doctor, impatiently; "you'll never die." "Never die, Doctor! why not?" "Because you're too lazy to give the last kick."

What a noise and a fuss there has been made about changing names! Of course, all the bother has been raised by gentlemen. Now we must say in favor of the beautiful sex that we do not know a single young lady (we say advisedly, a single young lady) who would have been half so particular. On the contrary, we do not know any persons who change their names with a greater willingness and a more becoming grace than ladies. In fact, we believe that the sooner they change them the better they are pleased.

AN ADVENTURE IN MEXICO.

"The Pecari, or Mexican Pig, is a very dangerous animal. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Wednesday, March 4, the Thirty-seventh Congress terminated at noon. Nearly all the important measures for the support of the Government which were brought before Congress passed both Houses. None of the bills designed to assist the States in effecting the emancipation of slaves were successful in passing. The bills to admit the Territories of Nebraska, Nevada, and Colorado as States failed to get through both Houses for want of time.

Soon after the adjournment of both Houses of Congress the Senate met in extraordinary session, in accordance with the President's call; but beyond the election of Senator Foot, of Vermont, as presiding officer pro tem., and the administration of the oath of office to new members, little business was transacted.

On Thursday, 5th, the Senate sat again in extra session. Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, and Mr. William Sprague, of Rhode Island, were sworn in as Senators, and took their seats. The President pro tem., Senator Foot, was authorized to appoint the standing committees. A resolution was adopted, returning to President Lincoln all the military nominations which expired with the late Senate. But little other business was transacted.

On Friday, 6th, in the Senate, the standing committees were announced by the President pro tem., Senator Foot. A resolution was introduced for the printing of ten thousand copies of the mechanical part of the Patent Office report, and four thousand copies of the acts and joint resolutions of the late session of Congress. The proposed additional rule of the Senate was called up. It requires that the oath of loyalty passed by Congress in July last shall be subscribed to by members of the Senate and House of Representatives. A long debate took place on the proposition to enforce the rule; but, without doing so, the Senate went into executive session. During the day several messages were received from the President. On the conclusion of the executive session discussion was resumed on the proposal to administer to the new Senators the "loyal oath," after which Senator Foot took the oath, and all the new Senators present followed his example. Without transacting any other business the Senate adjourned.

On Saturday, 7th, in the Senate, Senator Doolittle took the oath of loyalty prescribed by the act of July, 1862, as other newly elected Senators did on the previous day. The resolution to print ten thousand copies of the mechanical part of the Patent Office report, and four thousand copies of the acts and joint resolutions of the late session, was adopted. The Senate then went into executive session on the Presidential nominations, and, on the opening of the doors, adjourned.

On Monday, 9th, and Tuesday, 10th, the Senate confirmed some nominations and adjourned.

PROCLAMATION TO DESERTERS.

The President issued on 10th an important proclamation on the matter of soldiers absent from their regiments without leave. He gives a few days' grace to all such, up to the 1st of April, at which time all those who report themselves to the nearest head-quarters, as designated by a previous order of the Secretary of War, will be restored to their respective regiments without punishment; but those who do not will be arrested as deserters and dealt with as the law directs. He warns evil-disposed persons not to give aid to the rebellion by encouraging desertion, thus weakening the strength of the armies, and exposing those troops in the field to additional danger. He calls upon all good citizens to assist in preventing disaffected parties from urging the desertion of soldiers and discouraging enlistments.

ATTACK ON FAIRFAX COURT HOUSE.

The rebels, under Captain Mosely, made an attack on Fairfax Court House on the 8th, about 2 o'clock A.M., capturing General H. Stoughton, who was in command there, together with all the men detached from his brigade, 110 horses, and the patrols of the Provost Marshal. He entered the place during a violent rain storm, and took the head-quarters of the General completely by surprise. An orderly who escaped and returned to Fairfax states that the enemy were retreating, with our cavalry in close pursuit, and that they were running so hastily for their lives that they abandoned thirty of the prisoners they had previously captured.

REBEL RUMORS.

The Richmond journals of the 6th inst. contain the extraordinary rumors that the Indianola has been blown up by the rebels, but that her armament fell into the hands of the Federals. Admiral Porter dispatched to Washington on 8th that both the Indianola and Webb were destroyed in the late engagement.

The rebel papers further state the rebel Van Dorn repulsed a Union force near Franklin on the 1st inst., and captured 2200 officers and men. An attack on Port Hudson by General Banks's forces was looked upon in Richmond as immediate.

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE "NASHVILLE."

The story of the total destruction of the rebel steamer Nashville, in the Ogeechee River, near Savannah, is confirmed by the Richmond papers, which state that she grounded on the bar before Fort M'Allister on the 27th ult., and was discovered by the Union fleet, one of which opened fire on her for two hours and a half, and finally got a shell on board, which set her on fire, and left her a complete wreck. During the attack the fort kept up a fire on the Union gun-boat, and hit her twice. The gun-boat returned the shots, but, as far as known, did no damage to Fort M'Allister.

A FIGHT NEAR FRANKLIN.

Our news from Nashville reports a further renewal of the fight between our troops and the rebels under Van Dorn, at Springville, near Franklin, Tennessee, on 5th. General Van Dorn is said to have eighteen thousand men under his command, and the Union force, being very inferior in numbers, were defeated. Three regiments of infantry, under Coburn, of the Thirty-third Indiana, were entirely cut to pieces or captured. The cavalry and artillery, numbering five hundred of the former, and one battery, escaped. The men fought splendidly throughout the whole day; but the heavy fire of the enemy's batteries in front, and the movements of vastly superior numbers on their flanks, were too much for them. General Gilbert was expected to come up with reinforcements from Franklin, but he did not arrive.

RECONNOISSANCE ON THE RAPPAHANNOCK.

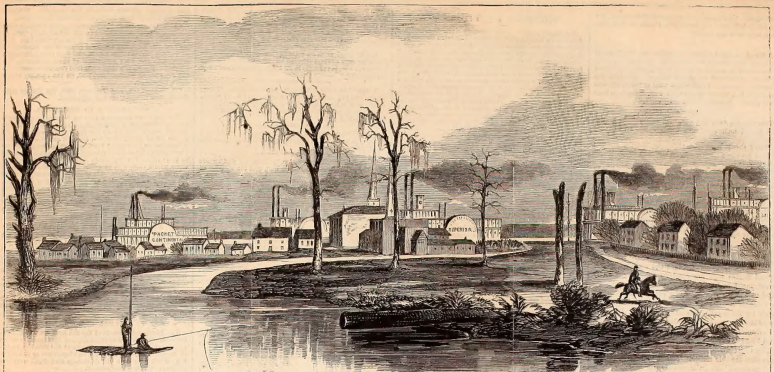
The Army of the Potomac has been making a demonstration. An expedition, under Colonel Phelps, which left Belle Plain in steamers on Tuesday for Northumberland County, made a most successful thing of it, and returned to head-quarters on 6th. The troops visited Heathsville, which they found deserted by the rebels. Then, throwing out large foraging parties from that base into Lancaster County and in other directions, they succeeded in capturing one thousand bushels of corn, fifty horses and mules, a large number of fine beef cattle and quite an amount of medical stores. Two post-offices and several stores were visited, and two important rebel mails captured. The cavalry also seized a large number of horses and mules, and are now on their way overland to Fredericksburg. Some prisoners were also taken, among them Colonel Claybrook, a prominent rebel officer, and two clerks of the departments at Richmond, with a quantity of correspondence for citizens of Baltimore, and official papers addressed to parties in London, to the care of Baring Brothers. The country was quite deserted and almost barren of every thing.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

REVULSION IN PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

There was a great demonstration at the Amphitheatre in Liverpool on the 19th ult., in support of President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation. The Liverpool Post says that a more unanimous meeting was never witnessed on any question on which public opinion has been divided. Resolutions applauding the course of Mr. Lincoln on the slavery question, and an address to be presented to him through Mr. Adams were adopted. Some uproar and confusion occurred toward the conclusion of the meeting; but with this exception every thing passed off very happily. On the same evening a meeting was held at Carlisle, and a similar series of resolutions were carried with enthusiasm, and almost unanimously. The conduct of the Lord Mayor of London in fêting Mr. Mason, the Minister of the Confederate Government, was strongly reprobated at the Carlisle gathering.

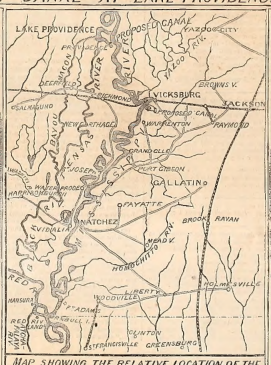


A REBEL LOAN.

The latest reports from the Continent of Europe inform us that the rebel agents had succeeded in effecting a large loan of money based on cotton at a fixed price, or cotton at option, at seven per cent. Paris letters, dated on the 20th ult. say that the contract for the Confederate loan had been received for three millions of pounds sterling in bonds at seven per cent., exchangeable for cotton at option. The London Times, in its city article, says: "The cotton thus hypothecated will be first available for shipment to Europe," as the government—rebel it is to be presumed—possesses all the means of transport from the interior to the ports.

MEXICO.

THE FRENCH EXPEDITION.



The papers publish the proclamation of General Forey to the Mexican people, signalizing his intended and immediate advance upon the City of the Montezumas. The fate of Mexico is therefore in the balance. Although the French General speaks with words of softness to the inhabitants of this invaded land, we must not doubt that he will fight his way furiously to the long-coveted capital. The accounts of his movements are so uncertain that we know not whether he intends to storm the heights of Puebla or endeavor to turn that formidable position. As the day for the French advance was fixed for the 21st or 22d of last month, it is evident, unless some serious obstacles interposed, that the coup de grace has already been struck. General Forey does not seem so confident of success as his partisans may be inclined to believe; but as the die is now cast, Mexico must either be lost or won.

MILLY LESLIE'S SECRET.

CHAPTER I.

THE cathedral bells of Trowchester were ringing for evening prayer. A mellow light had fallen on the west front, while shadows were creeping over the cloisters and throwing the old buildings in their rear into obscurity. No noiseless hand had striven to renovate Trowchester Cathedral. The north transept alone served for the purposes of public worship, and if any visitor of antiquarian tendencies attempted to stray toward the nave or aisles he was followed by an anxious verger, who represented to him the danger of his wanderings, and pointed out the positive order of the Dean and Chapter that no one should penetrate beyond the given range. Ominous noises, heard in the quiet morning and evening, but perhaps more alarming in their reality when occurring at noonday, warned the inhabitants of the neighborhood that Time had laid no gentle hand on the massive walls; yet externally there was no sign of ruin, and now, as they stood in the last glow of the wintry sunset, it was difficult to believe in their decay.

Hurrying past the cathedral and onward toward the market-cross came Milly Leslie, the wife of a clergyman officiating at the only chapel of ease in Trowchester. She turned down one of the narrow streets that led to the suburbs, and knocked at the door of a small old-fashioned house with a projecting upper story. An elderly woman who opened the door shook her head sadly as she looked at Milly and led the way up stairs, where, on her bed, a woman still young, and with the remains of a delicate and refined beauty on her features, lay dying of a painful illness which had so far yielded in the mortal struggle that a short interval of comparative peace had been granted to her last hours. "Something," said physicians, "had worn Mrs. Lane out." That something was anxiety. It was expressed in her eager eyes, and in that restlessness of body which, in some degree, seems to us to lessen the anxiety of suffering.

"Dr. Burrows does not think I shall live till morning," she said, as Milly sat down by the bedside. "Months ago I entreated him to warn me when he saw my last hours of suffering approaching, in order that I might not put off till too late what I have to say to you. Send Martha to church and come back to me."

The old servant went unwillingly, and Mrs. Lane waited for the closing of the house-door before she spoke again.

"You know I have nothing to leave you, Milly," she said, at last; "my annuity dies with me. I thank God that you are loved and cared for. Had it been otherwise my last hours would have been sadder than they now are. Milly!" she added, suddenly, "do you remember your father?"

"Sometimes, mother, I think I do; but it is so long since he died. It must be more than fourteen years ago—before we came to Trowchester."

"Milly, is he not dead?"

"Not dead! Oh, mother! where is he?"

"He has been in England for more than a year."

"Why did he leave us? Mother, what mystery have you hid from me?"

"The wretched secret of my life. Your father's name—his and Lane's—is even now a reproach in men's mouths. By fraudulent means he obtained possession of property which he held in trust for others: whole families were reduced to beggars by his crime—widows and children have starved from its consequences. I came here with you, Milly, fifteen years ago, resolved, if it were possible, to keep you from the knowledge of the evil he had wrought. Deceit grew upon me, I cannot tell how, since it sprung from the love I bore my child. I called myself a widow. I made up some story of my former life that satisfied the people we have been thrown among, and I was thankful that its truth had never been called in question when Mr. Leslie asked you to be his wife. Think what the prejudices of his family would have been if the fact of your father being a convict had been known! Think of his attachment to you which induced him to hold to his engagement in defiance of the world's opinion, the knowledge of the fact would have destroyed your future happiness. Once, indeed, I tried to tell him, but my heart failed me."

"But, oh, mother! it is so unfair, so dishonest —forgive me, it is your affection for me, I know, that blinds you to the wrong-doing."

"I know it is the best. He could never have a better or truer wife than my Milly. Why should you suffer for your father's sin? For the sake of my child's peace, for the long years and days of anxiety and care, promise me, as you hope for mercy when you lie down to die, that you will never tell Robert Leslie what I have kept back from him. I do not ask it on the strength of my own claims, but I implore you. Your duty to use a furnished before your marriage to tell me he had returned a homeless man. My first impulse was to share with him the little I had. Then I thought of the ruin of your prospects from the degradation of his relationship, and the hard sentence of the world which it should be discovered. I looked around for a friend to whom I could confide my position. Of all I knew in this place I could only ask advice in this cruel strait of Mr. Wareham."

"Mr. Wareham!"

"As a lawyer and a friend he was qualified to aid me. I wrote to your father upon his suggestion, sending him what little money I could spare, and entreating him to remain in London till after your marriage."

"And you have heard from him since, mother?"

"Never—never since. A second letter I sent to the address he gave me was returned from the post-office some time ago."

"If Mr. Wareham should betray us!"

"Mr. Wareham promised me secrecy by everything he held sacred, and I hope, I pray, that he may keep his word."

Milly's head was hid in her hands, but nothing shut out the ticking of the clock that seemed noting only her mother's breathing.

"Promise me, my Milly!" said the faint voice, more feebly.

And in the deepening gloom, with her mother's head pillowed on her arm—hoping that sleep might come to the weary eyelids if she yielded—praying that she might be forgiven if in so doing she erred —Milly promised never to tell her husband her father's history, never to say or do any thing in reference to it which would alter her position as life. Leslie's wife.

Evening prayers had been said and sung. The footsteps of the passers-by vibrated through the room. Martha had let herself in at the house-door, and Milly heard her striking a light in the room beneath. Softly she came up the creaking stairs and opened the door, shading the candle with her hand. Why heed where its rays fell? Mrs. Lane was dead.

CHAPTER II.

THE house in which the Leslies lived was in one of the principal streets of Trowchester; but it was ill-contrived—its ceilings were low, and the rooms uninviting. Dark maroon curtains hung at the parlor windows. The furniture was of mahogany, and the chairs were covered with horse-hair. A large round table with a green cloth stood in the centre of the room; a few shelves filled with controversial books had been fixed against the walls, and three obelisks of gray marble decorated the mantle-piece. Milly's housekeeping keys lay in a basket on the table where she was the sole symbols of feminine occupation visible. How was it possible for the room to look otherwise than hard and bare? It was here that Milly, pale and saddened, was receiving a visit from her mother-in-law. Mrs. Lane had been dead a fortnight, and Mrs. Leslie, who had never liked her, found it difficult to express sympathy with the daughter's grief. Mrs. Lane, from the beginning of Robert Leslie's acquaintance with Milly, had been obnoxious in her eyes. She was not a member of Mr. Leslie's congregation. She was undeniably poor; and there was aggravation of injuries in the fact that there was nothing tangible in her manner, either to Mr. Leslie or the rest of the small Trowchester world, to which she could reasonably object. No one had accused her of match-making for her daughter, but yet half a dozen months had not gone by ere she had entrapped Mr. Leslie into the marriage. But all women judge each other harshly; and if the tallest and gentlest among them can not be exempted from the accusation, how much the more heavily must it fall upon the hard and exacting! Mrs. Leslie had had many struggles with adverse circumstances before she had seen her son safely placed in his present position. She was the widow of a dissenting preacher of some eminence in his day. He had died soon after the birth of her son, who was the youngest of her children. She had lost three others in their infancy, and the interest that each had individually inspired in her heart was now centred in him. By the most pinching economy in her own expenses his education had been carried on satisfactorily. Often, as she sat through the winter days in a dreary lodging, depriving herself a fire, and making a cup of tea at least twice a week do duty for dinner, she would dream of a future when his talents should be matured, and he should enter the ministry, as his father had done before him. And that future was realized, though not in the way she intended; for Robert Leslie entered the Established Church, and left behind him many prejudices which had clung to his parents. She had kept her son's house for five years when his acquaintance began with Milly Lane. She did not oppose his wishes with regard to his marriage; that course she felt would have been a futile one; but she withdrew from his home when it was finally arranged, and settled herself down once more in solitude. Who could deny that Milly was pretty? She had large, soft brown eyes, a sweet smile, and a flitting blush that came and went on small provocations, making her face look brighter than it was in reality.

"And for this," Mrs. Leslie thought, as she turned the matter over in her mind during many a long day and longer night, "my son has married her! She can't take a class in the school: she would not know Obadiah from Hezekiah: she could not cut out a pinafore if she tried for hours: Robert might preach new-fangled doctrine for a month, and she would never find it out. What could have induced her to fall in love with a woman whose character is so utterly dissimilar to his own?"

Mrs. Leslie was sitting with her daughter-in-law: a little starner and colder than usual, from being uncertain whether Milly was sufficiently mistress of herself to receive her observations with calmness. It had been a source of bitterness to Mrs. Leslie to find that "Milly" was not merely some pet diminutive, but a name that had been actually given in baptism; and at the commencement of their acquaintance she had suggested that she might address her daughter-in-law by a more conventional one. Somehow Mr. Leslie had fallen into the same habit, and Milly had become "Emilia" in her new home.

"Your constant attendance on your mother, Emilia—though I do not say you could have acted otherwise—has greatly interfered with your duties. You have scarcely ever been to evening chapel for the last three months; and on no less than four separate occasions I have observed that Robert's tea has not been ready on his return from the Sunday-school."

All this was true; and Milly making no reply, Mrs. Leslie continued:

"You have neglected several people, too, who have every claim upon your attention. Mrs. Bowle's Jemima has had measles: you have never once sent to inquire after her. Mrs. Crawley's cook and housemaid left her without notice: you should have offered her the services of one of the upper girls in the school. There little civilities are expected from a person in your position. Mr. Wareham tells me he has called twice when he knew you were at home, but that he has not seen you. Why is this? He is by far the most important and the most liberal member of your husband's congregation: he ought not to be slighted. He will most probably come in with your husband from the savings-bank this morning, and I beg you will not go up to your own room when they are discussing business matters. For my own part, I always found it better to take an interest in them when I lived with my son."

Well, sooner or later Milly knew she must meet Mr. Wareham again, and there might possibly be a sense of relief in the knowledge that their first interview would not be without witnesses. Not even her mother had ever known of her before her engagement to Mr. Leslie was declared, Mr. Wareham had suddenly and passionately told her that he loved her, and offered her in the face of the coldness and reserve with which she treated him, and that, let her answer be what it might, he should love her as long as they both lived. She remembered that she had turned from him with something like disgust—that his eye had glared for a moment like a madman's, and a vague dread of Mr. Wareham had taken possession of her mind from that period. To whom her mother's secret with him, of all persons in the world! She felt there was but one line of conduct to pursue. She must endeavor to keep in ignorance of the fact that her mother had confided to her the whole wretched history. All this, and much more in detail—not one among us can put on paper the thousand threads that form the woof of the human mind—all this had occurred to Milly when her mother-in-law announced Mr. Wareham's intended visit. He came in with Mr. Leslie a few minutes afterward. Never, perhaps, was there a greater contrast than that which existed between the two men. Mr. Leslie was tall and spare, with strongly-marked features, and a kindly expression in his eyes which was at variance with the severe set of his mouth. Mr. Wareham represented the opposite type. He was stout and tall: his face fair and handsome: his manners almost affectedly frank and open-hearted.

Poor Milly! Her eyes met Mr. Wareham's, and he knew in that one hurried glance that her mother had left the secrets in her keeping. He thought he had never seen her look so pretty since she had been Mr. Leslie's wife. Some strange sort of fascination drew her eyes to his, again and again, and he felt an intense degree of triumph in the idea that he might have it in his power to revenge himself for the cruel look of dislike which had seemed to sink into his very soul when he declared his love for her. A change was working in him which he made no effort to check. He had had no anger to ask her for love or her pity. It might be soon; it might be in the years to come: some day she should feel herself in his power.

If Milly's greeting was more shy and nervous than usual, her mother-in-law stored for it with a grim severity which was not always the characteristic of her manner. Mrs. Leslie had one of those natures which never feel antipathies for persons with whom they are brought in contact, and who are equally far from yielding to the attractions which are recognized by others. It might form a matter of speculation as to how far such people are independent of the troubles incident to a livelier sympathy,—or how, in avoiding such chances, they debar themselves from some of the purest pleasures of humanity. They grow up around us, and we cease to look for signs of interest from them: like trees on which we never hope to find fruit.

Mr. Wareham had some peculiarities—an occasional freedom of manner among them—that passed unheeded by Mrs. Leslie. Not so with her son. It was often a subject of regret to him that his chief supporter was a man whom somehow he felt he could not respect, although he had no definite cause of complaint against him; but Mr. Leslie was of an unsuspicious nature in spite of his reserve, and Wareham was too much in earnest from this time forth to risk the betrayal of his purpose by carelessness in Leslie's presence. And so the three sat and talked of the schools, and the charities, and the savings-bank, and debated whether the chapel walls would require white-washing in the following half year, and wondered if Mr. Larkins's bequest would be free from legacy duty. And Milly sat and listened, and felt as if a web were weaving round her, and that, struggle as she might, she would never be free again.

CHAPTER III.

WE can all remember some hours in our past life when the light has seemed brighter, the shadow darker, the joy fuller, and the pain sharper than at other periods. But we have probably passed from inexperience to maturity, and we have learned to check wholesale expenditure of the circumstances would awaken the sensations which now stand out with such terrible distinctness. In after-times, many little incidents were picked up by Milly's knees, and she thanked the Great Giver of Happiness for the full measure in which it had been forgotten: she only felt as if she should remember to her dying day all she went through at this time, to the exclusion of the rest of her life.

Wareham was more of a Sybarite than any other man in Trowchester. He lived at the back of his house in order to avoid the din of the market-place, and rose late in the day; so that Milly contrived, when necessity carried her into his nearer neighborhood, it should be at an hour in the morning when his most important client would have failed to rouse him from his bed. But she could not avoid meeting him at her mother-in-law's. Mrs. Leslie enjoyed nothing better in her cold debilitating way than entertaining her friends at lunch. Mr. Wareham, and two or three of Mr. Leslie's congregation in the evening.

It was not a sociable meeting. The visitors clung tenaciously to their tea-cups, as if they dreaded the interval that must elapse before politeness would permit them to go away; and Mrs. Leslie's thoughts were perpetually wandering back to the early days of her marriage, when the social gatherings of her sect had been of the severest possible character, strangely contrasting with the lukewarm dispositions of religious feeling among her son's friends. Mr. Leslie invariably declined to avail himself of the opportunities his mother threw in his way on these occasions of expounding the particular views she loved to hear dwelt upon. In her heart she accused him of undue tolerance of other people's tenets, and of some small amount of moral cowardice when he failed to express himself strongly in defense of the opinions of his childhood. It was on such evenings that all Milly's care and watchfulness were required to keep Mr. Wareham from her side. Gossips had begun to say that young Mrs. Leslie had grown strangely talkative with slight acquaintances, and her husband often looked round in astonishment when she seemed to be asking questions at random. Once or twice, when he heard her laugh with half a dozen people around her, he found himself wishing he had seen tears running down her cheeks instead; something in her voice so smote upon his heart. But she was trying hard to be cheerful, to take an interest in the small affairs of their community, to be on good terms with her mother-in-law, and to hold herself aloof from Mr. Wareham, without giving him cause for offense. With such weak weapons as these was she fighting off the evil day.

It came at last. One Tuesday morning—day, week, month, year, how they clung to Milly's memory afterward!—she was sitting at breakfast with Mr. Leslie, when, looking up, she met his eyes fixed on her with an earnest look she had never seen in them before. He had in his hand a letter which he had just read through, and which he folded up slowly and thoughtfully, and put in his pocket-book. Had she felt less shy she would have asked him if he had had bad news; but as it was, she sat glancing timidly at his face, and waiting for him to speak to her. He did so at last.

"I must go to London by the next train," he said, "and I shall not be back till Thursday. I must ask Mr. Broughton to take the Wednesday evening service for me. Go and fetch your bonnet while I write to him, and walk down to the station with me."

She ran up stairs in a moment. He so rarely asked her to go out, excepting on those occasions when their being separate would have excited remark, that her heart beat with pleasure at the prospect of a walk with him. His preparations were soon made. Again, as they stood in the doorway, she caught his eyes intently bent upon her, and tears rose to hers she knew not why. He took her in his arms, and kissed her again and again. He had left home for a few days at least half a dozen times before, and yet he had never done so. Well! it was a day of wonders.

On her way home she met Mrs. Leslie coming toward the station, full of curiosity to ascertain what urgent business had called her son to London. Milly did not know: she had not asked him. How often is ignorance as irritating as superior knowledge!

"Not asked him!" said Mrs. Leslie, indignantly. "You would let him preach in a surplice without inquiring whether he had taken leave of his senses. When my son lived with me, he never went any where without my cognizance. I really wonder at the indifference with which you see him go about his ordinary avocations without attempting to interfere; but to let him leave Trowchester, and not to know what his address is in London: to suffer him to absent himself on a Wednesday evening, too, without remonstrating with him; it is incredible!"

Milly walked on silently. She had been sunning herself in her husband's kindness, and it was like waking out of a soft, warm sleep to the reality of a winter morning to listen to Mrs. Leslie's reproaches. She did not content herself with her present grievance alone. It seemed as if her son's unaccountable absence had aroused a latent ire which she determined to expend upon his wife.

"Then, again, what is the use of a cushion in the pulpit? Robert has never touched it for the last three months. I watch him closely. The last time he struck it with any energy was on the 15th of February. He is losing all his fervor and emphasis. I certainly blame you for not constantly reminding him, as I used to do formerly, that energetic action ought always to accompany a pulpit discourse."

Milly returned to her own home, but Mrs. Leslie bent her steps to Mr. Wareham's, in search of information. She found that Mr. Wareham was unaware of any cause for her son's absence; but he was greatly abstracted and preoccupied when he learned her tidings, and so evidently anxious that her visit should be a short one, that she was obliged to take her departure without obtaining any clew to what she considered a mystery.

Later in the day Mr. Wareham presented himself at Mr. Leslie's house. He saw that Milly had turned deadly pale at his entrance, and he noticed that when she rose from her seat she steadied herself by leaning on the table near her. He, too, was pale. He had caught sight of his face in a looking-glass as he was leaving his own sitting-room, and he knew that it wore an expression which was not its ordinary one. As he sat down opposite to her, he thought, as he had done many times before, if she had been in his home, what a different place that home would have been! Even now, it was not beyond the verge of possibility. Was it likely she cared so very much for Robert Leslie? Would he not shut himself up in his coldness and reserve, if he imagined there was the slightest wavering in her duty? Wareham knew that he was morbidly sensitive on many points, and had seen him quail before a gossiping tongue. He had a plan, and if that plan succeeded Trowchester would no longer hold him. No matter. There was his brother's home in Sydney, where he would be welcome; there was a London practice which he could have at little or no sacrifice. His one object attained, the world was all before him to begin again.

"I have ventured to come, Mrs. Leslie," he said, speaking slowly, "for the purpose of discussing some private business with you. I do not know whether you are aware that shortly before your marriage your mother confided to me a very important circumstance, which she wished to remain unknown to Mr. Leslie."

Milly assented by gesture; words she could not find.

"Of course, the confidence reposed in me by Mrs. Lane—or rather Mrs. Vining, for such you are perhaps aware was her real name—has been held sacred, and I should not now put myself into communication with her daughter upon the subject, did I not think it my duty to lay before you certain facts connected with the case."

He paused, in order that his listener might speak: he was sure he heard her heart beating: an old story about a rattlesnake and a bird came into his head as he saw her sitting breathlessly waiting for what was to come.

"Shortly after, Mrs. Vining, acting upon my advice, had written to her husband; he applied to me under circumstances of great distress. He had been seized with illness: he knew his wife's inability to aid him at the time, and he felt sincere regret for the evil he had already brought upon his family. I was glad, for your mother's sake, to be able to help him in his trouble, and I have since provided him with the means of support. I did not inform your mother of Mr. Vining's application to me, because I knew, in the position in which she had placed herself with regard to Mr. Leslie, it was impossible for her to act openly in the matter, and her health was then fast failing her."

"Oh, thank you! thank you! Mr. Wareham," cried Milly, tears falling from her eyes unheeded. "You spared her much anxiety at the last."

"The reason of my addressing myself to you now is this," resumed Mr. Wareham: "Mr. Vining's days are numbered. He is living at Brentnor" (this was the name of a little watering-place about seven miles from Trowchester), "and I see him whenever I can find time to drive over. He has asked me to assure you of his deep repentance of his fault, and to beg your forgiveness for the past."

"Oh, my poor father!" sobbed Milly. "Forgive him! Tell him, Mr. Wareham, that I love him dearly, and if I could only see him—"

"That I had thought of," said Mr. Wareham, "and it is possible an interview might be arranged. He wishes to hear from your own lips that you do not hate him as the cause of your mother's sufferings. Of course this could only be in Mr. Leslie's absence."

"But if I could tell him, Mr. Wareham," said Milly, "if I could only tell him! He would forgive the deception, and provide for my poor father's support, if I might only kneel down at his feet and tell him what I have suffered."

"It is not to be thought of for one moment," said Mr. Wareham. "I know his character thoroughly, and do not doubt his kindness; but I say again, it must not be. What I have done I have done, and there is, I fear, but little more to do." He rose to go. "I shall be in Brentnor to-morrow, and I will let you know, on my return, in what state I have found Mr. Vining."

Once more alone, Milly reproached herself for her ingratitude to Mr. Wareham. All the while she had been distrusting him he had been doing, without a word of thanks, what she would have given every thing she possessed not to have left undone. To picture to herself her poor broken-down father, longing for a few words of kindness from her lips; to reproach herself for not having endeavored to seek him out after her mother's death; at one moment, to long to break her promise, and tell her husband the miserable story; at the next, to try how she could hide it from him more completely—such was the current of Milly's thoughts, and bitter, and wretched, and self-humiliating they were.

The night dragged slowly on, and she rose on the following day in a fever of excitement. She watched and waited, starting at the sound of every footstep, till five o'clock in the afternoon, when Mr. Wareham came in hurriedly. He said he had just returned from Brentnor; he had been there all night; Mr. Vining was evidently sinking, and he feared, unless she saw him within a few hours, in this world they could not meet at all.

"Let me go to him, Mr. Wareham!" she implored. "Let me go to him!"

"If there were a railroad to Brentnor there would be no difficulty," he replied; "but the drive there and back will occupy at least three hours, and your mother-in-law would doubtless hear of your absence. Could you not excuse yourself from attending service at the chapel with her this evening, and, as soon as she has gone, take a fly to Brentnor?"

"Oh yes, yes," said Milly, who had seen all the difficulty of freeing herself from Mrs. Leslie's companionship, and was thankful for the suggestion; "but it will be dark; if I do not find a fly—"

"I will take care that one is waiting for you at the market-cross at a quarter to seven," said Mr. Wareham, "and I will give instructions to the driver. The people of the house in which your father lives are prepared for your coming."

Milly acquiesced in the arrangement.

He calculated, he said, that it would be quite possible for her to get back to Trowchester before half past nine, the time when Mr. Broughton's hearers would most likely be at liberty to return to their homes, and when her own coming in would probably pass unnoticed.

She tried to thank him, but her words were lost in her tears. How should she look her husband in the face when he returned? How should she ever wipe out the debt of gratitude she owed Mr. Wareham?

Ding, dong, ding. Ding, dong, ding. The cathedral bells again.

She had listened to them as evening after evening sped by in hope, in doubt, in misery. They were associated in her memory with the few eventful hours of her life. Now they rung warnings, reproaches, revilings into her ears. Whichever way she turned there was treachery, either to her mother's memory or her husband's love.

Mrs. Leslie, calling according to her custom, saw that her daughter-in-law looked fevered and ill, and not ungraciously accepted her excuses. The door had no sooner closed upon her than Milly ran breathlessly to her room, dressed herself in haste, and took her way to the market-cross just as the twilight was deepening into shadow. A fly was drawn up in front of the old stone pile. Milly hesitated a moment as the driver approached her.

"For Brentnor?" he said. "Mr. Wareham has given me my orders."

She got in. She noticed that a man hastily jumped upon the box beside the driver. She was in a state of feverish excitement, by which every nerve was sharpened. Her throat was parched; she could hardly draw her breath, and, with her face turned toward the open window to catch the cool air, she saw she was leaving the town of Trowchester behind her, and speeding out toward the open country.

CHAPTER IV.

Robert Leslie had concluded the business which called him to London sooner than he expected, and, unwilling to be absent from his home an hour longer than was necessary, he had put himself into a train which was due at Trowchester at seven o'clock, and was thinking over the surprise it would be to his wife to see him back again a day earlier than she expected. The railroad passed under the road which led to Brentnor, close by the station, which was nearly a mile from the market-place of Trowchester, and this distance he resolved upon walking, leaving his bag to be sent up to the town. We all know how likely we are to fall into reverie when we are not in the least hurried; when we have for the moment no dominant feeling; when we are walking—as Robert Leslie was—in a quiet, country road, the twilight almost gone, the stars flashing out at wide intervals, and shadows, deep and soft, settling on the surrounding landscape. But Mr. Leslie had been communing with himself for many a long hour. He had been married for nearly two years, and, somehow, during this time his ideal happiness had slipped farther and farther away from his grasp, and a negative kind of content occupied its place. Was Milly happy? He was afraid not. How seldom her eye grew lighter, or her cheek brighter, when he came! And yet it had been what people call a love-match. Do we not see our own faults? There are moments of self-examination when their presence and identity are no less clearly recognized than our features are in the looking-glass before us; and Mr. Leslie felt that his extreme reserve—the result, perhaps, only of his early training—had chilled the heart of his wife as distinctly as if some far-seeing friend had laid his finger on the fault and pointed it out to him. There have been some few fortunate people in the world who have been able to gather up the tangled skeins of the destinies they marred, and have woven them afresh. Mr. Leslie was doing this; thinking how Milly's should be made a brighter life; thinking that, gratefully as he had always acknowledged his mother's sacrifices in his youth, they formed no claim for a certain degree of tyranny which she had since exercised in his household; thinking how much happier Milly would be away from the dull house in Trowchester; thinking joyfully, hopefully, as he felt he had reason to do of the future: when, having reached the road that led to Brentnor, he stood for a moment, waiting for a fly, which was coming up at full speed, to pass him. Was he dreaming? Had he thought of her till his mind was leaving him? A wild cry struck his ears. "Robert! Robert!" A wild cry, as if from a voice that had no power to shriek. If indeed he were sane, it must have come from the carriage that passed him. It was almost out of sight. Utterly bewildered, he was unaware of the approach of a person on horseback from the direction of the town, a middle-aged farmer, on a large-limbed gray mare, which had carried him at a lazy pace for the last ten years. He recognized Mr. Leslie, and wished him good-evening.

"Did a carriage pass you just now?" asked Mr. Leslie, hastily, without attending to his greeting.

"Surely," was the reply.

"With a woman in it?"

"Surely."

"Mr. Lindsay—you will think it an odd request—will you lend me your mare for half an hour? I'll bring her back to you safe."

"No fear of that, Mr. Leslie," replied the farmer, good-naturedly, getting off as quickly as habitual slowness would permit him. "I'll just walk down to the station, and be here by the time you are back."

Mr. Leslie's weight was about two-thirds less than his friend's, and the mare, urged by voice and touch, started at a tolerable pace. In two or three minutes the fly was again in sight: he could see that the man seated on the box looked back several times, and the rate at which the vehicle was moving was almost doubled. On went the mare, gathering strength and spirit from her unwonted exertions: the space between the pursuer and the pursued lessening at every step; the way becoming more and more obscure.

How often in moments of strong excitement it has seemed as if dumb animals, our dogs or our horses, have sympathized more kindly with us than our fellow-creatures! Leslie was breathless with eagerness as he came within hail of the fly, and the mare could with difficulty be held in. He shouted to the driver to stop, but his voice was disregarded, and in another moment he was abreast of the vehicle. He had endeavored to overtake it, because he was persuaded he had heard his wife's voice as it passed him; but yet he was almost stupefied with astonishment when her pale face met his. To seize the driver's arm and possess himself of the reins, in spite of his resistance, was the work of a moment, when a heavy blow with the but-end of a whip, aimed at his head but falling on his shoulder, caused him to look for his assailant. It was with extreme surprise that he recognized Wareham.

They were at this juncture opposite one of the little roughly-built houses faced with round stones stuck in the clay which are every where to be seen on the south coast. Here was to be sold "Beer to be drunk on the premises;" and two or three persons, who seemed by their bewilderment by no means to have disregarded the injunction, ran out to see what had happened. Mr. Leslie sprang off the mare, and having thrown the bridle to the first-comer, forced the terrified driver to dismount. Wareham, too, had got down, perhaps still hoping that the horse might be urged on, if he could possess himself of the reins.

"Take care, Robert Leslie," he said, as they met face to face; "you had better let me pass. This evening's work will be the worst in your life if you persist in stopping my way."

Leslie, not heeding him, had opened the carriage door. Milly got out with trembling steps.

"Why are you here?" he asked, impetuously.

"Mrs. Leslie is with me with her own full consent," said Wareham. "I appeal to her to say whether this is not the truth."

There was no reply. Leslie half-carried half-dragged her into the house, and pushing open the first door, which was that of a little sanded parlor, looked in her face by the light of the solitary tallow-candle which was burning there.

"I ask you," said Leslie, steadying his voice, "why are you here?"

"Robert, forgive me; don't think ill of me," she said. "I have been tied by a sacred promise to keep a secret—"

"A secret with which he is acquainted?" said Leslie, indignantly pointing to Wareham, who had followed them into the room. "Till this night," he said, turning to him, "I have looked upon you and treated you as a friend. In some underhand manner you have abused this trust."

"I have abused no trust," replied Mr. Wareham, with emphasis.

"You are mistaken," interrupted Mr. Leslie, contemptuously, "if you think I believe my wife to be any thing but the victim of some willful misrepresentation on your part. Your malice is harmless there."

"Possibly," replied Mr. Wareham, who felt that he had but his last card to play. "Hark you, Robert Leslie! You think I owe you an explanation of this night's proceedings. Mrs. Leslie is with me voluntarily; but ostensibly, I may say, on affairs relating to certain family antecedents with which it is not desirable that you should become acquainted."

"You may speak freely," said Mr. Leslie, looking at him coldly.

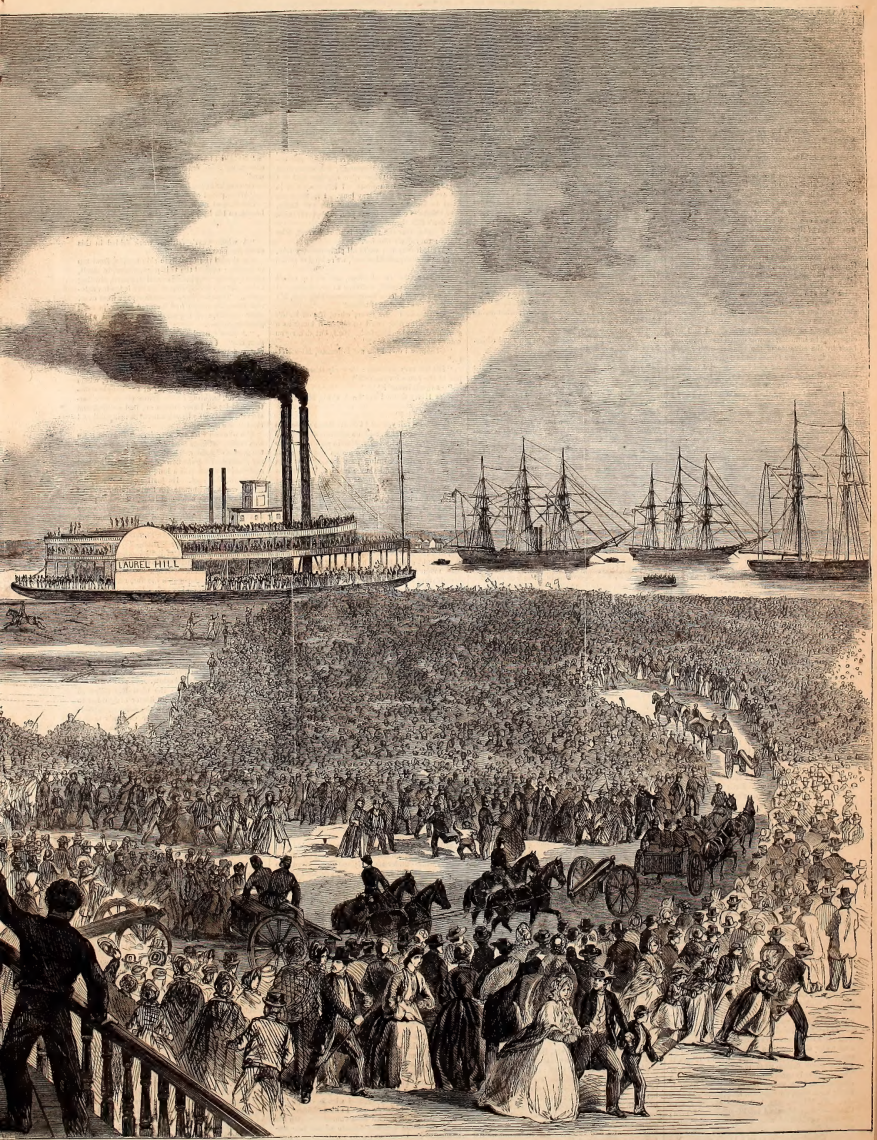
"I intend to do so—in Trowchester," replied Mr. Wareham, his face growing white. "You have won from me the only woman I ever loved. Guard yourself from the tongues of the fools who have hitherto looked up to you. Hide yourself from scoffing eyes, from your mother's reproaches, from your friends' sneers. It may be a poor revenge, and it has been long in coming, but it will be some satisfaction to me to see your position, when it is known to your small world that your wife is the daughter of a returned convict."

And with that last shaft, flung with the bitterest look of hatred, Mr. Wareham turned and left the room. Mr. Leslie closed the door, and stood thoughtfully before his wife.

"It is true, Robert," she said, the tears raining from her eyes. "But I did not know it when I married you. I did not know how much I had injured you till my mother's death. My poor father wished to see me before he died, and Mr. Wareham was taking me to him."

"My poor girl! My poor Milly!" he said, taking her in his arms. "He is dead. I stood beside his grave this morning. It was to see him carried to it that I went to London. Some day we will go and look at it together. Milly, you remember the night before our marriage? I left your mother's house later than usual. I found a wretched-looking man watching by the door. He evidently knew who and what I was. At first I could hardly believe his statements; but when I recalled many circumstances connected with your mother I began to think that what he said might be true. It was a sad, sad story; and he was both ill and desperate. In the morning the whole affair would be known in Trowchester. I had but a few minutes to choose between giving you up or purchasing his silence. I took him to an out-of-the-way inn, where he could rest and refresh himself till a train started for London, and I did not lose sight of him till he was safely in it. I then wrote to an old friend in London in whom I knew I could place confidence, directing him to provide your father with necessaries, and to procure him medical advice. From time to time I have learned that all efforts to restore his health have been unavailing, and on Tuesday morning you saw me open the letter which announced his death. How Mr. Wareham got possession of the secret, and how far he intended to abuse his knowledge of it, I shall never seek to know. I only have been to blame, for I have acted like a coward from first to last. Forgive me, Milly!"

What more he said, and in what words she replied, is it not written in the memories of both?



"Although the day be ever so long,
At last it will ring for evening song."

Robert Leslie and his wife left Trowchester a few weeks afterward. He had been offered a better and wider field for his ministry in London, whither his mother did not care to follow him, his successor giving her far greater satisfaction, in a doctrinal point of view, than he had ever done.

Mr. Wareham went out to Australia, having married the daughter of a farmer a few days before his departure—a kind-hearted, cherry-cheeked girl, who had long hopelessly admired him in secret, and who accepted gratefully the small amount of affection he proffered. And if the Trowchester people repeated every story but the right one concerning them all, what did it signify? We are mistaken if we think a wonder ever lasts out the nine days which the old saying allots to it.

SCENE ON THE LEVEE AT NEW ORLEANS ON THE DEPARTURE OF THE PAR

OLED REBEL PRISONERS, FEBRUARY 20, 1863.—Sketched by Mr. Hamilton.—[See Page 186.]

EXTRAORDINARY EXCITEMENT IN NEW ORLEANS.

A VERY extraordinary exhibition of public feeling took place in New Orleans on Friday the 20th ult., which threw the whole city in the wildest excitement; but was, fortunately, attended with no serious consequences. We illustrate the scene on pages 184 and 185.

It having been publicly announced that a dago-et-truce boat would leave on Friday to convey some 382 pardoned prisoners to Baton Rouge, and there exchange them on board a rebel vessel for Port Hudson, an immense concourse of the disloyal portion of the community congregated on the levee to see them go off. The Empire Parish, with the prisoners on board, was lying at the foot of Canal Street, and Laurel Hill—second immediately ahead of her—was selected by about 1000 at least, who crowded into and upon every part of her, to see the rebel prisoners and cheer them.

The Empire Parish had been advertised to leave at three o'clock, and it must have been as early as now that the masses commenced to assemble. By two o'clock the whole levee, in its enormous width and extending all the way from Canal to Julia Street, was one dense sea of human heads; a large proportion of them females wearing scesh badges, and many openly waving little rebel flags—an insult not confined to their sex alone.

Seeing that matters were assuming a disgraceful if not alarming aspect, notice was sent to General Bowen, advising him of the fact, and suggesting the necessity of sending down some troops. The order was at once given, and soon a squad of the Twenty-sixth Massachusetts were on the ground, and a portion of a battery came threading its way through the crowd.

The scene at this moment was grand and exciting. The immense crowds on the levee swaying back by the advance of the soldiery—the Laurel Hill and the Empire Parish both one living mass of human beings cheering vociferously—and the balconies and windows facing the river loaded in every available spot, even to the roofs—the females screaming and waving their handkerchiefs, scarfs, flags, and parasols.

The order being given, the soldiers began to make the crowd move back; a delicate task not easy to effect, as those who were all in front, unscreaming the men behind an impassable and invincible barrier of crinoline. The soldiers, however, behaved with perfect temper, patience, and decency, making no reply to the insulting taunts from hundreds of the weaker sex, but, holding their muskets horizontally, gently forced back the crowd.

The balconies were also cleared of all their demonstrative occupants, and thus at last the whole mass was granulidged into quietness, and the Empire Parish had to crawl off quietly in the night without that grand parade for which the rebels evidently expected, and which the scene in the levee the day clearly promised. Upon the whole, it was a disgraceful, but highly exhibiting, scene, and one which certainly ought to have been, and could have been, prevented had any ordinary means been used for avoiding its occurrence.

REPAIRING THE LEVEE AT NEW ORLEANS.

We publish on page 181 an illustration which represents the work of REPAIRING THE LEVEE AT NEW ORLEANS. Our picture shows a forces of four or five hundred workmen, all Union men, employed by direction of the military authorities.

They are building new bulk-heads to protect this portion of the city from the danger of inundation, threatened by the steady encroachments of the Mississippi, the current sweeping into the sharp curve with great velocity, gradually wearing away and undermining the levee. The new levee, the process of construction of which is shown in the sketch, is probably but temporary, as a new one will be erected against the new bulk-head when the flood has subsided sufficiently to permit it. The large Gothic building in the back-ground is in an unfinished condition. Built for charitable purposes from a bequeathed for that object by a citizen of New Orleans named Touro, from whom it derives its name, "Touro Building," it is used at present as the head-quarters of the Native Louisiana Native Guard (colored), which regiment is in process of formation.

ONE WOMAN'S WILL.

THERE had been a grand gala in the little town of Wilton, the like of which had not been known in years. It had created more talk than campmeeting or the county fair; had flattered more fair damsels, and given more zest to gossip than any training-day inspired; for it had been a ball given by the Widow Wilton. All little towns have their great houses, but none invoked more veneration than the old Wilton manor. It was something set apart from the common grass, hidden in dense foliage, surrounded by a park which retained the familiar aspect of one yet owned by English Wiltons, and which the sacred presence few villagers ever strayed. Of course all this reserve and dignity was not maintained without some loss of feudal grandeur. Invidious criticisms were often indulged in; covetousness and envy created wider rents than Wilton hauteur; and as small matters are the natural aliment of narrow minds, great faults were made of little flaws. There were only three occupants of the great house after all, and no young ladies to make it, as it might have been, the centre of hospitality and gayety. Mr. Wilton, pere, had made his fortune in China—was a cold, intelligent, sensible man; his wife, an invalid, sweet-tempered and gentle; the son, Ray, a combination of both, with more beauty than is thought to be a man's share. Yet these three people were of far more account than all Wilton put together, just because they happened to be very wealthy.

Snubbed or pitied, envied or hated, none of the Wilton invitations were refused for the grand ball, and every one, after it, coincided in declaring that nothing could have been finer.

The house itself was very plain but spacious; great airy rooms and wide piazzas, somewhat bizarre from their curious quantity of Chinese furniture and ornaments; every room lighted, and the profusion of shrubs and flowers made a garden of it for the bewildered eyes of Wiltonia. Of course there had been music and dancing, and, spite of the awe which awkward country swains could not but feel in the presence of those whom their own fancy had so indulgit, ever man was put at ease by the graceful suavity of Ray Wilton. He had, as I have said, the attributes of both parents, but in manner an art of his own.

Hardly had the memory of the ball faded before there came another excitement, quite as unusual and even more exciting. Ray Wilton was engaged to be married—not to some bewitching city belle, not even to the pretty blonde Miss Davis, whom all ther was Mr. Wilton's richest tenant—but to that plain, strange, silent creature, Marian Woodward, old Mr. Woodward the clergyman's daughter.

"You don't say so!"

"Yes I do. Don't you remember her at the party, in a black silk dress, and no color in her face?"

"Aunt Sally, not that Miss Woodward!"

"What a fuss you are all making!" put in a new voice. "Marian's a very nice girl, quite genteel. She reads her father's Greek and Hebrew Bible, and she can jabber French like a 'pauly vous.'"

"But Ray, Miss Davis, and the carriages!"

"Handsome is that handsome does; what makes him better than other men?"

"But she is ugly."

"To those who like nothing but pink and white, I say she's an elegant—"

"Oh, oh!" from a chorus of voices.

"Why don't you let me go on? She is right handsome. She's got good eyes, and white teeth, and she's as straight as a rush."

"And she'll put on more airs than ever now."

"You mustn't judge Marian by yourself, Betsy Jane. Marian Woodward's no fool. You'll all go down on your knees before her if she ever is Mrs. Wilton; so you'd better change your habit of railing of people. Good-day."

I guess Hetty expects to make the wedding-dress, for she's always been Marian's friend.

"Oh no, she and Marian always were cronies. Well, well, I wonder what will happen next!"

That which did happen was the death of old Mr. Woodward, hardly to the surprise of any, though greatly to the affliction of Marian, whose life, since she was motherless, had been wonderfully dreary, had been devoted to her loving, venerable father. That had first attracted Ray Wilton toward Marian was the beauty of their mutual attachment between her and her father: it was so chivalrous, if the term may be used, so graceful, yet so warm and faithful that he had to admire it, to admire first, and afterward to love: for to know Marian Woodward was to love her. His courtship had been short and ardent; Marian, not shyly, yielded without coyness. She had a woman's natural preference for gallantry and polish, and Ray, and a very childlike trust and faith in those she loved. She was not in the least exalted at the idea of becoming a Wilton, and Ray's mother, Mr. Wilton, and Mrs. Wilton already received her with sincere expressions of regard—though village gossip avowed all its contrary.

Soon after the funeral Marian, to save herself future pain, undertook to arrange her father's effects, and among his papers found those from which she drove the blood from her cheek and set her heart palpitating with unknown fear. It contained a revelation as to her mother; that mother, at that moment, she could not collect her scattered wits. In the room where she was sitting—her father's study—was a bright fire, and Marian, kneeling, threw big hickory, hissing and crackling on top, at bottom a bed of soft, feathery ashes: one moment she had the letter in her hand—the next the paper in her hand was curling up in its smoke, but again, in a second, she had snatched it from the flame and held it again in her possession, scorched and blackened, as was also her hand.

Slowly the day passed away, and still she sat silently before the fire with this record, this secret of paper in her hand: evening came, and with it Ray Wilton, who found her in the same position, pale, stern, and fearless. She gave him the paper to read, and watched him as he too grew pale over its contents. He had forgotten to be suaved to draw her toward him; but with the embrace was gone she drew away with apparent effort, but very firmly.

"There can be no more of this, Ray. You are free again. Shall we say good-by now?"

"You are not in earnest, Marian?"

"Quite so."

"This may not be true; and even if it were, you know I love you, Marian."

"I am saving you an awkward necessity: it would have to come sooner or later."

He was pacing the floor excitedly, head down, stroking his long mustache, half thinking she was right—struggling between, as he thought, love and honor; but the two are never divided. There had never been a blot on the Wilton escutcheon. Could he be the one to blend the bar sinister on so fair a shield?

"I have thought it all out, Ray, looked at it in all lights. Let us not keep each other in suspense."

She was very cool and calm: so much so that he was nearly deceived, and felt like bursting out in bitter reproaches. But she had come to him, and put her hand softly in his. His quick pressure thrilled her with pain; for the tender white skin was more burned than in her greater pain she had been conscious of. Again he remonstrated. She was immovable, and half in anger half in sorrow he left her. That whole night she walked her bedroom floor, her burned hand stinging, her broken heart numb. In the morning she was gone, no one knew whither—not even the old servants who had charge of the rectory; and all Wilton said that Ray had jilted Marian, for he too went away to Europe.

II.

In a tiny parlor of a little cottage, on a lane leading from the Wilton highway, sat a woman sewing one cold winter evening. It was not yet evening either in the strict Northern sense; for it was not dark, and the pale light of gold that was fast being gathered up in the deep shades of purple showed that no moon was out going down behind those little western hills over which swept down a chilly breeze.

Faster than the needle went in and out of its work came the low refrain of words set to rhyme—not a song, though the voice of itself was nearly music, [and a sweet chanting of some old poem, rich in English melody—interrupted by the entrance of a brisk little personage, who came in at the moment with "How d'ye do, Marian? I just stopped in for a minute. I left the bread in the oven too, so I can't stay long. I thought you must be lonesome. So one but me, you know, ever thinks of coming to see you. People all think you don't like them."

"I should say the reverse is more correct, Miss Hetty: they don't like me."

"Well, it may be; we're all plain country folk, and you're a wonderful scholar, we're kind of afraid of you."

"Women who live all alone—and are not school madams, are generally believed to be witches. I suppose I should have been arrested long ago, if I had lived in Salem in witch time."

"Or thrown in the river, when, if you hadn't sunk and drowned, you'd surely been hung as a genuine witch. Ha, ha, ha! Well, but don't you want to hear some news?"

"Of course I do; I am not inhuman, Miss Hetty."

"It's not very pleasant: they say there's small pox at the house on the hill."

"At the Old Hall?"

Miss Hetty nodded her head, eying Marian askance.

"Who has it?"

"Well, I'll tell you all I know. Some weeks ago Ray came home sick, and no one knew what was the matter with him. Martin said it was his sorrows fever, when all at once a sign was put up at the great gate informing people that there was small-pox there, and that any Mrs. Wilton can not get a nurse for love nor money, and they've got to send to the city for one."

There was a reply, and presently Marian asked some other commonplace question, which in a reverse way reminded Miss Hetty that the bread in the oven might be burned, and sang of sorrow that she thought of his bright handsome face, now perhaps made hideous by disease. She had wound herself from other thoughts, from other sorrows. The Past had been buried without blame, without reproach; but the world had been to make her a lonely, solitary creature, without ties of kindred or society. Her religion was that described in the first chapter of the fourth verse of St. James, that which she strove to possess. In no other way was she known in the homes of other people. As the light waned she could not sew, though she became more and more restive, till at last she rose under its impulse, lighted a candle, and went to her bedroom, from which she emerged in bonnet and cloak.

The evening, though chilly, was a tranquil one; stars were shining out, as swiftly over the meadows Marian sped along, thinking of that line in "Evangeline" where the stars are spoken of as the "forget-me-nots of the angels." She reached the village shortly, and lifted a brass knocker, on which was most portentously graven the name of Dr. Martin. The Doctor was in, was just going to tea, but condescended to listen to Marian's errand. "Are you afraid too?" was his reply to her question, but without impatience. took her into his office. Quickly her arm was bared, and she was vaccinated, while she was asking to know whether it was prudent to venture near contagion at once, she hurried up the long hill which led to the Wilton manor-house.

Stiller, graver than ever, it seemed to hold itself aloof in the solemn darkness of the night with the fearful illness within it; and the servants who let her in warned her that no one ventured so far. She silently dismissed the subject, and asked to see Mrs. Wilton, who, in her invalid state, was unavoidably nervous and alarmed.

Coolly and quietly she announced her wish with as much deliberation and calmness, that, after a short consultation with her husband, Mrs. Wilton acceded to her request. It was simply that she might act as she was about to do, could for their son Ray. And so once more they met. He in high delirium, unconscious, often uttering her name; she risking her life for his, and for the sore him. Once she did, indeed, peer into the mirror, wondering what were these scars she should it be pitted and scarred with this fearful scourge; and smiled to see how thin, and white, and hollow-eyed she had become in her nightly vigils. The net was hardly one of vanity.

With the first decided symptom of recovery Marian vanished. Ray, almost unconscious of the unwearying care she had bestowed upon him; and again would she have taken flight, for more than ever did the evil village gossip—accusations of the unwearying care she had bestowed upon him; and again would she have taken flight, for more than ever did the evil village gossip—accusations that all would she avoid the thanks which would be thought her due. But suddenly one day Ray opened up conscious eyes, and with something of Wilton hauteur bade her come to his bedside.

For a moment or two he devoured her with his great eyes—the one fine feature of his face unharmed. He looked at her as wistfully as a hungry beggar gazes at good things beyond his reach.

"I wonder you do not run off again, Marian. Do you know what I have been doing these three years?"

"No."

"Cursing my cowardice for giving in to that one night."

"You could not help it."

"Indeed I could; to tell the truth I was shocked and hurt, and confounded family pride made a fool of me."

"Hush, hush!"

"But now I suppose you would scorn to touch me with your finger tips."

"Do stop, Ray." And already she had stopped and put her own, about him, pride and resolution flung to the winds.

"You will take back all you said, Marian?" was put, with a touch of the sweet grace of old.

"No, Ray." Again she rose erect.

"Marian?"

"Not till I have made a name for myself; won something from fame which fortune has denied me."

He caught at the half promise.

"What proud words! But I may hope then?"

She stooped again, felt the sweet fragrance of her breath on his lips, and was gone.

III.

"A whole year's faithful work folded in this short compass."

She turned the look from side to side, from top to bottom; opened the title-page, where, in small, clear type her own initials stood on guard, glinting at her, but never offering to acknowledge her adoration. Then another and another page went over, and thoughts which had haunted her brain rang their musical, undying strains out from the white gleaming paper.

"A year's hard work, two years since I have seen Ray:" and the book, vessel of shrining, I want rest and peace, and my heart aches with its loneliness."

This the proud woman whose name had been heralded as possessing the Promethean fire, whom letters sought from her fear of her haughty disdain; who, basking on the atmosphere of one's tastes, had let all lesser things go, bad studied, and striven, and accomplished, where the many fail and the few are successful.

She went on with her reverie. "The first taste was weak, but praise for women is apt to prove like the apples of Sodom. Let me see what the papers say;" and drawing the newspaper her publisher had sent her, it was a long and flattering review of her work, she read. Its justice pleased her, the praise was discriminates, its fault-finding aroused no emotion, it was calm and kind, she could profit by it. Then she turned over the paper idly, came to the advertisements, smiled at the puffs of her book in long primer, came to the marriage announcements, and read: "In Florence, at the United States Consulate, Ray Wilton—" She read no more, a blank sense of intolerable pain benumbed sight, her brain whirled, and she fell over in her chair quite senseless. When she recovered she crushed the paper in a drawer, rang for a bell, and threw herself on her bed. Her maid came in alarm, went at once for a physician, who forbade her rising in a week or more or incur the penalty —brain fever. She was in the city alone, and refusing all guests; yet every day, though as yet spring gave no sign of approach, came a bunch of blue violets wrapped lovingly round with geranium leaves. In all her wretchedness and pain these little flowers seemed to whisper tender pity—the soft, faint, delicate perfume breathed of a balm which God lets Nature bestow.

Yet health came not; fever she had fled so heavily. One day the kind doctor begged her to reveal her sorrow, for he saw the mind was suffering more than the body. Her woman's nature shrank from an avowal. Then he asked her to let him bring a friend who was the friend whose faithfulness the flowers evinced. The consent was given languidly, when to her absolute horror appeared Ray Wilton.

She was sitting in a huge chair near the window as he entered. So thin and haggard was she that he almost started at the sight. But Marian rose and greeted him as she would have done a stranger. Their cold salutations over, the physician withdrew, when Ray, who had at first been paralyzed by her coldness, rushed to Marian and clasped her in his arms. In vain she spoke; she was too feeble to resist; but he did not listen.

"My poor, darling Marian, how could you be so heartless as to keep me away so long, and you so ill, so wretched—you who sacrificed every thing for me in my illness, who would have given your life to have saved mine—"

"Ray, I can not bear this. Tell me at once, are you married?"

"My Marian! I—a Wilton—sworn to you all my life—a traitor to my vows!"

"But look—" She tottered to the desk in which she had confined the newspaper so fatal to her peace, and gave it to him.

In place of proud indignation came a look of repentant pity as his eyes filled in spite of himself.

"My dearest Marian, this is my father's wedding. Mamma died the month after he went away, and, as you see, his ready Ray Wilton, Senior, to Maude Vernon Harcourt—an old, faded English belle, who has taken my father on sufferance. She will not even come to this country, so Wilton is to be your abiding-place should you choose it."

Then Marian remembered how she had hinted before reading the whole, and how in her utter heart-weariness, it had only seemed a just retribution for her pride and ambition.

So Wilton Manor won a young mistress, who brought to it new laurels, fresh and green; but to her husband Marian was always and only the sweet, simple-hearted, loving woman she had been in old Mr. Woodward's rectory—not her father's house; for in the paper found in Mr. Woodward's library she had discovered herself to be destitute legally of that parental relation. No one, however, save Ray Wilton, knows that to this day; and were the two not equivalent, nis wife's honor would be dearer to him than his own.

Miss Hetty did make the wedding-dress, after all, and it fitted very nearly as stylishly as the Parisian robes which were imported for the occasion; but Marian would have worn it had it been far less successful; and Miss Hetty yet insists that all the girls in Wilton are envious of Marian.

PERSIAN STORIES.

THE PERSIANS have been renowned as story-tellers throughout the East for many ages. It is a great art that which can bring even fiction to the aid of truth, and robing her in a transparent dress, render us enamored of her even when coldest and sternest. Let us see how the modern Persians, who have succeeded to this grand inheritance, know how to enjoy it. Most Persian stories have a merit—if it be a merit, as our railway times suppose—of being short. For my part, I should like to lie down in an arbor and listen to wise and pleasant tales from sunrise to sundown, now and again.

TWO HINTS FOR HUSBANDS.

1. A married man presented himself, trembling and sorrowful, at the gates of paradise. He had heard so often of his faults and shortcomings while upon earth, that he believed in them devotedly, and had no hope of being admitted to the habitations of the blessed. One wife, he had been repeatedly informed, was a blessing far beyond the merits while in the flesh; how, then, could he hope for the smiles of seventy houries. But the prophet, when he presented himself at the gate, met him with his great surprise greeted him with a smile of ineffable compassion. "Pass on, poor martyr," said Mohammed; "you have been punished enough sinner, but you have suffered enough upon the earth, so be of good cheer, for you will not meet your wife here."

A man who had hitherto crept up to heaven, now stood up confidently and presented himself to the prophet, upon the ground that he had been married twice. "Nay," said the prophet, angrily, "paradise is no place for fools."

2. A trifling young fellow married the wealthy widow of a great Khan. On the wedding-night she determined to assert her authority over him. So she treated him with great contempt, and he came into the anderoon, and sat luxuriously embedded in rose-leaf cushions, caressing a large white cat, at which she pretended to throw her food. She appeared to be annoyed by her husband's entrance, and looked at him out of the corners of her eyes with a glance of the most disdain.

"I dislike cats," remarked the young soldier, blandly, as if he was making a mere casual observation; "they offend my sight."

If his wife had looked at him with a glance of cold disdain before, her eyes now spoke a perfection of anger and contempt such as no words can express. She did not even deign to answer him, but she took the cat to her bosom and caressed it passionately. Her whole heart seemed to be in the cat, and cold was the shoulder which she turned to her husband. Bitter was the sneer upon her beautiful lips.

"When any one offends me," continued her gallant, gayly, "I cut off his head. This is a principle of mine which I am sure will only make me dearer to you." Then, drawing his sword, he took the cat gently but firmly from her arms, cut off its head, wiped the blade, sheathed it, and sat down, continuing to talk affectionately to his wife as if nothing had happened. After which, upon reflection, she became the best and most submissive wife in the world.

A hen-pecked fellow, meeting him next day as he rode with a gallant train through the market-place, began to console with him. "Ah!" said the hen-pecked, "with deep feeling, "you, too, have taken a wife and got a tyrant. You had better have remained the poor soldier that you were. I pity you from my very heart."

"Not so," replied the ruffler, jollily; "keep your sighs to cool yourself next summer." He then related the events of his wedding-night, with their satisfactory results.

The hen-pecked man listened attentively, and pondered long. "I also have a sword," said he, "though it is rusty, and my wife is likewise fond of cats. I will cut off the head of my wife's favorite cat at once." He did so, and received a sound beating. His wife, moreover, made him go down upon his knees and tell her what he had done. Spirit, had prompted him to commit the bloody deed.

"Fool!" said the lady, with a vixenish smile, when she had possessed herself of the hen-pecked's secret, "you should have done it the first night."

MORAL.—Advice is useless to fools.

THE SHIRT OF HAPPINESS.

It is said that once upon a time, in the grand old fable days, a Persian king who had been informed by a magician of great reputation who lived in his dominions. The magician, a worthy gentleman who flourished in much personal comfort upon popular opinion, received the king with great respect and the most flowery language his imagination could invent. Having listened to his majesty's ailments with profound attention, the magician at length informed the king, that if he could succeed in obtaining the shirt of a happy man he had only to put on the precious garment to be cured immediately of his malady, and so long as he wore it he would never know sorrow nor disease.

The realms of the monarch were wide. His armies were mighty upon the land, and his fleets were supreme upon the seas. His banners had never known defeat. His treasury was full to overflowing, and his subjects were loyal and obedient. But whenever he ate a bowl of cream, or a dozen skewers of kabobs, or a few water-melons, he had suffered so much of late years from indigestion that he could not consider himself happy; so it was obvious that his majesty himself had no shirt in his Wardrobe which would answer the purpose.

"But," thought the king, very naturally, "there is my prime minister, a fellow who can get any quantity of cream, sweet or sour, under the robe of honor which I gave him last Nooroos, and as for kabobs, why, yesterday, I thought he would never have done munching them. He is married to my daughter. His horses are the finest in Persia. He has no end of money" (his majesty thought of this with a peculiar look, which might mean many things), "and he has just built himself a palace fairer than the British Embassy. Whose dog is he that he should not be happy?" So the king sent for the prime minister, and asked him at once for his shirt. The statesman, afraid to oblige his master on such easy terms, and slyly resolving to obtain any number of pairs of shirts wherever occasion should offer to indemnify himself, immediately sent the king the very best shirt in his wardrobe. It was made of the finest and lightest silk, thin as a spider's web, and beautifully embroidered; but wonderful as it appeared to his majesty, he suffered from indigestion more than ever after putting it on; and, far worse, he felt a tightness about the neck as of a person apprehensive of being bowstrung, or actually undergoing the process. A sensation which he never remembered to have felt since he had been at war for the crown with his brother-in-law, and ten brothers-in-law his father's death; and as all those brothers had been long ago disposed of in various ways which the country did not care to investigate, he could not account for the return of the old sensation in his throat, and hastened to call the prime minister's shirt as soon as possible.

Feeling, however, that he had been imposed upon, and that the prime minister, after all, was sent him somebody else's shirt instead of his own, the king ordered his foresaken to seize that politician, and bring him before the throne.

"To hear is to obey," said the foresaken.

When the prime minister appeared the king received him with a terrible countenance. "Dog!" said his majesty, in an awful voice, "why have you deceived me, and sent the shirt of some other man accursed of Allah instead of your own?"

The prime minister tremblingly endeavored to exculpate himself.

"Son of an owl and a spider," pursued the king. "Meerza Snooza, the magician, assured me that if I could obtain the shirt of a happy man I should be delivered from my infirmities. Is not that true?"

"Alas! sire," replied the statesman, "how can he be happy, unless he has a good conscience, and sins never before me? The most I can now hope is to keep my head where Nature has placed it from day to day. The keenest sorrow of your majesty's subjects is happier than I. The scorching sun blazes upon the hill-top, and there the tempest roars; but the sorrow and the sufferer are alone. I am not among such as I can your majesty hops to find bliss. I have upon my estate a farmer, however, who is the happiest of mankind. If your majesty will sacrifice me to go in search of him the talisman will be found."

So the king, resolving to allow the prime minister to get still richer before he was bow-strung, commanded him to depart at once.

The farmer came. He was a sour, sturdy fellow from the neighborhood of Khoi, the garden of Persia. He was summoned into the divan of the royal command. It was a coarse, rough garment, and appeared to be thickly inhabited. The king, though he put it on, could not sit still at all again in less than half an hour, in a state of intolerable irritation; for, reasoned his majesty, it is impossible any one can be happy who wears such a shirt as that.

The farmer, who was recalled to the royal presence, confirmed the report and told a long dreary story about droughts, and locusts, and taxes; so that the king would have ordered his head to be cut off at once to get rid of him, but the farmer, seeing himself in such imminent peril, assured the king that the merchant to whom he sold his corn was a happy man without doubt, and begged to be allowed to fetch him, and so got out of danger in the same manner as the prime minister had.

The merchant came. The king, now warned by experience, determined to interrogate him before putting on his shirt. The merchant complained, as much as the farmer had, of taxes, and had, besides, another class of grievances peculiarly his own. He had partaken of unwholesome victuals from-houses, the extortions of officials, and a variety of other things, which made the king so angry that he determined to have the merchant on appointment by ordering the merchant to be executed. This ceremony over, the king felt something better; but still the talismanic shirt was not found.

For a long time the king sought the shirt of happiness through every part of his dominions, and sought it in vain. Although innumerable sprays were beheaded, bow-strung, and tortured every day, yet, surprising to relate, happiness could not be found among his subjects.

One day, however, when his majesty, being encamped in his summer quarters near Sultanieh, was out for an afternoon's ride, he saw a careless, red-nosed fellow sitting on a post, and very near him and then taking a bottle from under his sash, applying his lips with intense satisfaction to its contents. Still, there was a shirt on the red-nosed man and a merry light in his eye, which did not point him out as a habitual wine-bibber. He seemed rather to be keeping festival, or enjoying himself upon some occasion of good fortune.

"Dog of a topee," asked the king, abruptly, struck with a sudden thought, "are you happy?"

"Thy servant is happy, O king!" said the man.

The king then ordered the royal forerobes to seize him and give him five hundred lashes to cause him to relate the reasons of his happiness. The red-nosed man limped a little when subsequently brought to the king's tent in the evening, but still persisted in saying that he was happy; for, said he, "My wife has only been dead three weeks." Meerza Snooza, the magician, who, since he had been consulted, always accompanied the king in his search, and stood at the right hand, on being appealed to, decided that the red-nosed man had good reasons for his happiness, for that he might have been hen-pecked, and was, perhaps, just then under the first impression of joy at his deliverance.

Upon this the king immediately ordered the red-nosed man to be stripped, in order to obtain the garment which he required, when, wonderful to relate, it appeared that the only happy man in his dominions had no shirt.

THE GOLD PANIC.

WE illustrate on page 188 the Gold Panic which occurred last week, when gold fell in Wall Street in two days from 145, raising the Jew speculators who had been buying specie, and improving the national currency some fifteen per cent. The scene on Thursday, at noon, in William Street, outside the new public Board, beggars description. The street was thronged from the houses on one side to the iron railing on the other. Even a dozen policemen endeavored vainly to keep order, and made arrests right and left without much judgment, discretion, or effect. Every body was rising to sell his gold. Hundreds of speculators who had bought gold within a week appeared with bunched faces and trembling hands, and many offering their gold to every one they met. Among the crowd the Jew element rather preponderated. There were Israelites, panting Jews, who were evidently holders of gold, and there were exultant joyful Jews, who had foreseen the crisis and bought. There were the New Testament Jews, too, by the score, with a bilious Southern aspect, who had bought gold in the belief that the success of the Northern armies would collapse, and who now saw that they and their funds were likely to anticipate the Government in the catastrophe. Fortunes were made and lost in a day in that seething caldron of speculation.

The Herald reporter said:

So great was the rush that it was almost impossible for any one to obtain his way through the excited mass, who feared, had they attempted to enter last, would end with a confusion of tongues that would have shamed the gathering of Babel. Every conceivable adept at the game of speculation — brokers, shop-keepers, lottery-ticket men, Wall Street boys, capitalists, old-clothes men, and the thousand others that the deranged state of the finances of the country has called into life and operation, were present, all rushed into William Street, and completely blocked up that hurrying thoroughfare, as also one or either end of Wall Street. There were was seen such a deplorable crew of disappointed countenances on the ramparts since the days of Titus. Many bulletins scenes were enacted around the Board Room. Jostling, and cursing, and a struggling—none enduring to get in, some to get out, all pandemonium. Occasionally bent the wailing for the old aphorism, which says, "a fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind." Now, a Jew, named Meyers, having more nothing of a kindred feeling among them, save in the great desire to get rid of what gold which they had been previously so anxious to hold ever for higher prices. Most of the heavy speculators were Jews, and they cut manœuvres Byrne so they rushed to and fro, foaming at the mouth, cursing with a hopeless rage, and tearing their hair. Some, who had brought this ruin on the house of their fathers. One incident is worth relating. A Jew, named Meyers, having some gold transaction with a Christian, the latter, as close, he bethought him asked Meyers his name. "Meyers," replied the other. "What's your Christian name?" "I've got no Christian name. I'm a Chew." Another ancient-looking Hebrew was so astonished at the state of affairs in Wall Street—the meeting of such of people there as if pestered by an army with banners, the amount of gold they carried, and the interest evinced in their countenances, as if feeling to be left behind in the race—that, after some time contemplation the scene with lowered head, he raised his hand and exclaimed, "Mein Gott! dere ish been noting like dish since de crossing of de Red Sea."

THE CANAL AT LAKE PROVIDENCE.

WE republish on page 180 a set of sketches, by Mr. Theodore R. Davis, illustrating THE CANAL AT LAKE PROVIDENCE, which is now being cut by our troops. By the aid of this canal it is expected that we shall be able to send boats into the Gulf by the Red, and Atchafalaya rivers, without entering the Mississippi below Lake Providence. Mr. Davis writes:

"The sketch at the top of the page is of the town of Providence from the lake, showing the canal, now rapidly nearing completion.

"The map shows a series of bayous, rivers, etc., by which we shall be enabled to reach the mouth of the Red River, and on by the Atchafalaya River to the Gulf of Mexico. Entering Lake Providence from the Mississippi River, through Macon and Tensas bayous into the Black River; Ouchita and Tensas into the Red River, our boats can avoid the strong-holds of the Mississippi. The lower sketch shows the cutting of the levee on the Mississippi river at Providence.

"To the right of the map is sketched an exploit of one of negro soldiers, who went out in company with a small force of soldiers a few days since, shot one rebel soldier, captured two more, and taking their guns from them, they marched captured again through the swamp to the party. The name of this bold African is Jim—'Union Jim' the soldiers call him—and there are many more like him, brave and ready, who are to be armed and schooled as soldiers. Upon the other side of the map a sketch of the constantly recurring event, the coming in of what the soldiers call recruits of color; a stalwart negro with his little one riding 'pig-a-back,' and the family trudging along after."

THE LOSS OF THE "QUEEN OF THE WEST."

WE reproduce on page 181 a drawing by Mr. M'Cullagh of the Cincinnati Commercial, representing THE CAPTURE OF THE "QUEEN OF THE WEST." Mr. M'Cullagh was on board at the time of her capture, and escaped on top of a cotton bale—more fortunate than his colleague, Anderson of the Herald, who was caught. Mr. M'C. writes:

"The Queen of the West was the most formidable vessel in the Western rum fleet. She was captured by the rebels at Gordon's Landing on Red River, eighty miles from the mouth, on the night of the 14th of February. Her commander, Colonel Ellet, had been informed that the fort was very weakly garrisoned, that but two guns were mounted, and that the conscripts who manned them would not make any resistance. Once above the fort, he was sure of capturing a number of steamboats employed in the rebel service. The Queen arrived within five hundred yards of the battery shortly after sundown on the 14th. The rebels opened fire immediately with three guns. The fourth shot struck her deck, plunged through, and cut her escape pipe. Orders were then given to back her out of range; but while doing so, a ran aground directly in front of the battery. The rebels kept up an accurate fire, and in a few moments a second shot plunged through her deck, cutting her steam, and thereby disabling her. One man only was severely scalded. Out of fifty-one officers and men only two escaped by floating down the river, on cotton bales and in skiffs, to where a small ferry-boat, which had accompanied the Queen, lay. Twenty-five were taken prisoners. A number of negroes were captured, and several drowned.

THE PIRATE FLORIDA.

WE illustrate on page 189 THE DESTRUCTION OF THE MAGNIFICENT CLIPPER SHIP "JACOB BELL," BY THE BRITISH PIRATE "FLORIDA." The Florida is a British vessel built by Laird, of Liverpool, and fitted out last spring under the name of the Oreto. Laird, and the other parties concerned in her construction, swore that she was intended for the King of Sardinia. It was known, however, that she was all along intended to be a pirate, and to sail under the Confederate flag. She underwent the final equipment at Nassau on her first arrival there, but was of course soon released by the rebel sympathizers who govern that island, and made her way safely to Mobile. She is now probably burning our vessels. Our picture is from a photograph taken while she was in Liverpool.

The Jacob Bell, which she destroyed at sea, was one of the finest vessels that sail out of this port. She was a model of beauty and symmetry, and one of the most popular vessels among tea shippers. She belonged to Messrs. A. A. Low & Co., who kindly placed at our disposition the model of her from which our picture is taken. When she was destroyed she had on board 9000 chests of tea belonging to Englishmen and insured in England.

FORT DONELSON.

O Dover! O Dover!
What a place for a rover,
Not a bit of clover
And Scrivens' beer, who'd
O sad Donelson Fort!
Dear Lord, what a dreary port!
The very archfiend's court
For a poor old soldier!

O the field of glory!
What a blasting story
Shall ring, when the fame is heary,
For the poor old soldier!

O the silvery waves!
O the lonely graves!
That pillow war-worn brawes
That wait the fallen soldier!

O Lincoln gun-boats grim!
Peal out your stormy hymn
Till it rings to Heaven's rim
For the poor old soldier!

O sighing, shot-torn tree!
Wail for the fallen free:
O wail till white tears be,
For the poor old soldier!

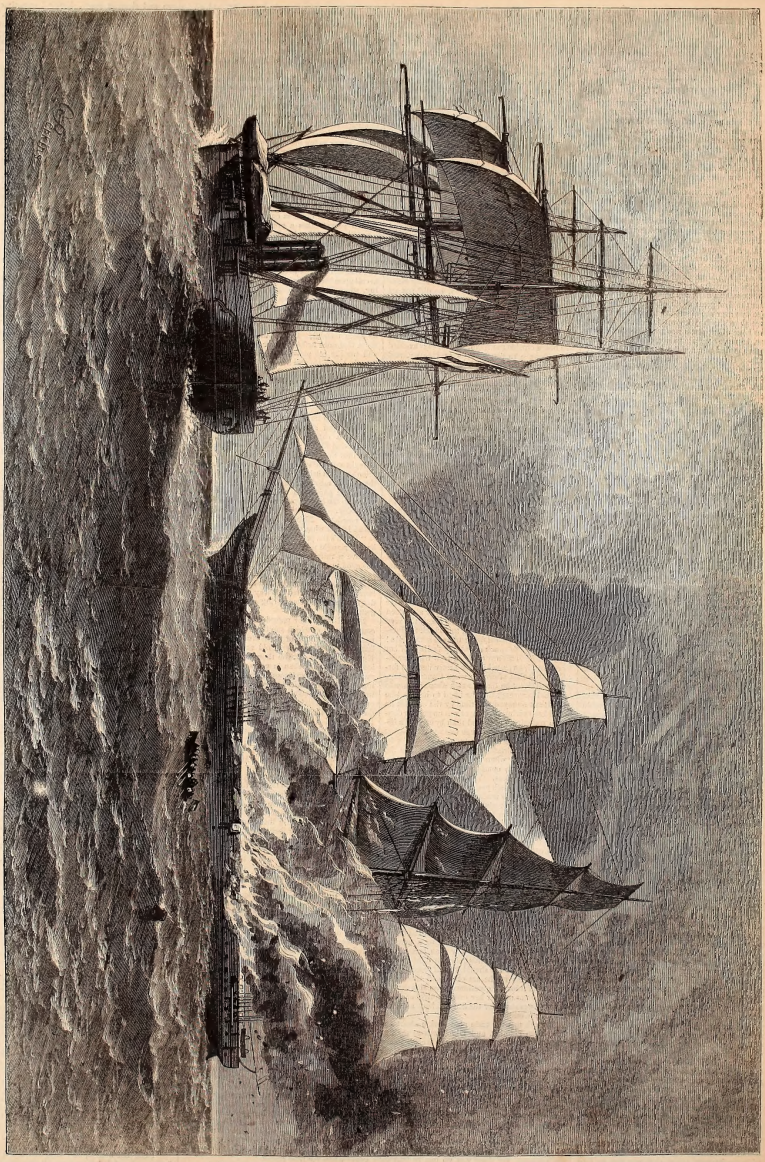
O rusted, battered ball!
That celt the hero fell,
You shrieked out life's last call
For the poor old soldier!

O shivered, splintered bone!
Where have you fallen gone?
Is this the trophy 'won
By the poor old soldier?

O bloody, blackened rock!
Here broke the battle's shock,
Here star-eyed valor woke
For the poor old soldier!

O wall, and trench, and mound!
Each part is hallowed ground,
Till the last trump shall sound
For the poor buried soldier!

O the silent river!
Will sing long and forever,
Sighing and ceasing never,
For the war-broken soldier!



O spirits of the brave!
There is no prouder grave
Than this rampart by the wave
For the poor old soldier!

NOTE.—Dover is a mean little town on the bank of the Cumberland, within the intrenchments of Fort Donelson. It is the scene of two desperate battles, and bears the marks of shot and shell on every house and tree.

The above lines were written by one of the boys in General Geraghty's army, when lying on sheepskin at the fort, on the first anniversary of the battle of 1862, illustrated by the press and immortalized by the patriotism of the soldiers.

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK.

CHAPTER XII.

THERE are some people who imperceptibly float away from their youth into middle-age, and from thence pass into declining life with the soft and gentle motion of happy years. There are others who are hurled, in spite of themselves, down dizzy rapids of agony, away from their youth at one great bound, into old age with another sudden shock, and thence into the vast calm ocean where there are no shore-marks to tell of time.

This last, it seemed, was to be Ellinor's lot. Her youth had gone in a single night, fifteen years ago, now she appeared to have at least been an elderly woman; very still and hopeless in look and movement, but as sweet and gentle in speech and smile as ever she had been in her happiest days. All young people, when they came to know her, loved her dearly, though at first they might call her dull, and hasty to get on with and as for children and old people, her ready, watchful sympathy in their joys as well as their sorrows was an unfailing passage to their hearts. After the first great shock of Mr. Corbet's marriage was over she seemed to pass into a greater peace than she had known for years; at least the faint hope of happiness was gone: it would, perhaps, be more accurate to say, of the bright anticipations she had planned for herself in her early youth. Unconsciously she was being weaned from self-seeking in any shape, and her daily life became, if possible, more innocent, and pure, and holy. One of the canons used to laugh at her for her constant visits to the poor: all the servants, and for her devotion to good works, and call her always the reverend sister. Miss Monro was a little annoyed at this (mere clerical) joke; Ellinor smiled quietly. Miss Monro disapproved of Ellinor's grave ways and sober, severe style of dress.

"You may look as much as you like, my dear, and yet go dressed in some pretty color, instead of those perpetual blacks and grays, and then there would be no need for me to be perpetually telling people you are only four-and-thirty (and they don't believe me, though I tell them so till I am blind in the face); or if you would but wear a decent-shaped bonnet, instead of always wearing them of the poky shape in fashion when you were quite young."

The old canon died, and some one was to be appointed in his stead. These clerical preferments and appointments were the all-important interest to the inhabitants of the Close, and the discussion of probabilities came up invariably if any two met together, in street or house, or even in the very cathedral itself. At length it was settled and announced by the higher powers. An energetic, hard-working clergyman from a distant part of the diocese, Livingstone by name, was to have the vacant canonry.

Miss Monro said that the name was somehow familiar to her; and by degrees she recollected the young curate who had come to inquire after Ellinor in that dreadful illness she had had at Hamley in the year 1829. Ellinor knew nothing of that visit; no more than Miss Monro did of what had passed between the two before that anxious night. Ellinor just thought it possible it might be a same like Livingstone, and would rather it were not, because she did not feel as if she could bear the frequent though not intimate intercourse with the new canon, for months to come, with one so closely associated with that great time of terror which she was striving to bury out of sight by every effort in her power. Miss Monro, on the contrary, was busy weaving a romance for her pupil; she thought of the passionate love displayed by the fair young clergyman fifteen years ago, and believed that occasionally men could be constant, and hoped that, if Mr. Livingstone were the new canon, he might prove the rara avis which exists but once in a century. He came, and it was the same. He looked a little older, a little older, but had still the gait and aspect of a young man. His smooth fair face was full of thought, and with an air full of care; the blue eyes looked so kindly and peaceful that Miss Monro could scarcely fancy that they were the same which she had seen fire flashing with tears; the bland, calm look of the whole man needed the embodiment of his evident devotion to be raised into the ideal of a holy innocence which some of the Romanists call the "sacerdotal face." His whole soul was in his work, and he looked at little likely to step forth in the character of either a hero of romance or a faithful lover as could be imagined. Still Miss Monro was not discouraged; she remembered the warm, passionate feeling she had once seen break through the calm exterior, and she believed that what had happened once might happen again.

Of course, while all eyes were directed on the new canon, he had to learn who the possessors of those eyes were one by one; and it was probably some time before the dim cause crossed his mind that Miss Wilkins, the lady in black, with the sad pale face, so constant an attendant at service, so rare a visitor at the houses, was the same Miss Wilkins as the bright vision of his youth. It was her sweet smile at a painstaking child that betrayed her—if, indeed, betrayal it might be called—where there was no wish or effort to conceal any thing. Canon Livingstone left the school-room almost directly, and, after being for an hour or so in his house, went out to call on Mrs. Rendall, the person who knew more of her neighbor's affairs than any one in East Chester.

The next day he called on Miss Wilkins herself. She would have been very glad if he had kept on in his ignorance; it was so keenly painful to be in the company of one the sight of whom, even at a distance, had brought her such a keen remembrance of past misery; and when told of his call, as she was sitting at her sewing in the dining-room, she had to nerve herself for the interview before going up stairs into the drawing-room, where she was being entertained by Miss Monro with warm demonstrations of welcome. A little conversation, a little forced suppression of the lips, an increased pallor on Ellinor's part, was all that Miss Monro could see in her through the veil of her prior guess with foresight and intention to observe. She turned to the canon; his color had certainly deepened as he stood by while Ellinor summoned up to meet Ellinor. That was all that was to be seen; but on the slight foundation of that blush Miss Monro built many castles; and when Ellinor faded away, one after one, she recognized that they were only baseless visions. She used to be in the habit of dissipating in this latter case Ellinor's unvaried calmness of demeanor, which might be taken for coldness of disposition, and by her ready refusal to allow Miss Monro to invite Canon Livingstone to the small teas they were in the habit of occasionally giving. Yet Ellinor received; one or two more, old and infirm, confined to their houses, she planned to call upon before leaving Hamley. Every evening, when Ellinor had no work in Mr. Dixon's, Archbishop's, he came up to the parsonage, ostensibly to help her in moving or packing books, but really because they were the only two evenings there were bound to each other by a bond never to be spoken about, but which was strengthened by them that once before Ellinor left she should go and see the old place, Ford Bank. Not to go into the house, but to the Miss Dixons' garden, and begged her to name her own time for revisiting it when they and their family would be absent, but to see the place in its natural and grounded state; a solemn, miserable visit, which, because of the very misery it involved, appeared to Ellinor to be a necessary duty.

Dixon and she talked together as she sat, making a catalogue one evening in the old drawing-room of the books examined window-seat open into the garden, and the May showers had brought out the scents of the new-leafed sweetbriar bush just beyond the garden-door, beyond the grassy meadows sloped away down to the river; the parsonage was so much raised that nothing in the way of trees rose over the banks of any hedge. Men with instruments were busy in the meadow. Ellinor, pausing in her work, asked Dixon the reason of their stay.

"Them's the people for the new railway," said he. "Naught would satisfy the Hamley folk but to have a railway to themselves—coaches is not good enough nowadays."

He spoke with a tone of personal offense, and Ellinor, who had never passed all his life among horses, and considered railway engines as their despicable rivals, conquering only by a strategic scheme.

By-and-by Ellinor passed on to a subject the consideration of which she had repeatedly urged upon Dixon, and entreated him to come and form one of their household at East Chester. At every visit she had thought, older even in looks and feelings than in years, and she would make him happy and comfortable in his declining years if he would but come and pass them under her care. The addition made to her income by Mr. Ness's bequest would enable her to do not only this, but to relieve Miss Monro of her occupation of teaching, which, at the years she had arrived at, was becoming burdensome. But Dixon opposed the removal to Dixon as he shook his head.

"It's not that I don't thank you, and kindly too; but I am too old to go chopping and changing."

"But it would be no change to come back to me, Dixon," said Ellinor.

"Yes, it would. I were born i' Hamley, and it's in Hamley I reckon to die."

And all pathos in his entire manner and reasonableness. Later in the day she became more at peace with him, when she received a kind little note from Mrs. Forbes, a near friend of hers, and the mother of the family she was preparing to visit in Ireland. Mr. Livingstone had called and told her that Ellinor had to go on a very painful journey, and that Mrs. Forbes was quite unwilling to disturb her unnecessarily, as it would be a great comfort to both, and that she could perfectly be sat at liberty for a fortnight or so after the time she had originally fixed on, and that "Jeannie was growing tall, and the doctor had advised sea-air this spring; so a month's bathing would suit her quite as well as earlier or later on." Now, was this going straight to Mrs. Forbes, to whom she should herself scarcely have dared to name it for fear of pain to the dear man, or of a lover? questioned Miss Monro; but she could not answer her own inquiry, and had to be very thankful for the deed without accounting for the motives.

A conch met the train at a station about ten miles from Hamley, and Dixon was at the spot where the coach stopped, ready to receive them. The old man was almost in tears at the sight of them: "Glad to see familiar faces." He put on his Sunday clothes to do them honor; and to counteract his agitation by the act of unbended bustle about their luggage. To the indignation of the inn-porters, who were of a later generation, he would wheel it himself to the parsonage, though he broke down from fatigue once or twice on the way, and had to stand and rest, his ladies waiting by his side, and making remarks on the alterations of houses and the places of trees, in order to give him ample time to recruit himself, for there was no one to wait for them and give them a welcome to the parsonage, which was to be their temporary home. The respectful servants, in deep mourning, had all prepared, and gave Ellinor a note from Mr. Brown, saying that he purposed refrained from disturbing them that day after their long journey, but would call on the morrow, and tell them of the arrangements he had thought of making, always subject to Miss Wilkins's approval.

These were simple enough; certain legal forms to be gone through, any selections from books or furniture that Ellinor or the rest to be sold by auction as speedily as might be, as the succession to the living might wish to have repairs and alterations effected in the parsonage. Two or three days Ellinor employed herself in business in the house, never going out except to church. Miss Monro, as she had foretold, called about once where, noticing all the alterations in place and people, which were never improvements in her opinion. Ellinor had a litany of callers (tenants, Mr. and Mrs. Osbaldistone, among others), but, excepting in rare cases—most of them belonged to humble life—she declined to see every one, as she had business enough on her hands: sixteen years makes a great difference in any set of people. The old acquaintances of her father's in his better days were almost all dead or removed; there were one or two remaining, and Miss Ellinor received; one or two more, old and infirm, confined to their houses, she planned to call upon before leaving Hamley. Every evening, when Ellinor had no work in Mr. Dixon's, Archbishop's, he came up to the parsonage, ostensibly to help her in moving or packing books, but really because they were the only two evenings there were bound to each other by a bond never to be spoken about, but which was strengthened by them that once before Ellinor left she should go and see the old place, Ford Bank. The down and sleep in peace, though I sometimes fear as peace will not come to me even there." He was going out of the room, and was now more talking to himself than to her. "They say blood will out; and if it weren't for her part in it I could wish for a clear break before I die."

She did not hear the latter part of this mumbled sentence. She was looking at a letter just brought in and requiring an immediate answer. It was from Mr. Brown. Notes from him were of daily occurrence, but this contained an open letter, the writing of which was strangely familiar to her; it did not need the signature, "Ralph Corbet," to tell her whom the letter was from. For some moments she could not read the words. They expressed a simple enough request, and was addressed to the auctioneer who was to dispose of the rather valuable library of the late Mr. Ness, and whom none had been advertised in connection with the sale, in the Athenæum, and other similar papers. To him Mr. Corbet wrote, saying that he should be unable to be present when the books were sold, but wishing to be allowed to buy in at any price decided upon a certain rare folio edition of Virgil, bound in parchment, and with notes in Italian. The book was fully described. Though no Latin scholar, Ellinor knew the book well—remembered its look from old times, and could instantly have laid her hand upon it. The auctioneer was sent the request on to his employer, Mr. Brown. That gentleman applied to Ellinor for her consent. She saw that the facts of the intended sale must be all told to Mr. Corbet was aware of, and that he could not know to whom the books belonged. She chose out the book, and wrapped and tied it up with trembling hands. He might be the person to untie the knot. It was strangely fated that, after so many years, to be brought into thus much contact with him. She wrote a short note to Mr. Brown, in which she requested him to say, as though from himself, and without any mention of her name, that he, as executor, reserved Mr. Corbet's right to the gift of the Virgil as a remembrance of his former friend and tutor. Then she rang the bell, and gave the letter and parcel to the servant.

Again alone, and Mr. Corbet's open letter on the table. She took it up and looked at it as the letters dazzled obscurely on the white paper. Her life rolled backward, and she was a girl again. At last she roused herself; but, instead of laying the money in the drawer of the desk as remembrance of his former friend and tutor. Then she rang the bell, and gave the letter and parcel to the servant.

"Hush, Dixon," said she, suddenly aware of the duty the old servant was not popular with his mistress. "I suppose I may be allowed to ask for Dixon's company for an hour or so: we have something to do together before we leave?"

The consent given, the two walked away, as by previous appointment, to Hamley Church-yard, where he was to point out to her the exact spot where he wished to be buried. Trampling over the long rank grass, but avoiding the passing directly over any of the thickly-strewn graves, he made straight for one spot—a little space of unoccupied ground, close by, where Molly, the pretty scullery-maid, lay:

Sacred to the Memory of MARY GREAVES.
Born 17?7. Died 1818.
"We part to meet again."

"I put this stone up over her with my first savings," said he, looking at it; and then, pulling out his knife, he began to clean out the letters. "I said then as I would lie by her. And it'll be a comfort to think you'll see me laid here. I trust no one will be so crabbed as to take a fancy to this here spot of ground."

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates of all the various articles, stating what each one sells for, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all a fair chance. On receipt of a Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In order to carry out this, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 25 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

E. AGENTS.—Those acting as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittance amounts to one dollar. Agents will collect 25 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

BRANDRETH'S PILLS.	NEW STYLE.
BRANDRETH'S PILLS.	NEW STYLE.
BRANDRETH'S PILLS.	NEW STYLE.
BRANDRETH'S PILLS PROPAGATE THEMSELVES.

A lady, travelling on the Confluent of Europe, called upon Samuel Gray, of Barcelona, Spain, a dealer in Drugs and Medicine, and inquired for BRANDRETH'S PILLS. He did not keep the medicine for sale. The lady recounted the good news to New York for a supply of them, and has left with him money for six dozen boxes. When the Pills arrived, the lady left with Mr. Cuyas four dozen, with a request he would sell them for her. He did so, and from that small beginning, and without any effort whatever from the Principal Office, the sale has become so extensive in Barcelona as to absorb nearly three hundred gross per annum, or 3,456 boxes of BRANDRETH'S PILLS. In fact, to use the effective language of Saymon Cuyas, "Brandreth's Pills propagate themselves." That is to say, those who use them become well aware of their high medicinal and health-restoring qualities, and as such recommend them to their friends.

It is admitted that Brandreth's Pills are the most effectual and certain, and without the most RELIABLE PURGATIVE KNOWN. The majority of medicines of this class keep poor imitations of this, the Original Universal Medicine.

Public favor is eventually decided by merit; we therefore hope that this original and only true medicine may be everywhere introduced, and its own merits will do the rest. It is adapted to all ages, and all climates, and being used by one sick invariably converts the disease, and perseverance cures in a majority of cases.

American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.
American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and sent here only for packaging and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AN ACCURATE AND RELIABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Aurora and Lepine of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States.

Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ROBBINS & APPLETON,
Agents of the American Watch Company,
182 BROADWAY, N. Y.

NOTICE!
Recent and valuable improvements have been made in the construction of this chimney, and it is now offered to the public as a reliable article. It is unnecessary not to crack or break in any manner from "overheating" or changes of temperature, as we use with ordinary care just as long as the lamp on which it is used.

It gives an exhibition in atmosphere that we have completed such arrangements as will enable us, we trust, from the present date to supply the demand, which has now outrun, which thus far it has been impossible for us to do.
Liberal Terms to the Trade. Sent by Express, &c., at $1 50.

HEIMSTREET'S
Inimitable Hair Restorative.
IT IS NOT A DYE.
But restores gray hair to its original color, by supplying the capillary tubes with natural sustenance, thereby giving it life and vigor. All instantaneous dyes are composed of lunar caustic, destroying the vitality of the hair, and the consequence is, that it all becomes of a dreadful color.
Heimstreet's Inimitable Coloring not only restores to its natural color any gray hair, but gives the hair a Luxuriant Beauty,
promotes its growth, prevents the hair coming off, eradicates dandruff, and imparts health and pleasantness to the head. It has stood the test of time, being the original Hair Coloring, and is constantly increasing in favor. Used by both gentlemen and ladies. It is sold by all respectable druggists, or can be procured by them of the commercial agent, D. S. Burton, 32 Broadway, N. Y. Two sizes, 50 c. and $1.

THE MOTHER'S LETTER.

ROUND their camp-fire three soldiers sat;
The night was cold, the wind was blowing,
And, sifting through the barrack's chinks,
The crystal flakes came thickly snowing.

They sat there silent, sad, and stern,
No light but fire-light on their faces,
And yet twas plain, how'er unsaid,
Theirs weren't the most congenial places.

At length Tim Hanson sighed, and muttered,
"It's no use, boys, the ship is sinking;
And as to risk another fight,
It's throwing life away, I'm thinking."

"And so do I," replied Jack Day;
"Our Government don't know what it's doing;
Our generals rather take their ease
Than spoil the mess Secesh is brewing."

"And then, too," Tim rejoined, "and then,
Just think of all the good times waiting—
The sunny rooms, and smiles at home,
And then that glorious evening skating.

"I wouldn't care so much for all,
If every body wasn't croaking;
But much of Northern news we get
Is most decidedly provoking.

"And then the faction bawling peace—
Surely the angels must be weeping,
Who look upon this demon's egg,
And have America in keeping."

"Ah me!" sighed out Dick Jones, "ah me!
There's nothing I can do but shiver,
And think of that dreadful night,
When thousands fell, across the river.

"I move we do as some have done,
Obtain our freedom by desertion:
To clip the noose, and foil the guard,
Requires, we know, but slight exertion."

"Agreed! agreed!" cried Tim and Jack:
"The thing would be amazing easy."
"A step!" hissed Dick, "'tis well the night,
In taking, old, is taken sneezy."

The door flew open, and there fell,
Just at the feet of Dick, a letter:
"Luck!" cried he; "had you come to-morrow,
You'd only found a broken fetter."

"Come, read it to us now," said Tim;
"T may give a follow strength for running,
Or turn us Copperheads, or something
Amazing much or wondrous cunning."

"Dear son:' yes, boys, I'll read you this:
The letter isn't Jane's, but mother's,
And now just think it's all your own,
And not a bit of it another's.

"'Dear Dick, we want to see you home,
But not till rebel schemes are crushed,
And discontent and treason here
In glorious victory are hushed.

"'Wrongs there may be—we know there are;
Bad men command where they should serve;
But all will meet ere long, we trust,
The recompense their acts deserve.

"'Think not that He, who notes the fall
Of even a sparrow, fails to see
The hardship, pain, and wrongs endured,
And whether patiently, by thee.

"'Think not that Heaven has me reward,
No rich reward in store, to mete
To him who takes his life, his all,
And lays them at his country's feet.

"'This is not all of life; and he
Who nobly for his country dies
Shall find inheritance where he falls,
And glory when entombed he lies.

"'Oh! then, my son, go boldly on;
Let no discouragements prevail;
Our cause is God's—His purposes
May linger, but they can not fail.'"

Dick turned away to wipe a tear;
Jack blew the flames a little higher;
Tim took his Bible from the shelf,
And drew the table to the fire.

"Twas nonsense," Jack remarked, at length,
"That we were talking, boys, together;
Or else we all like fools, no doubt
Engendered by this blowing weather."

"Twas only talk—all talk," said Tim;
"Let come what will, I'll never falter;
I'd like an order, though, to swing
Round every Copperhead a halter."

"My mother," murmured Dick; "my mother—
I soon even now to see her sitting,
Her thoughtful face and gentle eye
Bent silently above her knitting.

"Come, boys, we'll sing 'Sweet Home;' but no,
Our patriotic songs are better."
Well, passes for only God can know
The influence of that mother's letter.

A BETTER FEELING.

BE the cause what it may, the most careless observer must have noticed, within the past few days, a very decided improvement in public feeling. There is little or no despondency in men's language; people are not downcast and despairing; you do not hear, on every side, as you did a month ago, speculations with regard to the overthrow of the Government, the collapse of the currency, and the recognition of the South. On the contrary, people seem cheerful and hopeful. The old calm confidence in the justice of our cause and in its ultimate triumph is reviving; bets are offered on the capture of Charleston and Vicksburg; we laugh at foreign sympathy with the rebels, instead of getting angry. Altogether the tone of public feeling is much changed within a month, and unquestionably for the better.

The change can be ascribed to no particular event. We have won no battles, conquered no territory, occupied no new strategic point. Our armies, under Rosecrans, Hunter, Hooker, Banks, and Grant, are about where they were a month or six weeks ago. Gloom rebels, so far as we know, overhangs them as steadily, as defiantly as ever. Some almost unintelligible operations are going on in the West, by which we are expected to achieve mighty successes. But it is safe to say that the Yazoo expedition and the Lake Providence canal scheme are not in the least comprehended by the public at large, and have nothing to do with the increase of general cheerfulness.

Rather must we ascribe that increase, in the first place, to a moral reaction from the despondency which overwhelmed us after the defeats at Fredericksburg and Vicksburg. Those disasters, exaggerated by popular indignation and party spirit, filled the public mind with dismay, and when, on their heels, traitors at the North and West threatened to divide the loyal States, and to organize a party "in favor of a vigorous prosecution of peace" on a proslavery basis, the hearts of loyal men sank within them, and gloom overspread the whole republic. Fortunately the spirits of the Anglo-Saxon are too elastic to remain long depressed. A few weeks convinced us that the armies led by Hooker and Grant, though beaten, were as full of fight as ever; and a further brief period developed the equally important fact that the Copperhead traitors had no following to speak of, and that the masses of the Northern Democracy were heartily loyal to their country. These two discoveries dispelled, in great part, the oppressions which had saddened the public during the month of January, and laid the foundation for restored confidence.

Many minor causes have contributed to the same result. It is not too much to say that the emphatic indorsement, by such sterling democrats as John Van Buren and James T. Brady, of the conscript legislation in Congress, has demolished at a blow the factious opposition which was being organized for the purpose of preventing the Government from prosecuting the war. If these men approve, who shall cavil? In like manner, the recent inquiry which has arisen in Europe for American securities has raised their value in the eyes of our own people. If these foreigners, who know so little about our country, and whose newspaper and political guides so systematically traduce us, are willing to lend their money to the United States Government, what Northern man shall be base enough to question its solvency? Nor have the recent demonstrations of sympathy in England been without their effect in strengthening the backbone of the timid here. These Englishmen of the middle classes seem to have no doubt of our ultimate success. Shall they have more faith than we?

Meanwhile snuffs and estrays of news from the South tend to encourage the belief that the Jeff Davis despotism is tottering to its fall. Gold is worth 380 in Richmond, which implies an utter want of confidence in the revolutionary paper. Were gold worth 350 here, we could not carry on the war for sixty days. At Mobile, according to their own newspapers, people are starving to death. A committee of the rebel Congress has been appointed to inquire into the causes of the alarming scarcity of food, and it is understood that it ascribes the fact to the failure of the crops. But a Charleston paper more justly charges the disaster upon the reckless manner in which the conscription act has been carried out. Jeff Davis has been so determined upon military success that he has not left labor enough on the plantations to raise food. A letter feeling of discontent and insubordination seems to be cropping out in various parts of the South, and the indications justify the belief that a decided Northern victory would at once be followed by counter-revolutionary movements in favor of the Union in several of the insurrectionary States.

All these causes have had their share in strengthening confidence and cheering men's spirits at the North. But the principal cause of the improvement in public feeling has been, we doubt not, the increasing confidence in the tenacity and perseverance of our race with which every one of us is imbued. Like our fathers, the English, we are slow to fight, and most egregious blunderers at the art of war. But, like them, when we do fight, we are terribly in earnest, and fight on, through good and evil fortune, "never knowing when we are whipped," never relaxing our efforts in consequence of partial successes or partial defeats, never doubting in our own strength because of our ultimate success, and never for an instant calling off the dogs of war until the object for which we fight has been thoroughly accomplished.

THE WEALTH OF OUR COUNTRY.

WHEN this war broke out the leading organs of British and other European opinion declared that the contest would speedily come to an end if the capitalists of Europe refused to lend their means to the combatants. In Europe, and especially in England, the notion prevailed that there was no money here, and that the prosecution of enterprises, peaceful or belligerent, depended on the supply of funds from abroad.

A similar impression existed in this country also. In Wall Street, when a railway or a canal or a steamship line was projected, the first question mooted was, will the bonds or the stock sell in England? It was commonly believed that we had no capital in this country, and that the development of our resources was dependent on the supply of funds from foreign parts.

We have now been at war nearly two years, and until within a couple of months our Government has not obtained a dollar from abroad. During that period there have been absorbed, paid for, and held, 1st, about $70,000,000 of long 6 per cent. bonds; 2d, about $160,000,000 of 7-30 notes; and 3d, about $175,000,000 of one year 6 per cent. debt certificates—in all, over $400,000,000 of Government securities, exclusive of legal tender currency. In other words, the people of the United States have in the course of eighteen months taken and paid for as many Government stocks as all Europe took from us from 1815 to 1861. But is this all. While our people were absorbing these Government securities, the foolish capitalists of Europe, deluded by the London Times and other leading organs of foreign opinion into believing that this country was on the verge of absolute ruin, were selling all the American securities they held at any price they were absorbing them. Over $200,000,000 of American stocks—Federal, State, County, City, and Railway—came here for sale between New Year 1861 and New Year 1863, and all found a market.

Yet this vast flood of old and new securities has led to no decline in prices. All the 6 per cent. and 7-30 securities of the United States Government are above par. All railway bonds in good repute sell at a substantial premium.

The interest on the debt—this country is much richer than was ever supposed. The notion that we were dependent on Europe for capital is exploded. It is doubtful whether any European nation could have absorbed as large an amount of funded securities as our people have absorbed in the past eighteen months. The United States credit is firmly in the granite and ultimate resources has never been questioned—has developed during the present struggle a wealth in actual and immediate money means far beyond any thing that any one had ever dared to expect, and, in all probability, beyond any thing which the richest foreign nation in the world could hope to surpass.

THE LOUNGER.

FROM A DIARY.

THE LOUNGER continues his extracts from the Diary of which he spoke last week, and which, he is glad to know, is not without interest and significance to many readers. The writer of the Diary, in a private note to the Lounger, insists upon a careful avoidance of every thing that may not with propriety be published, confiding entirely, however, in the discretion of the editor.

The other evening, at a little party at ——'s, the conversation lurched gradually upon the inevitable topic. Every body talked about the war, and every body avoided the colored man as long as possible. But at length Triptolemus remarked, in his lofty and rather insolent manner, to Cato:

"Well, well; now let us finish up the war, and save the Union without any further allusion to our sable brethren."

There was a momentary pause; then Cato dryly said, "If we left let the negro alone, he would always have let us alone. We began it."

Triptolemus replied, tartly, "I don't see it."

"If you don't like pumpkins," answered Cato, "you had better not plant pumpkin-seed. If we don't want negroes at every turn, why were they brought? They, at least, are not responsible for their coming here."

"Pshaw!" retorted Triptolemus; "I am sick of the Abolitionists. Sambo I have been at the South, Cato; I have seen the blacks, and I know that they are fit only for slaves."

"Possibly," answered Cato. "But I have been at the South too, and I have seen the whites, and I know that they are fit for masters."

Triptolemus dropped the conversation.

Jones not John Bull, who dined at his Consul's in honor of the Prince's marriage.

"Was the pulpit report of the feast correct?" asked Jones.

"Certainly."

"Then you had a cold dinner, eh?"

"Cold? Damn my soul, what d'ye mean? Cold? It was jolly—Jolly!"

But I never knew any thing quite so cool as the way in which the President's health was proposed."

"Why, bless my soul, what d'ye mean?"

"Mean? Why, Bull, look here. You are all living and trading in this country, protected by its laws. Its Government, to which your Consul owes allegiance, is menaced by a rebellion. You dine in its chief city. You toast your Queen. All right. You toast your Prince. All right. You toast the Danish Consul, who is absent, fourth for Denmark. All right. Then, with a kindly pity, with a volume condescension, you pat his country upon the back: 'You poor devil! you're gone to pot, of course; but it won't quite do to stop nashing your teeth. Here, gentlemen, fill up! Society has some disagreeable duties. We are in the United States. Here's a fine country. Fifty 'ds so distracted. But I do not wish to be too hard upon it. I am not forgot giving you the President of the United States!'

"You think it distracted, do you? And how about the navy you are hauling for the distracting purpose? I wonder, Bull, if the excellent gentleman who upset cats an mountain, 'wrote that forge' proposing the most obvious and commonplace hence to the President, in a long memory about this same matter of privateering? I wonder if he remembers under what circumstances his predecessor vented the British Consulate? Perhaps you have yourself forgotten. Well, his predecessor charged, during the Crimean War, that one of the most conspicuous and honorable members of New York was filling our privateers for the Russian Government. The merchant interposes, at an open meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, or open Exchange, declared that so honorable and patriotic a charge would engage in such business. The matter did not rest. It was an insult to the navigation of commerce. It was carried up to the authorities. The exequatur was revoked, and the British Government requested to name an agent who would respect the high sense of the community to which he was accredited. Countries differ, John. Do you think it would be an agreeable thing to the whole British merchant to suggest that he was extensively engaged in privateering for the American government? And can you think it an edifying spectacle, that of a commercial agent of his in the United States unable to forget giving the health of the President?"

"Yes, yes," replied Bull; "that is the way with you Americans. You are too sensitive to take a joke well. Your nerves are too easily touched."

"Jones," said I, "if our country had sold, at a dinner in London, that although he thought Englishmen were egregious asses to pay the Prince of Wales half a million of dollars a year, that, nevertheless, they must hold and forego giving the health of the Queen—"

"By Jove, Sir, but I would!" replied the loyalty of a true Briton—"

"Yes, Sir, and by Jove you forget! The loyalty of a true American, who honors the representative of the national authority, is not a hoc nolo and generous feeling that any thing can kill and destroy. You would drink the President's health if you don't wish to. But in this country, Sir, if it be drunk at all, it must be with the same respect that we always show to your Queen; for the President represents the nation as the Queen does. Understand that the next time you marry a prince."

Jones went off and left Bull stammering.

Dined at ——'s. Some one said that Vallandigham ought to be sent to Fort Lafayette. Triptolemus smiled. "Sent to Fort Lafayette? Why, I have no doubt Vallandigham is in the pay of the Government. He is of more service to us than an Herodias. Vallandigham is a casus mentis. He is worth an occasional victory; for when we see him beating the enemy in the field is terrifying it at home. No, no; let us keep Fort Lafayette for those who hurt us."

HISTORY VERSUS PALMERSTON.

IN making his proposition to Parliament that $75,000 a million dollars should be annually paid to the Prince of Wales for his onerous services to the British nation, Lord Palmerston alluded to some of the other inestimable privileges enjoyed by Britons; and he congratulated his fellow-countrymen upon being free from an Oriental despotism upon the one hand, and upon the other from both the mob law and the governmental tyranny of a republic.

The Oriental despotisms must answer for themselves. But when my Lord says a republic he means the United States. Now the ferocity of our mob rule, and the gloomy rigors of our tyrannical Government at this moment, are known to all mankind. The English subjects now in New York are witnesses of our horrible condition. But when the noble Lord speaks of Britain as free from mobs and legal rigors, he conveniently forgets to remember the history of his country. The mob is a British institution. A hundred and fifty years ago the whole of Scotland kept a mob in pay to suppress Tory tumults. In 1779, as my Lord Palmerston will remember, if he chooses, the Gordon rioters had possession of London, and the kingdom was barely saved from civil war. In 1797 the Scotch riots upon the militia act will not have escaped his memory. The fearful Birmingham riots of 1800 in Birmingham and London; the manufacturing mobs in 1812; the peace mobs of 1816; incidents familiar to the most superficial knowledge of British history, are all mobs with which the republic, whose mob rule Lord Palmerston so deprecates, has nothing to offer in comparison.

Still more striking is his Lordship's lapse of memory in respect to the rigors of the Government in time of war, at which, as exhibited in this country, his Lordship shrugs his Lordship's shoulders. Surely he has not forgotten that in 1794, when

Great Britain was at war with France, there were clubs formed in London which preached doctrines considered dangerous by the Government. Mr. Pitt, the Prime Minister, said that "in times of apprehended rebellion" it had been usual to suspend the habeas corpus act, and he introduced, and Parliament passed, a bill to secure and detain all who were suspected of taking action against the Government without the relief of the habeas corpus. Lord Palmerston will concede that that was a rather vigorous measure.

In the year 1795 Great Britain had been three years at war with France. The British people were tired and discontented. London swarmed with "declamatory lecturers," as they were called, who told their audiences that courts and ministers made wars to keep the right walk w in luxury while the people were starved and enslaved. At one meeting of this kind in London fifty thousand people were present. The excitement grew, and the King was stoned as he went to Parliament. Thereupon, as Earl Palmerston, speaking of kept women, will remember, a bill was passed making any act "treasonable" to harm of the King or his heirs high treason, and making the incitement of dislike to the Government, by word or deed, a high misdemeanor. There was also a bill passed to prevent seditious meetings—that is, meetings to discuss in a hostile spirit the policy of the Government. And a house opened for any political discussion without a license was to be fined a hundred pounds. Lord Palmerston thinks our Government intolerably despotic in time of war; but we have not quite reached the British point, we have, Honorable Landlubham and ditto Wood?

So in 1798, also during a foreign war, the habeas bill was revived, which obliged those who let lodgings to give accounts regularly to the Government of the foreigners in their houses, and which enabled the Government to detain foreigners, or prevent aliens at its discretion from landing in England. This bill, also, Pitt thinking suspected men was also renewed; and in 1817, in the happy days of the ever-glorious Prince Regent, all these acts were revived and the habeas corpus suspended, in expectation of domestic trouble, and when there was no war.

These facts have not escaped history, although Lord Palmerston omits to remember them, and when he thanks God that Englishmen are not as other men are in the matter of habeas and arbitrary acts of Government, and especially not like this Republican country, he does no credit to his historical knowledge. We refer to the facts merely as illustrations of the British practice of arbitrary laws. And the radical difference between all such measures here and in every other country is, that here they are the acts of the people themselves for the security of their liberties, and elsewhere, as was the case in England, they are the acts of a governing class to subdue the people.

THE HOSPITAL REGISTER.

In describing, last week, a visit to the United States Military Hospital at West Philadelphia, the Lounger mentioned the pretty little paper, the West Philadelphia Local Reporter, published there by and for the soldiers. It is edited as a labor of love by Dr. F. V. Hayden, whose name is familiar to every scientific student in the country as one of our most distinguished geologists, and who is now a surgeon in the United States service. The contributions are mainly written by the patients, and the type-setting and printing are all done by them in the hospital. Only some half dozen weekly numbers have been issued, and six hundred subscribers at a dollar will insure its continuance for a year and the supply of each patient with a copy. The visiting and resident surgeons take the warmest interest in the undertaking, and more than one of them is gravely suspected of surreptitiously sending communications for its columns. Thus we quoted last week a touching poem beginning:

"mi bik is stif and sore."

And in the same number there were some "Lines on an Autopsical Examination," of which the "subject" revealed the surgical artist. In like manner, in the third number, "The Anatomist's Ode to his Mistress" is a pathetic illustration of the conflict of physiology with poetry, of which the result is a drawn battle. Of course it at the end of the paragraph. "The Battle of Williamsburg" is a vivid chapter in the history of the Peninsular campaign, told by a soldier of the Second New Hampshire, in ward M; while "How Uncle Phineas arranged a Lawsuit, by Proxy, between Tom Mud," is a pleasant prescription for the invalid soldier as he is like to get from the visiting surgeon.

Nothing political or personal or professional will be admitted into the Register. The little paper has a kindly effort to alleviate pains earned in our service. Could we but show you with it well and hearty's worth? If you do, eat your cake and have it. Send your dollar to the West Philadelphia U. S. Hospital Register.

Here is the poem. Mark how learnedly they make love in hospitals!

THE ANATOMIST'S ODE TO HIS MISTRESS.

I list as thy heart and ascending aorta
Their volumes of valvular harmony pour;
And my ear is attuned that mellower music has caught a
Near life 'mid its dry anatomical lore.

O rare is the sound when thy ventricles throb
In a systole regular, measured and true,
While the auricles answer with rhythmical sob,
As they murmur a melody wondrously low!

O thy cornea, love, has the radiant light
Of the sparkle that laughs in the icicle's sheen;
And thy crystalline lens, like a diamond bright,
Through the quivering flames of thine iris is seen!

And thy retina, spreading its lustre of pearl,
Like a fair wavy nebula, distantly gleams
Even a wrait of black cellular nitrous that hurl
From their hexagon angles the silvery beams.

All the dark of those orbs is enlivening me still.
At they roll 'neath the palpebra, finely translucent,
Obeying, in silence, the magical will
Of the oculo-motor—pathetic—abscent.

O sweet is thy voice, as it slightingly wells
From thy darkishy quivering chordiæ vocales,
Or rings in clear tones through the echoing cells
Of the antrum, the sthmoid, and sinus frontales!

And stately the weave of thy maidenly breast,
As the swell of the billow swift rolling to land;
And as soft the vesicular sigh by thy chest
As the moan of the ripple that ebbs o'er the sand.

But, alas! 'tis with many forbidden I pen
Anatomical verse thy beauty to praise,
For I fear me my studies will never again
Bring for me any hope in my happier days.

Then hast stolen the charm from my studio dim—
From dissection I turn with embittering wrath—
Thou hast rigged rhetoric out my skeleton grim—
Ah, lady! fair lady! why crowed ye my path!

THE COPPERHEAD PLAN.

ABOUT once a week there is a meeting of the Vallandigham club in the city of New York, which is addressed by Copperhead orators; at which resistance to the laws is inculcated; the President is hooted, and those who are in favor of a peaceful suppression of the rebellion are denounced as negroheads, fanatics, or by any other name that the speakers think most likely to inflame partisan hatred in favor of Jeff Davis and the men who are murdering our soldiers and trying to overthrow the Government.

At a recent meeting of the club Mr. Voorhees, a representative in Congress from Indiana, read the point of which is in these words: "When the Government want outside of the limits of law, then force should be met by force. The people have but one meaning and intention. They mean simply: "When the authorities do any thing which you do not like, then, my friends, you must resist them. Jeff Davis is failing to fasting and praying. He has no longer any hope but in civil war at the North. The people are ready. The organization is unconstitutional and illegal. Therefore, good Copperheads, strike home."

That there should be any doubt what Mr. Voorhees means, Mr. Fernando Wood explains. He said on the same evening at Stamford, in Connecticut, that "the Conscription Act is unconstitutional, and if he were elected Governor of Connecticut not a man should be forced from the State by the act without a writ of habeas corpus."

The New York Herald of the next morning vigorously set forth the exact consequences and character of this proposition. It is the plan openly avowed by Fernando Wood. Let every man who is in favor of the Union, of the national supremacy, and of obedience to the laws say so.

"When such reckless, bigoted, and narrow-sighted and brawling demagogues as Vallandigham and Pendleton of Ohio, Ben Wood, Brady Bowlin, and their associates, begin to preach the doctrine of resistance to President Lincoln and his conscription act, it is time that we, at least due to the community that the tendencies of their absurd and dangerous instructions should be exposed. They counsel resistance to the draft. Let us suppose that here and there those Copperhead apostles of mob law should succeed in inducing a considerable number to resistance to the conscription. The Government undertakes to execute the law. A bloody collision ensues. Every case of resistance spreads throughout the ranks of the party infected, and civil war, with all its fearful consequences, is inaugurated at the very outset. Such are the results of things what citizen's property, home, or life would be secure? What foreign power, in the event of a war against the intrusion of a gang of hungry ruffians and a disorganized mob, would not be justified in taking the horrible condition how would it be possible to prevent the breaking up of our armies in the field, the occupation of the national capital by Jeff Davis, and the absolute destruction of the Government of the United States?"

"THE HABEAS CORPUS."

GENTLEMEN who, in denouncing the bill relating to the habeas corpus, declaim about Charles First losing his head for disregarding the writ, etc., should be reminded that Charles First was beginning their orations. The revolution that killed Charles and banished his son James was completed by the overthrow of William the King of England, and the law of England respecting the suspension of the habeas corpus was settled by a precedent in the first year of William and Mary. In 1689, when Ireland was in open rebellion, a conspiracy against the King was discovered in England, and the leaders were arrested by the civil power. They then at once applied to Parliament for advice. Parliament passed a bill. The act must be approved by them. The House then refused to empower him to arrest for a limited time all persons whom he should suspect, and rejected an amendment that it should never be made a precedent.

Thus the English law is that the privilege of the writ is to be suspended by the consent of the whole Government, executive and legislative. Or, in other words, it is for the Parliament only, or legislative power, that, whenever it sees proper, can authorize the Crown, by suspending the writ, to imprison any man for a limited time, to imprison suspected persons without giving any reason for so doing. . . . The nation puts with the liberty for a while in order to preserve it forever."

The English practice has been that in the absence of Parliament, or even while it was in session, when the case demanded instant action, the ministers have suspended the privilege of the writ, and then asked Parliament to indemnify them. The authority upon the subject is conceded to be supreme, and whose sanction is retrospective in its operation.

Mr. Lincoln's action has conformed exactly to the English precedent and to the tradition of constitutional liberty. In the absence of Congress, and in the extreme peril of the country, with the plain provision of the Constitution before him which allows the suspension without naming the suspending power, he did exactly what William Third, what any clear-sighted and honest supreme executive officer, would instinctively have done. At the same time he summoned Congress, and directly upon its assembling laid the case before them in a few words of simple good sense, which we reproduce here as most timely and most wise, and indicative of that candor and sagacity which are not less remarkable in the President than his unswerving fidelity not only to the laws, but, alas, what is to us an unaccustomed spectacle in the administration of the presidential office, to the spirit of the laws.

"The whole of the laws which were required to be faithfully executed were being resisted, and failing of execution in nearly one-third of the States. Must they be allowed to finally fail of execution even had it been perfectly clear that, by the use of the means necessary to their execution, some single law, made in such extreme tenderness of the citizen's liberty that practically it relieves some of the guilty than the innocent, should, to a very limited extent, be violated? To state the question more directly, are all the laws but one to go unexecuted, and the Government itself go to pieces lest that one be violated? Even in such a case would not the official oath be broken, if the Government should be overthrown, when it was believed that disregarding the single law would tend to preserve it? But it was not believed that this question was presented. It was not believed that any law was violated. The provision of the Constitution that 'the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it,' is a provision—is a limitation—on the power to suspend, when suspension may be required, and not a direct general power to suspend. Nor is it conferred upon any branch of the Government, but clearly implies that all the branches, when acting within their proper spheres, shall have their participation. The Congress, and not the Executive, is invested with this power. But the Constitution itself is silent as to which, or who, is to exercise the power; and as the provision was plainly made for a dangerous emergency, it cannot be believed that the framers of the instrument intended that, in every case, the danger should run its course until Congress could be called together; the very assembling of which might be prevented, as was intended in this case, by the rebellion."

He then submitted preliminary legislation upon the subject to "the better judgment" of Congress, and Congress has responded by the act which protects the President, and which declares the subversive of all the liberties of the citizen. It does most emphatically subvert the liberty of the citizen to conspire against the unity and existence of the nation.

The whole question is most thoroughly and exhaustively discussed in Mr. Fisher's "Trial of the Constitution."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A SAILOR about being married, could not find change enough for the parson's fees. The reverend gentleman, observing the difficulty, offered the astonished tar his married. Jack, glancing its band in his pocket, drew out a guinea, saying, "Never mind, brother, marry us as far as it will go."

A colonel was boasting that he had sprung from a high family. "Yes," said a lady, "a high family. I have often seen some of the family so high that their feet could not touch the ground."

An old Dutchman undertook to walk his son, but Jake turned upon him and walloped him. The old man complained to the landlord for rejecting of his son's manhood. He said, "Well, Jake ish a smart fellow; he can vip his own vather."

What is that which belongs to yourself yet is used by every body?—Your name.

Some unknown cholera reporter states that a lady who had just been married, went to bed, and was laid out by her friends, was found the night following standing at the cupboard eating cucumbers. Such is life!

"They left her 'a laying in' white.
Frequent for the grave's quiet slumbers;
They left the lady all right very early night,
A laying in pickled cucumbers."

"Where is the East?" inquired a tutor one day of a young lad in front of him. "Why, in the morning comes from," was the prompt and pleasant answer.

Hearing something said the other day about a "monitor," a Dutchman inquired what it was. When he supposed the grappling-iron aboard the fleet were called the guard-irons.

A Frenchman once saw a gentleman walk up to an open mailbox in the hands of another, and take a pinch of snuff. He immediately asked the meaning of the word. "May I take the liberty?" On the next day the Frenchman went into a tobacco shop and asked for half a pound of liberty.

A son of the Emerald Isle, telling his adventures in California, said: "The first thousand hard I ever saw in America was a federation. I tried him under a haystack, and shot him through the head; the first time I shot him I missed him, and the second time I hit him where I missed before."

The nearest a certain man in this city ever approached to luck was to find a counterfeit note on a broken bank. He thinks that very lucky that he found it; it would have been a gold piece.

The young man who, guided by the memory of his wrongs, and shielded by a coat of dark, gave the reins to his evil passions, has been collared by a policeman, and will soon be hauled up before a justice.

There are protected patriots who will hold any thing except their tongues; keep any thing except their word; and less nothing patiently except their character.

"I think," said Mr. Thackeray, "I would rather have had a potato and a friendly word from Goldsmith than have been beholden to Dean Swift for a guinea and a dinner."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

CONGRESS.

THE extra session of the Senate closed on 14th. A large number of nominations were confirmed, but no other public business was done.

THE CONSCRIPTION IN THE WEST.

General McClernand's troops have been compelled to embark for Milliken's Bend, sixteen miles above Vicksburg, owing to high water. Recent operations at Lake Providence and elsewhere resulted in inundating more than one hundred miles of plantations, destroying millions of dollars' worth of property. The rebel guerrillas suffered terribly by the flood. In fact, they were completely driven out.

GENERAL HUNTER ABOUT TO MOVE.

General Hunter's army at Port Royal is about to move on some important expedition. If we can judge from the movements of troops, the Commanding General has his soldiers; in which he says that after long and weary delays, he is about to move on some one of the most sacred and central, they have at length the cheering prospect of active and very important service.

REBEL PROPOSAL FOR PEACE.

A resolution was offered on the 11th instant in the Congress of the Confederate States by Mr. Conrad, proposing terms of peace, and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The terms it provides for are "the basis and form of Representatives of the Confederate States do therefore propose to the United States to negotiate for a final Declaration in any measures it may adopt, consistent with the honor, dignity, and independence of the Confederate States, leading to a speedy restoration of peace with all or with any of the States of the late Federal Union."

A LOYAL GOVERNOR.

Governor Cannon, of Delaware, has just issued an important proclamation on the subject of "illegal arrests." Ignoring state rights altogether, and placing the Federal above them. The proclamation is called forth by the passage of an act in the Assembly to prevent illegal arrests in that State. The Governor says: "I again urge the good people of this State that they hold true allegiance to the Government of the United States as paramount to the State of Delaware, and that they obey the constituted authorities charged with the Legislature of the State of Delaware or any other human authority whatsoever."

A PRIVATEER ON THE PACIFIC.

A fast schooner was reported to have been seized on 19th by the United States authorities, and detained as a privateer. About twenty thousands were found on board, well armed, together with six brass Dahlgren guns, with carriages complete for use in action. Correspondence found on the persons of the prisoners will lead to other arrests.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY IN PARLIAMENT.

On 9th ult., in the House of Lords, Earl Russell alluded to the recognition of the Confederate States by Mexico Confederacy, and requested Lord Strathdeen to postpone until the 24th inst. when he had been given notice of the production of copies of all dispatches from Mr. Mason to her Majesty's Government on the claim of the Southern Confederacy to be acknowledged as an independent power by Great Britain, to which Lord Strathdeen assented. Lord Palmerston, in the House of Commons, in reply to a question as to whether there was any correspondence between her Majesty's Government and the Emperor of the French relative to the offer of mediation, said that the several and Confederate States, and if so, whether there was any objection to lay the same before the House, stated also if the Government was aware that any replies on the subject had been received by the Emperor of the French from the Federal Government—answered that the only official communication he had was a dispatch from Lord Russell on the 13th of November to Lord Cowley, in a reply to a similar communication from the French Government. This document was already on the table of the House. With regard to the offer of mediation he might have replied by the Emperor of the French, that would be a matter between the French Government and the French Minister at Washington, and he did not see how he could answer the question.

THE FOOD SHIPS.

The arrival of the American food ships Achilles and Griswold was the source of a great demonstration in Manchester. A large meeting was held, and an address of thanks adopted to the captains and officers of the Griswold. The speeches expressed the fullest sympathy with the United States. On the 10th inst. Captain Jeffers also entertained the officers of the Griswold at a grand banquet on board his ship. At the close of the repast, the officers of the Magnolia, proposed the health of the President, and said that the Union flag became the freedom and the check of a great nation, but because of his undoubted principles of liberty, and in accordance with the object of establishing a constitutional government.

POLAND.

THE INSURRECTION.

The Polish insurrection is exciting great attention in the Cabinets of the leading Powers. It is announced from Warsaw that the Russians had been defeated by the Poles after an engagement which lasted five hours. The town of Radzigalow, near which the battle took place, has been reduced to ruins. The insurgents appear to be carrying on operations with great activity and energies.

BOMBARDMENT OF FORT M'ALLISTER BY THE IRON-CLAD FLEET.—[FROM A SKETCH BY AN EYE-WITNESS ON BOARD THE "MONTAUK."]

JIM WILLIAMS.

JEM WILLIAMS, whose portrait we publish on this page, is of small, compact stature, twenty-six years of age, was born in the District of Columbia, from whence he was sold about six years ago to Benjamin Barber, of Carroll Parish, Louisiana. Williams, learning the arrival of General M'Arthur's division at Lake Providence, left his master about the 1st of February last, and joined the army in the capacity of cook in the Ninety-fifth Illinois Regiment. On Tuesday, the 10th of February, learning that a scouting party had just gone out to make a reconnoissance in the neighborhood of his home, Williams determined to join them; and, borrowing a mule and musket, followed and overtook the party about five miles distant, and just before they fell into a rebel ambuscade of guerrillas, numbering about two hundred and fifty, who had left their horses in the rear, and, under cover of canebreaks and bushes, were reserving their attack until our advanced-guard of about forty infantry should be fairly within range. At this a volley was discharged by the rebels which frustrated one quarter of our men; the remainder charged bayonets and drove the rebels from their shelter. Now commenced a running fight. Jim Williams dashed to the front and swept on about one hundred and fifty yards in advance. When under cover of a tree he commenced firing; this started up three guerrillas a short distance from him. The wily scout, observing them rise, leveled his musket and demanded their surrender, upon which two threw down their arms; the third, at the same instant, fired at Williams, the ball cutting off his belted knife. Williams returned the fire, sending a ball through the head of the rebel and killing him instantly. He then brought in his two prisoners with their guns; one of which he was allowed to keep as a proof that negroes can fight. The little party of forty succeeded in dispersing the rebels and taking thirty-one prisoners before the remainder of the troops arrived.

On returning to camp a guerrilla scout was observed by the quick eye of Williams a quarter of a mile off. He darted after him like a hound for his prey. The rebel waited the onset, when Williams, coming within about fifty yards, delivered an off-hand shot which sent the foe reeling on his horse's neck, crying "O God! I'm shot."

Williams is very anxious to raise a company of negroes for scouting service, and said to the writer of this, on leaving him a few days since, "I am willing to work, but would rather fight." General M'Arthur, who appreciates true bravery without regard to color, holds him in the highest estimation, and freely gives him the post of honor in scouting the swamps of Louisiana.

It is the opinion of the gentleman who furnishes the above account, derived from personal observation in that region, that a force of ten thousand able-bodied negroes could be raised within thirty days if any effort were made for that purpose.

A STRAGGLER.

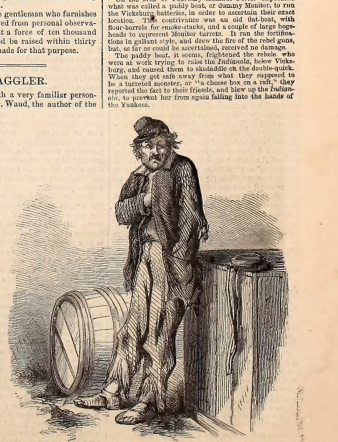
WE illustrate herewith a very familiar personage to our armies. Mr. Waud, the author of the sketch, writes:

"This sketch, taken in a little country store, is a fair representation of a class which increases with great rapidity when the army is on the move. With worn-out clothes, mournful looks, and dirty persons, they beg or steal as occasion offers, carefully avoiding their regiments, where they can get all needful supplies, for fear they should be given something to do. They generally travel in little squads, some of whom have thrown away or sold their arms and knapsacks—sleeping in barns or camping out in by-places, for which the modern shelter-tent affords great facilities, being so easily transported and pitched. Sometimes they waylay for food, but more often live on the fat of the land, begging or buying bread, and stealing poultry, meat, vegetables, and so forth. Where it is safe they do a good deal of bullying; in the vicinity of guards they assume a dejected air, usually counterfeiting lameness to get the charity of the country folk.

"A more efficient provost guard would remedy this crying evil in the army, is being a noticeable fact that not till after a new country has been subjected for days to pillage at the hands of straggling scoundrels is any effort made to do away with the evil, although a private citizen is liable to arrest or detention in the most absurd places."

UNION JIM.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

THE PRINCESS ALEXANDRA OF DENMARK.



WE publish on next page a portrait of the PRINCESS ALEXANDRA OF DENMARK, now the wife of the Prince of Wales, from a bust lately executed in London. She wears an ancient Egyptian brooch, presented by the Prince by the Pasha of Egypt, and valued at some enormous sum. The lady, it will be seen, is beautiful enough to justify Lord Palmerston's encomium; it will be her own fault if she be not happy. No girl in our day has commenced life under more promising auspices.

BACHE'S QUAKER.

WE illustrate herewith the exploit of "BACHE'S QUAKER" on the Mississippi, at which the whole West is shaking its sides with laughter. After the loss of the Indianola, it seems, Admiral Porter and his officers were at their wit's-end for some device to repair the loss. The Herald correspondent says:

On the 5th of February Admiral Porter dispatched what was called a paddy boat, or dummy Monitor, to run the Vicksburg batteries, in order to ascertain their exact location. The contrivance was an old flat-boat, with flour-barrels for smoke-stacks, and a couple of large hogsheads to represent Monitor turrets. It ran the fortifications in gallant style, and drew the fire of the rebel guns, but, as far as could be ascertained, received no damage.

The paddy boat, it seems, frightened the rebels who were at work trying to raise the Indianola, below Vicksburg, and caused them to skedaddle on the double-quick. When they got safe away from what they supposed to be a turreted monitor, or "a cheese box on a raft," they reported the fact to their friends, and blew up the Indianola, to prevent her from again falling into the hands of the Yankees.

A STRAGGLER.—[SKETCHED BY MR. A. R. WAUD.]

In reference to this the Jackson Mississippian had the following:

The destruction of the Indianola was a most unnecessary and unfortunate affair. The turreted monster proved to be a flat-boat, with sundry fixtures to create deception. She passed Vicksburg Tuesday night, and the officers believing she was really a turreted monster, blew the Indianola up, but the guns fell into the hands of the enemy.

The Vicksburg Whig of 6th says:

We stated a day or two since that we would not enlighten our readers in regard to a matter which was puzzling them very much. We alluded to the loss of the gun-boat Indianola, recently captured from the enemy. We were loth to acknowledge she had been destroyed, but such is the case. The Yankee barge sent down the river last week was reported to be an iron-clad gun-boat. The authorities, thinking that this monster would retake the Indianola, immediately issued an order to blow her up. The order was sent down by courier to the officer in charge of the vessel. A few hours afterward another order was sent down countermanding the first, it being ascertained that the monstrous craft was only a coal-boat; but before it reached the Indianola she had been blown to atoms—not even a gun was saved. Who is to blame for the folly, this precipitancy? It would really seem as if we had no use for gun-boats on the Mississippi, as a coal-barge is magnified into a monster, and our authorities immediately order a boat that would have been worth a small army to us to be blown up.

The New York Times publishes a letter from an officer, from which we extract the following:

Finding that they (the rebels) could not be provoked to fire without an object, I thought of getting up an imitation Monitor. Ericsson saved the country with an iron one—why could I not save it with a wooden one? An old coal-barge, picked up in the river, was the foundation to build on. It was built of old boards in twelve hours, with pork barrels on top of each other for smoke-stacks, and two old canoes for quarter-boats; for furnaces were built of mud, and only intended to make black smoke and not steam.

Without knowing that Brown was in peril, I lost hour our Monitor. When it was descried by the dim light of the morn, never did the batteries of Vicksburg open with such a din; the earth fairly trembled, and the shot flew thick around the devoted Monitor. But she run safely past all the batteries, though under fire for an hour, and drifted down to the lower mouth of the canal. She was a much better looking vessel than the Indianola.

When it was broad daylight they opened on her again with all the guns they could bring to bear without a shot hitting her to do any harm, because they did not make her settle in the water, though going in at one side and out at another. She was already full of water. The soldiers of our army shouted and laughed like mad, but the laugh was somewhat spoiled when when they subsequently discovered the Queen of the West lying at the wharf at Waterton. The question was asked, what had happened to the Indianola? Had the two rams sunk her or captured her in the engagement we heard the night before? The sounds of cannon had receded down the river, which led us to believe that Brown was chasing the Webb, and that the Queen had got up past him.

One or two soldiers got the Monitor out in the stream again, and let her go down on the ram Queen. All the forts commenced firing and signaling, and as the Monitor approached the Queen the turned tail and ran down river as fast as she could go, the Monitor after her, making all the speed that was given her by a five-knot current. The forts at Warrenton fired bravely and rapidly, but the Monitor did not return the fire with her wooden guns, but proceeded down after the Queen of the West. An hour after this the same heavy firing that we had heard the night before came booming up on the still air.

THE PRINCESS ALEXANDRA OF DENMARK, NOW THE WIFE OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

This "booming" was the destruction of the Indianola.

The following is Admiral Porter's official account of the affair:

U. S. MISSISSIPPI SQUADRON, YAZOO RIVER,
March 20, via MEMPHIS AND LOUISVILLE, 18th.

Hon. Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy:

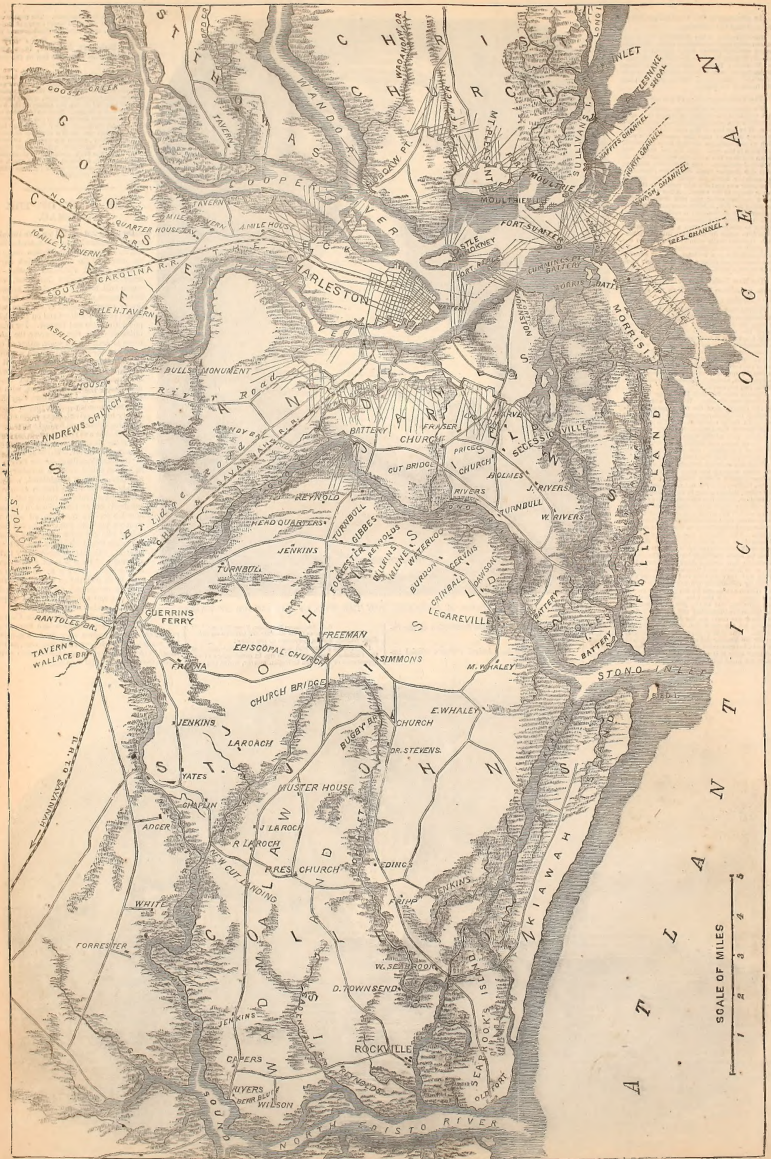
I have been pretty well assured for some time past that the Indianola had been blown up, in consequence of the appearance of a wooden imitation mortar, which the enemy sunk with their batteries. The mortar was a valuable aid to us. It ferried over the Queen of the West, and caused the blowing up of the Indianola.

D. D. PORTER.

The Richmond Examiner, in a very grim way, thus pokes its fun at the rebels:

The reported fate of the Indianola is even more disgraceful than farcical. Here was perhaps the finest iron-clad in the Western waters, captured after a heroic struggle, rapidly repaired, and destined to join the Queen of the West in a series of victories. Next we hear that she was of necessity blown up, in the true Merrimac-Mallory style—and why? Laugh and hold your sides, lest you die of a surfeit of derision, O Yankeedom! Blown up because, forsooth, a flat-boat, or mud-scow, with a small house taken from the back-garden of a plantation, put on top of it, is floated down the river, before the frightened eyes of the Partisan Rangers. A turreted monster!

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.



On pages 200 and 201 we give two pictures from sketches by our special artist, Mr. A. R. Waud. One of them shows us the course of the Rappahannock River looking toward Falmouth Station—a scene of unsurpassed loveliness, and which will hereafter be classic ground. Generations unborn will wander here to descry some memorial of the men who fought in these valleys and on those hills under Burnside and Hooker. For many miles on either side the river the landscapes is dotted with tents, either of our troops or the enemy's; within a radius of ten miles round Fredericksburg it is probable that not less than 200,000 men are encamped. Many thousand brave men sleep under the sod there, with no stone to mark the spot where they died for their country. The forests whose beauty has survived the ravages of war are being thinned out for fuel: from morn till night the axe rings through the trees. The other picture represents WYNDHAM'S HORSE ON A SCOUT. Mr. Waud writes:

"Colonel Wyndham—or Sir Percy, as he is often called, being a member of a Sardinian order of knighthood, won by gallant conduct in the Italian campaign—has proved himself a dashing officer of cavalry in our service. Some of the long marches he has made, in all sorts of weather, are quite remarkable, and have gained him the same reputation among the rebels that Jeb Stuart has with our soldiers. His brigade travels very light, and many of them without shelter tents or blankets. After a forced march of from 50 to 90 miles in a day, they bivouac on the ground, till the bugles calling boot and saddle warn them to prepare for another rapid advance.

"The sketch represents the General marching down to Falmouth from Warrenton on a recent search after Stuart's cavalry. The roads are in such poor condition, that, as represented in the picture, the main body often strike across country from point to point."

"RACHEL'S QUAKER" DRIVING THE "QUEEN OF THE WEST," AND CAUSING THE REBELS TO BLOW UP THE "INDIANOLA."—[SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

MAP OF CHARLESTON, S. C., SHOWING THE APPROACHES BY LAND AND WATER, THE REBEL BATTERIES AND LINES OF FIRE, ROADS, INLETS, PRINCIPAL PLANTATIONS, ETC. COMPILED FROM VARIOUS SOURCES.

HOW AN OFFICER MADE LOVE WHILE THE ENEMY MADE WAR.

JACOB H—— was a nice young man, who, on receiving his appointment as Lieutenant, devoted both time and thought to the proper development and cultivation of his mustache. I do not know that he was quite so particular about his regimental duties; and there were some awkward whispers about the disappearance of the standard which he bore in going into an action, but which he certainly did not carry out of it. He said, however, that it had been shot away, and there was nobody who could positively contradict the assertion; so he remained in the regiment, and at the appointed time went off on his appointed duties.

While the army lay before Fredericksburg, in the early part of December, the cavalry of the Left Grand Division picketed the country from Dumfries toward the Rappahannock. The line had been marked out by a staff-officer, whose judgment in such matters was very questionable, and only the most incessant watchfulness could secure the advance posts from surprise and capture. A multitude of woodland roads diverged in every direction, so that cavalry forces could easily get into the rear of the posts. The only thing was to be ready to take advantage of the same intricacy to escape and give the alarm. Every man must be alert to mount and fight and retreat at a moment's notice. Weapons must be at hand, and girths kept tight enough for service; for, surrounded by well-wishers to the rebellion, we had to contend against our ignorance of the rebel motions, while they were kept continually acquainted with ours.

Under these circumstances Lieutenant H——, with sixteen men, was posted on the road leading from Stafford to Dumfries; his Captain, with even a smaller party, taking a position to support him. Now there happened to live on that road, close to picket head-quarters, a certain Mrs. C——, the wife of a captain in the rebel artillery. This lady was young, and attractive enough to poor fellows in the army, cut off from all the charms of feminine society during most of the time, when she was by necessity "a grass widow," and by inclination appeared ready to assume all the privileges of actual widowhood.

So, like a spider waiting for prey, she dwelt there in her house, watching the movements of our men.

Presently Jacob, who had been loitering round, thought that he had better see who lived in the house, and came gallantly up the hill. Mrs. C—— was all smiles and courtesy. She did not deny that she was Southern in heart. Her husband was in the Southern army, and she thought that he was right in being there. But it was hard for a poor lonely woman; and our soldiers were so rude. She would feel so much obliged if Lieutenant H—— would protect her. She would be very happy if he could take his meals at her house, for then the men would feel that they must not disturb her; and she was sure that a gentleman of Lieutenant H——'s appearance and manners would see that no harm was done. The poor foolish fly thought the spider a very charming creature, and could not see the web into which he was blundering. He accepted the invitation most cordially, thinking that he must certainly have produced an impression. With an air of hospitality, Mrs. C—— then ordered her horse to be saddled, telling H—— that she would go at once to a neighbor's and provide a pair of chickens for dinner, her own having been all stolen. H—— had already arrived at that point where he could see no objection to any thing which she proposed; and in the mean time he kept up an animated conversation, saying many tender things, and casting many amorous glances at his hostess. Of course he tangled himself more and more in the web, letting her find out just what she wished to know. She need not be afraid. She would not meet any of our troops. His were the only ones in that neighborhood, and his pickets were placed in such and such directions. So she rode off, and he returned to his post. While he was away his men, as will always be the case when an officer is not attentive, had removed their weapons, and some had even taken off their saddles. H——'s mind was too much engaged in thinking about the lady to take notice of things relating to his duty, and when his Captain rode up to visit the post he found every thing in this careless state. H—— forthwith received a stern reprimand, and a peremptory order to see that his men kept armed and their horses were saddled. For this time he obeyed the order; but by the time two relicfs had gone round all was again in the same condition.

What Mrs. C—— had been doing may easily be conjectured. She had only to take a short ride to her neighbor's, get the chickens, let full information of our disposition, and return home as innocently as could be. The chickens had not been picked, however, before a clever negro was making his way with a note to the advance post of General Hampton. The chickens were never tender, the lady tenderer, the Lieutenant tenderest of all. He met for some time after dinner, describing his military career, his hopes and disappointments, meeting with a delicate sympathy which he had never before received. When they parted it was only to be till tea-time, when the lady promised him some music. And now I am afraid that Jacob, even if he had had brains enough to think of his responsibilities, would have run the risk of capture in order to enjoy the society of a lady who evidently appreciated his excellent qualities far more than the vulgar souls with whom he associated in the regiment. He had met with a congenial spirit, and he looked forward with delight to his three days of picket duty, from which he was generally inclined to hang back. He went over in thought all that he had said, and all that she had replied, and constructed an imaginary conversation for the evening which would be still more delightful. He wondered what songs she would sing, and thought of the comments he could subjoin to the most sentimental. In short, without knowing it, poor Jacob was already in love. The fly had got fatally entangled in the web.

As he walked up to supper an old colored woman met him at the door.

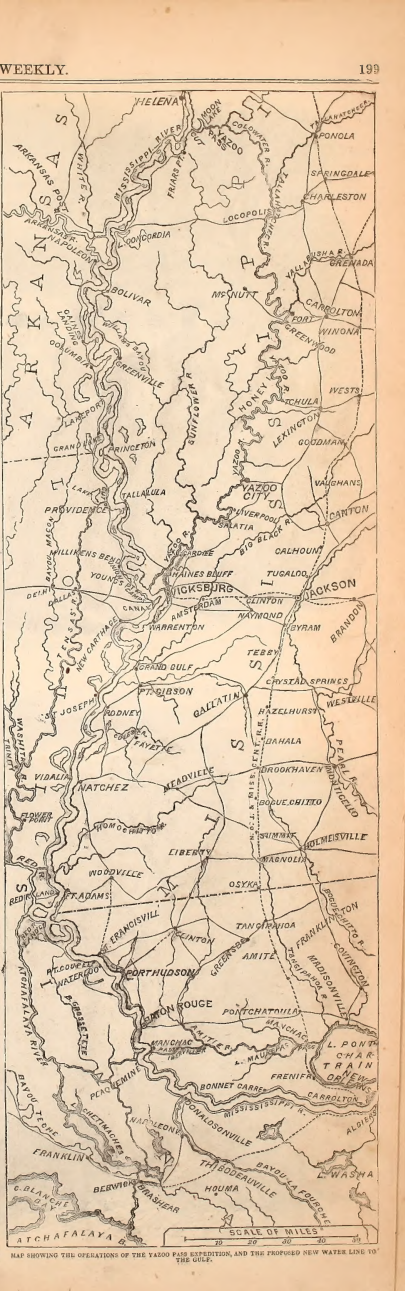
"Oh, Massa!" she whispered, "don't go in dar. Our codgers come and catch you, sho'!"

"What is that silly creature saying?" said her mistress, who had slipped out and overheard her speech. "She is always fancying the Southern troops are coming to fight you, ever since she was scared at Dumfries some time ago. I have been waiting for you, and it is very ungrateful in you to prefer her conversation to mine!"

H—— hurried in, and was soon sipping coffee, and thinking it nectar—though it had come from his own baversack originally. The piano was then enlisted in the service, and Mrs. C—— was singing some of her sweetest songs with much expression. Suddenly she began to play a march with the full power of the instrument; and it was not until some minutes had passed by that H—— distinguished through the music the sound of the galloping of horse. Unfortunate Jacob! His sword was in the supper-room, where he had left it as he sat down. He rushed for it, and bearing it in his hand made for the door.

"I will trouble you for that!" said a manly voice; and Jacob had to render his weapon up to an officer in Confederate uniform who stood upon the threshold. Then, oh bitter mortification! he witnessed the charming Mrs. C—— rush from the parlor into this officer's arms; and he gnashed his teeth as several unmistakable kisses were given by those lips which had uttered such gentle sounds for him but a little while before! Could he believe his eyes and ears? She was actually laughing at him, joined by her husband!

"Take good care of him, Charlie!" she said. "You don't know how dangerous I found him!" And the aforesaid Charlie, bowing very low, thanked him in a tone of mock courtesy for the attention he had paid his wife; assuring him that he would repay it by carrying him on a little visit to his own camp. Poor Jacob could not find a word to reply. He was led off like a lamb; and, escorted by three hundred Southern cavalry, made his first reconnoissance of his own picket line. What was worse, on being exchanged he found that he had been summarily dismissed from service, with loss of all pay and allowances; and he has nothing now to do but to murmur at the injustice of the Government and the treachery of Southern women.

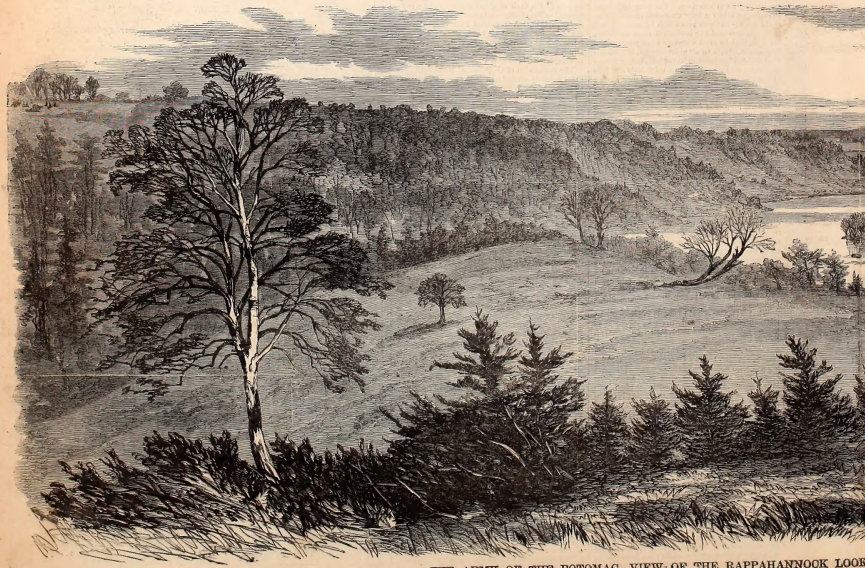


THE NEW OUTLET TO THE GULF.

On this page we present a MAP OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER FROM HELENA, ARKANSAS, TO NEW ORLEANS, and also the lateral navigable streams on which, by means of short cuts through the levees of the great river, our gun-boats and transports can pass through the Confederate territory from Yazoo Pass to Vicksburg, and from Providence, which is sixty miles above Vicksburg, to Atchafalaya Bay, an arm of the Gulf of Mexico, and thus be independent of the strong positions of Vicksburg, Ellis Cliff, Fort Adams, and Port Hudson, until the 228 miles between the former and latter places (all now held of the 1090 miles which the Confederates once controlled) shall be opened to the uninterrupted navigation of Union vessels.

The navigation of these lateral rivers will give great military advantages to our armies, particularly that of the Yazoo, passing, as it does, through a very fertile region in the immediate neighborhood, also parallel to and not far distant from the Mississippi Central Railroad. By means of a short canal cut through the eastern bank of the Mississippi River, 8 miles below Helena and 326 miles from Cairo, and near where De Soto first stood on its bank, the waters of the river are let into Moon Lake, a beautiful sheet of clear water in the midst of forest trees. From this lake runs a rapid, crooked, and narrow stream, Yazoo Pass, uniting with the Coldwater River. This river, after a tortuous course of about 60 miles, unites with the Tallahatchee River, and this, about 50 miles farther south, unites with the Yallabusha River. These rivers together form the Yazoo—one of fine navigable qualities, being deep, clear, and tranquil, and flowing through an extensive region of highly-productive cotton plantations. The only town of importance on its bank is Yazoo City, about 50 miles direct from Vicksburg. At the beginning of the rebellion the population of this town was over 3000, and upward of 100,000 bales of cotton were annually received here and sent by steamboats to New Orleans. The Yazoo River is the hiding-place for many of the rebel boats which have been driven from the Mississippi River. Haines's Bluff fortifications command the navigation of this river a few miles above its entrance into the Mouth of Yazoo.

At Providence, on the west bank of the Mississippi River, 640 miles from Cairo and 460 from New Orleans, is a lake of the same name, the waters of which are several feet below the level of the river. From this lake the Bayou or River Tensas runs southwardly and enters the Washita or Ouachita River; this Washita about 50 miles farther south joins the Red River. The latter, a few miles below the junction, empties much of its waters into the Atchafalaya River. This river runs a devious course of about 200 miles, and empties most of its waters into a bay of the same name about 150 miles west of the mouths of the Mississippi. From Providence to the Gulf of Mexico, by this communication, it is a much shorter distance than by the course of the Mississippi River; and when the cut through the levee of the river at Providence is opened to the lake an immense volume of water will pour through, and not only deepen the channels of the Tensas and other rivers, but also flood an immense region of cotton plantations on the low flat banks of this new channel to the Gulf.



The fine dotted lines on the map show the main roads through the country represented, the heavier dotted lines the railroads.

ELLINOR grasped eagerly at the only pleasure that her money enabled her to give to the old man, and promised him that she would take care and buy the right to that particular piece of ground. This was evidently a gratification Duncan had frequently enjoyed before. "Mother," he kept saying, "I'm greatly obleeged to ye, Miss Ellinor; I may say I'm truly obleeged." And when he saw them off by the coach the next day, his last words were, "I can not justly say how greatly I'm obleeged to you for that matter o' the church-yard." It was a much more easy affair to give Miss Monro some additional comforts; she was as cheerful as ever; still working away at her lunguages at any spare time, but complaining that she was tired of the perpetual teaching in which her life had been spent during the last thirty years. Ellinor was enabled to set her at liberty from this, and she accepted the kindness from her former pupil with as much simple gratitude as that with which a mother receives a favor from a child. "If Ellinor were but married to Livingstone, I should be happier than I have ever been since my father died," she used to say to herself in the solitude of her bedchamber; for Ellinor had begun to become her own in the early years of her isolated life as a governess. "And yet," she went on, "I don't know what I should do without her; it is lucky for me that things are not in my hands; for a pretty mess I should make of them, one way or another. Don't how old Mrs. Cadogan used to hate that word 'mess,' and correct her grandchildren for using it right before my face, when I knew I had been guilty of it the moment before! Well, those days are all over now. God be thanked!"

In spite of being glad that "things were not in her hands," Miss Monro tried to take affairs into charge by doing all she could to persuade Ellinor to allow her to invite the Canon to their "little sociable teas." The most provoking part was that she was sure he would come if he had been asked; but she could never get leave to do so. "Of course no man could go on forever without some encouragement," as she confided to herself in a plaintive tone of voice; and by-and-by many people were led to suppose that Dr. Goldsticker's Canon was paying attention to Miss Forbes, the eldest daughter of the family to which the delicate Jeannie belonged. It was not that Miss Forbes had both Miss Monro and Ellinor were the most intimate of all the families in East Chester. Mrs. Forbes was a widow, with a large income, with a large family of pretty, delicate daughters. She herself believed to one of the great houses in —— shire, but married into Scotland; so, after her husband's death, it was the most natural thing in the world that she should settle in East Chester; and the character of her daughters had become first Miss Monro's pupil, and afterward her friend. Mrs. Forbes herself had always been strongly attracted by Ellinor, but it was long before she could conquer the timid reserve by which Miss Wilkins was hedged round. It was Miss Monro, who was herself inexpressibly of jealousy, who persevered in praising one to another, and bringing them together; and now Ellinor was as intimate and familiar in Mrs. Forbes's household as she ever could be with any family but her own.

Mrs. Forbes was considered to be a little fanciful as to illness; but it was no wonder, remembering the many cases she had lost by consumption. Miss Monro had often grumbled at the manner in which her pupils were made irregular for very trifling causes. But no one so alarmed as she when, in the autumn succeeding Mr. Ness's death, Mrs. Forbes remarked to her as Ellinor's increased delicacy of appearance and shortness of breathing. From that time forward she worried Ellinor (if any one so sweet and patient could ever have been worried) with respirators and precautions. Ellinor submitted to her friend's wishes and cares sooner than make her anxious, and remained a prisoner in the house through November, December, January, in anxiety took a turn. Ellinor's appetite and spirits failed her—not at all an unnatural consequence of so many weeks confinement to the house. A pain was started quite suddenly one morning in December, that met with approval from every one but Ellinor, who was unable by this time to languid to make much resistance.

Mrs. Forbes and her daughters were going to Rome for three or four months, so as to avoid the trying east winds of spring; why should not Miss Wilkins go with them? They urged it, and Miss Monro urged it, though with a little private sinking of the heart at the idea of the long separation from one who was almost like a child to her. Ellinor was, as it were, lifted off her feet and borne away by the unanimous opinion of others, and she was decided, when she called that such a step was highly desirable, if not absolutely necessary. She knew that she had only a life-interest both in her father's property and in that bequeathed to her by Mr. Ness. Hitherto she had not felt much troubled by this, as she had supposed that in the natural course of events she should survive Miss Monro and Duncan, both of whom she looked upon as dependent upon her. All she had to bequeath to the two were the small savings, which would not nearly suffice for both purposes, especially considering that Miss Monro had given up her teaching, and that both she and Dixon were passing into years.

Before Ellinor left England she had made every arrangement for the contingency of her death abroad that Mr. Johnson could suggest. She had written and sent a long letter to Dixon; and a shorter one was left in charge of Canon Livingstone (she dared not hint at the possibility of her dying to Miss Monro) to be sent to the old man.

As Ellinor went out of the King's Cross Station they passed a gentleman's carriage entering. Ellinor saw a bright handsome lady, a maze, and baby inside, and a gentleman sitting by them whose face she could never forget. It was Mr. Corbet taking his wife and child to the railway. Ellinor was then building a vessel to East Chester Deanery. He had been leaning back, not noticing the passers-by, not attending to the chatter and prattle of the group, gravely absorbed in the consideration of some law case. Such were the casual glimpses Ellinor had of one with whose life she had once thought herself bound up.

CHAPTER XIV.

Who so proud as Miss Monro when a foreign letter came? Her correspondent was not particularly graphic in her descriptions, nor were there any adventures to be recounted, but even the habit of mind of Ellinor such as to make her clear and definite in her own impressions from what she saw, and her memory never kept her from fluent in communicating them even to Miss Monro. But that lady would have been pleased to read about these foreign streets, cathedrals, and canons, and would not have been surprised if they had invited her to the Chapter-house for this purpose, for her ideas of Continental habits, ignorant of Murray, but laudably desirous of information, all Ellinor's historical reminiscences and rather formal descriptions were interesting. There was no railroad in those days between Lyons and Marseilles, so their progress was slow, and the passage of the Alps and Apennines, when they had arrived in Rome, long and uncertain. But all seemed going on well. Ellinor spoke of Mrs. Forbes and her family and Canon Livingstone (between whom and Miss Monro great intimacy had sprung up since Ellinor's departure), and Miss Monro's letters could ask him to ten) confirmed this report of Miss Wilkins's health. The letter in which he had received from Mrs. Forbes. Curiously about that letter was Miss Monro's torment. What could it have had to write to Ellinor about? It was a very odd proceeding; although the Livingstones and Forbeses were distantly related, other than these relationships Ellinor (as I have been that he had offered to Euphemia, after all, and that her mother had answered; or, possibly, there were other letters which were enclosed. It was a pity for Miss Monro's peace of mind that she did not ask him straight away. She would have saved herself much fuss. Livingstone had no thought of concealing, that Mrs. Forbes had written solely to give him some fuller direction about certain church plate she had had time to think about in the hurry of starting. As it was, and when, a little later on, his head (in spite of the pressing affairs of going himself to Rome, when his term of residence was over, in time for the Carnival, she gave up her food purpose) was filled very much like a child whose house of bricks had been knocked down by the unlucky waft of some passing petticoat.

Meanwhile the entire change of scene brought on the exquisite enjoyment of the change of thought. Ellinor had not been able so completely to forget her past life for many years; it was like a resurrection to her, when she was suddenly short by the shears of fate. Ever since that night she had had to rouse herself on awakening to remembrance of the full comprehension of the great cause she had for much fear and heavy grief. Now, when she wakened in her little room, the girl going to Rome, Dixon, she saw the strange pretty things around her, and her mind went off into pleasant wonder and conjecture, half-remembering all that was before, and pleasant anticipations of the day to come. Listen in Ellinor was her father's artistic temperament; and she had the full enjoyment of a picture and a delight; the merest group in the street, a Roman facchino, with his cloak draped over his shoulder, the girl going to the well or carrying her pitcher back from the fountain, every thing, and every person that presented it, or him self, to her senses, was a fresh enjoyment. Even the ugly beggars were not without their delight. She forgot her despondency, her ill-health disappeared as if by magic; the Miss Forbes, who had taken her under their protection, and a companion out of kindness of heart, found themselves amply rewarded by the sight of her unaffected delight, and by the full enjoyment of every thing, and the half-quaint, half-naive expressions of her pleasure.

On March came round; Lent was late that year. The great nosegays of violets and camellias were for sale at the corner of the Condotti, and the revelers had begun to be preparing much rarer flowers for the belles of the Corso. The enthusiasts had their balconies; the attaches of the Russian embassy threw their lights and lovely presents at every pretty girl, or suspicion of a pretty girl, who passed slowly in her carriage, covered over with her white domino, and holding her wire mask as a protection to her face from the showers of lime confetti, which otherwise would have been enough to blind her! Mrs. Forbes had her own hired balcony as became a wealthy and respectable English woman. The girls had a great basketful of bouquets with which to pelt their friends in the crowd below; a store of morceelli lay piled on the table behind, for it was the last day of Carnival, and as soon as dusk came on the tapers were to be lighted, to be used they left her. Then she got up and stood on her feet, dizzy enough, her arms clasped at the top of her head, her eyes dilated and staring as if looking at some great horror. But after a few minutes she sat down suddenly and began to read. Letters were evidently missing. Some had been sent by an opportunity who had been delayed on the journey, and had not yet arrived in Rome. Others had been dispatched by the post, but the severe weather, the unusual snow, had, in those days, before the railway was made between Lyons and Marseilles, put a stop to many a traveler's plans, and had rendered the transmission of the mail extremely uncertain; the much older correspondence which Miss Monro evidently considered as certain to be known to Ellinor was entirely matter of conjecture, and could only be guessed at from what was told in these letters. One was from Mr. Johnson, one from Mr. Brown, one from Miss Monro; of course the Mr. Johnson mentioned was the first each spoke of the shock of the discovery of Mr. Dunster's body, discovered in the cutting of the new line of railroad from Hamley to the adjoining station; the body so hastily buried long ago, in its clothes, by which it was now recognized—a recognition confirmed by one or two more personal and incontestible things, such as his watch and seal with his initials; of the shock to every one, the Orbaldistones in particular, on the further discovery of a flesh, or horse-lancet, having the teeth with the name Dixon engraved on the handle; how Dixon had gone to Mr. Orbaldistone's business to a horse-fair in Ireland some weeks before this, and had there his leg broken by a kick from an unruly mare, so that he was barely able to move about when the offers of justice went to apprehend him in Truelove.

At this point Ellinor cried out loud and shrill, "Oh Dixon, Dixon! and I was away enjoying myself!"

They heard her cry, and came to the door, but it was locked inside.

"Please go away," said she; "please go. I will be very quiet, only please go."

And they went, but not before she had read over of Miss Monro's letter. She tore open Mr. Johnson's letter, the date was a fortnight earlier than Miss Monro's, and was expressed in a simpler style at not hearing from her in reply to his letter of January 9; but he added that he thought that her trustee had a legal right to the £1000 income from the railway company had offered for the land when their surveyor decided on the alterations of the line. Mr. Orbaldistone, etc., etc., he could not read any more: it was fate pursuing her. A letter to Miss Monro, in which she might know of some private opportunity safer than the post. Mr. Brown's was just such a letter as would occasionally suit her case at no time; a correspondence that arose out of their mutual regard for their dead friend, Mr. Ness. Mr. Brown was sent to Miss Monro to direct. Ellinor was on the point of putting it aside entirely when the name of Corbet caught her eye: "You will be interested to hear that the old pupil of our departed friend who was so anxious to obtain the folio Virgil with the Italian notes appointed a police judge in room of Mr. Justice Jenkin. At least I conclude that Mr. Ralph Corbet, Q.C., is the same as the Virgil fancier."

"Yes," said Ellinor, hitterly, "he judged well—it would never have done." They were the first words of any thing like reproach which she ever had given to her own mind during all these years. She thought for a few moments of the past days; it made a tumult in her brain to think of them. Then she took up and finished Miss Monro's letter. That excellent friend had done all she could to further Ellinor's views and purposes of Miss Monro's were based on love for her own pupil, and a desire to set her mind at ease as far as she could, rather than from any belief that Dixon himself could be innocent. Ellinor put down the letters and went to the door, then opened it and called them to her. She sat trembling—ease with trembling hands; and after that she entered the drawing-room, looking liker to a ghost than to a living woman.

"Can I speak to you for a minute alone?" Her still, unalterable voice made them obey the command. Canon Livingstone arose and followed her into the little dining-room. "Will you please to let me know—will you have heard about my—you know what."

"Miss Monro was my informant—at least at first—but I am glad to learn that she told it. Miss Monro says it could only have been done in a moment of anger if the old servant is really innocent. He was as steady and good a man as she ever knew; and she seems to have a strong feeling against the Mr. Dunster as although your father a great deal of unnecessary trouble; in fact, he hints that his disappearance at the time was supposed to be the result of a very reasonable loss of property to Mr. Wilkins."

"No!" said Ellinor, eagerly, feeling that some justice ought to be done to the dead man; and then she stopped short, fearful of saying any thing that should betray her full knowledge.

"I mean this," she went on; "Mr. Dunster was a very disagreeable man personally—and papa was none of an liked him; but he was quite honest—please remember that."

The Canon bowed, and said a few acquiescing words. He waited for her to speak again.

The letters were brought, the lights were arranged so that she could read them lying on her bed; and they left her. Then she got up and stood on her feet, dizzy enough, her arms clasped at the top of her head, her eyes dilated and staring as if looking at some great horror. But after a few minutes she sat down suddenly and began to read. Letters were evidently missing. The Canon bowed, and said a few acquiescing words. He waited for her to speak again.

"Miss Monro says she is going to see Dixon in."

"Oh, Mr. Livingstone, I can't bear it!"

He let her alone, looking at her pitifully as she twisted and wrung her hands together in the endeavor to regain the quiet manner she had striven to maintain through the interview. She looked up at him with a poor attempt at an apologetic smile.

"It is so terrible to think of that good old man in prison."

"You do not believe him guilty then!" said Canon Livingstone, in some surprise. "I am afraid, from all I heard and read, there is but little doubt that he did kill the man; I trust in some moment of irritation, with no premeditated malice."

Elinor shook her head.

"How can you I get to England?" asked she. "I must start at once."

"Mrs. Forbes sent out while you were lying down. I am afraid there is no boat to Marseilles till Thursday, the day after to-morrow."

"But I must go sooner!" said Elinor, starting up. "I must go; please help me. He may be tried before I can get there!"

"Also I fear that will be the case whatever haste you make. The trial was to come on at the Hellingford Assizes, and that town stands first on the Midland Circuit list. To-day is the 27th of February; the assizes begin on the 6th of March."

"I will start to-morrow morning early for Civita; there may be a boat there they do not know of here. At any rate, I shall be on my way. If he dies, I must die too. He did! I don't know what I am saying, I am so utterly crushed down! It would be such a kindness if you would go away and let me to me come to me. I have Mrs. Forbes is so good she will forgive me. I will say good-by to you all before I go to-morrow morning, but I must think now."

For one moment he stood looking at her as if he longed to comfort her by more words. He thought better of it, however, and silently left the room.

CHAPTER XV.

FOR a long time Elinor sat still, now and then taking up Miss Monro's letter and re-reading the few terrible details. Then she bethought her that possibly the Canon might have brought a copy of the Times containing the examination of Dixon before the magistrates, and she opened the door and called to a passing servant to look in the study. She was quite right in her conjecture: Canon Livingstone had had the paper in his pocket during his interview with her, and had thought within himself that the evidence was so conclusive that the perusal of it would only be adding to her extreme distress, and increasing the conviction of Dixon's guilt, which he believed she must arrive at sooner or later.

He had been reading the report over with Mrs. Forbes and her daughters after his return from Elinor's room, and they were all participating in his opinion upon it when her request for the Times was conveyed. They had reluctantly agreed, saying there did not appear to be a shadow of doubt in the fact of Dixon having killed Mr. Dunster, only hoping there might prove to be some extenuating circumstances, which Elinor had probably known of herself, which she was desirous of producing on the approaching trial.

Meanwhile Elinor had bathed her eyes and forehead in cold water, and had tried to still her poor heart's beating, in order that she might be clear and collected enough to read the report.

Every line of it was condemnatory. One or two witnesses spoke of Dixon's unpopularity, and like of Dunster—a dislike which Elinor knew had been entertained by the old servant out of a species of loyalty to his master's wife, and not personal distaste. The fleam was proved beyond all doubt to be Dixon's; and a man, who had been stable-boy in Mr. Wilding's service, swore that on the day when Mr. Dunster was missed, and when the whole town was wondering what had become of him, a certain color (Mr. Wilding had needed bleeding, and that he had been sent by Dixon to the farrier's for a horse-lancet—an errand which he had remarked to the boy was odd, as he knew that Dixon had a fleam of his own.

Mr. Osbaldistone was examined. He kept interrupting himself perpetually with apologies for praise at the fact of so steady and well-conducted a man as Dixon being guilty of so heinous a crime, and was willing enough to testify to the excellent character Dixon had borne during all the many years he had been in his (Mr. Osbaldistone's) service; but he appeared to be quite convinced by the evidence previously given of the prisoner's guilt in the matter, and strengthened the case against him materially by stating the circumstance of the old man's dogged unwillingness to have the slightest interference or cultivation with that particular piece of ground.

Here Elinor shuddered. Before her, in that Roman churchyard, rose the fatal oblong she knew by heart—a little green moss or lichen, and thinly-growing blades of grass scarcely covering the cruel and undisturbed soil under the old tree. Oh that she had been in England when the surveyor of the railway brought even Ashcombe and Hamley had altered their line; she would have entreated, implored, compelled her trustees to have that soil cut piece of ground for any sum of money whatsoever. She would have bribed the surveyors, done she knew not what—but now it was too late; she would not let her mind wander off to what might have been; she would force herself again to attend to the newspaper columns. There was little more; the prisoner had been asked if he could say any thing to clear himself, and properly cautioned not to say any thing to incriminate himself; but the old man's person was described, and his evident emotion. "The prisoner was observed to clutch at the rail before him in his agitation, and his color changed so much at this part of the evidence that one of the turnkeys offered him a glass of water, which he declined. He is a man of a strongly-built frame, and with rather a morose and sullen cast of countenance."

"My poor, poor Dixon!" said Elinor, laying down the paper for an instant, and she was near crying, only she had resolved to shed no tears till she had finished all, and could judge of the chances. There were but a few lines more: "At one time the prisoner seemed to be desirous of alleging something in his defense, but he changed his mind, if such had been the case, and in reply to Mr. Justice Corbet's inquiries he only said, 'You've made a pretty strong case out again me, gentlemen; and it seems for to satisfy you. So I think I'll not disturb your rest by saying any thing more.' Accordingly Dixon now stands committed for trial for murder at the next Hellingford Assizes, which are appointed on March the sixth before Baron Rushton and Mr. Justice Corbet."

"Mr. Justice Corbet!" The words ran through Elinor as though she had been stabbed with a knife, and by an irrepressible movement she stood up rigid. His young man, her lover in her youth, the old servant who in those days was perpetually asking her, the two who had so often met in familiar if not friendly relations, now to face each other as judge and accused! She could not tell Mrs. Forbes. Corbet had conjectured from the partial revelation she had made to him of the impending shame that hung over her and her father, and in his quick sense have remembered the exact words she had used in that memorable interview; but now, strive as he would, he could not recall the two young men. After all, the Mr. Justice Corbet might not be Ralph. There was one chance in a hundred against the Judge being he.

While she was weighing probabilities in her sick, dizzy mind she heard soft steps outside her locked door, and with a sudden impulse she was the bedtime of happy people with hearts at ease. Some of the footsteps passed lightly on; but there was a gentle tap at her own door. She pressed her two hot hands hard against her temples for an instant before she went to open the door. There was nothing there but a neat some evening dress, holding a lighted lamp in her hand.

"May I come in, my dear?" she asked. Elinor's stiff dry lips refused to utter the words of assent which indeed did not come readily from her heart.

"I am so grieved at this sad news which the Canon brings, Miss Elinor, so grieved and so shock it must be to you. We have just been saying it must be as bad for you as it would be as if our old Dixon had been proved to have been a hidden murderer all these years that he has lived with us. I really could have as soon suspected Death himself, the most unapproachable old man who used to come and see you at East Chester."

Elinor felt that she must say something. "It is a terrible shock—poor old man! and no friend near him, even Mr. Osbaldistone giving evidence against him. Oh, dear, dear! why did I ever come to Rome?"

"Now, my dear, you must not let yourself take an exaggerated view of the matter. Sad and shocking as it is to have been so deceived, it is what happens to many of us, though not to so terrible a degree; and why are you coming to Rome having any thing to do with it—"

Mrs. Forbes almost smiled at the idea, as reason was not to be looked for as of self-reproach from Elinor's sensitive mind, but Elinor interrupted her abruptly:

"Mrs. Forbes! did you tell Canon Livingstone tell you that I must leave you to-morrow? I must go to-morrow as fast as possible to do what I can for Dixon."

"Yes, he told us you were thinking of it, and it was partly for that you were going to call upon you to-night. I think, my love, you are mistaken in feeling as if were called upon to do more than we are. Canon Livingstone and Monro has already done in your name—engaged the best legal advice, and spared no expense to give the suspected man every chance. What could you do more even if you were on the spot? And it is very possible that the trial may have come on before you get there, in which case, you do? He would either have been acquitted or condemned; if the former, he would find public opinion all in his favor; if the always is for the unjustly accused. And if he turns out to be guilty, my dear Elinor, it will be far better for you to be away from the terrible shock distance can give to such a dreadful termination to the life of a poor man whom you have respected so long."

But Elinor spoke again, with a kind of irritated determination very foreign to her usual soft docility.

"Please just let me judge for myself this once. I am not ungrateful. I know I am not expected to vex one who has been so kind to me as you have been, dear Mrs. Forbes; but I must go—and every word you say to dissuade me only makes me more convinced. I am going to Civita to-morrow. I shall be that much on the way. I can not rest here."

Mrs. Forbes looked at her in grave silence. Elinor could not bear the consciousness of that fixed gaze. Yet in fixity only arose from Mrs. Forbes's perplexity as to how best to assist Elinor, whether to restrain her by further advice—of which the first dose had proved so useless—or to speed her departure. Elinor broke in on her meditations.

"You have always been so kind and good to me; go on being so—please do! Leave me alone now, dear, dear Mrs. Forbes, and after talking about it, and help me to go to-morrow, and you do not know how I will pray to God to bless you!"

Such an appeal was irresistible. Mrs. Forbes kissed her very tenderly, and went to rejoin her daughters, who were clustered together in their mother's bedroom awaiting her coming.

"Well, mamma, how is she? What does she say?"

She is in a very excited state, poor thing! and has got so strong an impression that it is her duty to go back to England and do all she can for this wretched old man that I am afraid we must not oppose her. I am afraid she really must go on Thursday."

"Why, what can she do, mamma?" "Poor dear old Nelly!" "And miss the return by Perugia she was thinking so much about!"

Such were some of the exclamations of the Miss Forbeses. They had a vague thought of the old servant in prison; but it was on his position, and probable guilt or innocence, that Mrs. Forbes kept pondering. She was more and more sure that Elinor was in possession of some secret information that she believed, whether truly or falsely, would tend to the acquittal of the trial; and so, although she would have been infinitely troubled by Elinor's fuller confidence, she forbore to recur to the subject on the following morning, but treated Elinor's resolve to go home as a decided thing, and all the more as she put no questioning. By this kind o' behavior she not only soothed Elinor, but won the right of making such arrangements for her journey as would render her journey home more easy of management.

Mrs. Forbes secured the services of a travelling-maid, and went to the banker's; saw after places in the diligence to Civita; Elinor remaining in her room all the time, apparently engaged in packing up. This, at least, was her employment whenever Effie, or Margaret, or Grace Forbes came to see her to express sorrow or their regret. But as soon as they left her alone she sat down on her bed, unable to keep up the strain, overpowered by the terrible secret, the consequences of which were now culminating to a crisis.

The diligence left at three. Mrs. Forbes, the girls, the traveling-maid, and Mrs. Forbes's servant all accompanied Elinor to the office from which it was to start.

There they found Canon Livingstone, whom Elinor had not seen since the night before. She was not surprised to be being more so with her good-by; indeed few things would have surprised her just then, besides, the Canon's thorough reliance on his quiet friendliness. But she did remonstrate when she found him all prepared to accompany her to Civita. She had some previous insight into his plans, and kept silence during the discussion.

The last words Elinor had of her friends as the lumbering diligence rolled heavily from side to side was when she looked back at the corner of the piazza, and saw them all standing in a group and at the place where she had left them. She pulled down the veil over her face, that neither of her companions might see how her eyes were filling with tears.

CHAPTER XVI.

THE Neapolitan steamers to Marseilles call at Civita Vecchia to land any passengers; but the Neapolitan sailors are a careful race of folk, and do not venture out in the teeth of the mistrals of foul weather. So Elinor and the Canon were detained until the evening of Thursday at the steamer's looking out on the sea. The rain prevented her going out; she sat in the great salle, where alone there was the possibility of a fire, and heard the gale increasing, decorated with gaudy arabesques, the bare dirty floor below, the numberless ill-fitting doors and windows rattling and rumbling in every blast—she cowered over the hearth, stifling her weary impatience as best she might; but feeling as though the hours never would be set off, without further loss of time, and walk to England. The mind was more inclined to grumble about than the suspense. Elinor knew the Livingstone strangely passive under the delay. Every one else in the hotel was talking continually in either English, French, or Italian, and bewailing all existing arrangements; every one but the Canon, and the pale and gentle lady who kept her place by the hearth, on which the smoking logs sputtered and smoked instead of burning.

Canon Livingstone was up to his chin, was in and out all the day, bringing all the intelligence as to the probabilities of the steamship's arrival from the mysterious knowledge of Italian, he could pick up from the out-door population, who all seemed to be as much excited by the non-appearance of the Santa Lucia as if it were not the commonest occurrence in the world.

The food, too, in the bare and desolate hotel appeared to be falling short; some bread, an omelet, and a bottle of sour country wine, was all that could be furnished to the Canon's order for dinner. He and Elinor spoke but little together during the meal. As the table was being cleared the latter walked to the window, and, returning after the waiter's departure, he said:

"I am afraid if the steamer does not arrive to-night we shall have but rough weather for our voyage."

"We!" said Elinor, looking at him with surprise. "You are not going; I thought you were only coming with me to Civita?"

"Oh yes!" said he, a little annoyed to have betrayed his intention so soon; "but Mrs. Forbes and I agreed just as to the last, that although Monro seemed to be very respectable man, that it would be all the better for you both to have a man with you in traveling through France; not that I am any great French scholar though." He tried to treat it lightly, but is evidently discomposed Elinor exceedingly.

"You must not think of it—I beg you will not; you have only just come to Rome. Oh, I am so sorry; I had no idea Mrs. Forbes thought I was so helpless. Pray, if you wish to make me—" happy, she was going to have said, but the word stuck in her throat—"easy, go back again to Rome as soon as I am gone."

He longed to speak out more fully what was in his mind and bent to say; but by a great effort he restrained himself, and only spoke the commonplaces of a wise friendship. He sat down at the table.

"Now, my dear Miss Wilkins," he said, "I must beg of you to be reasonable, and to consider the anxieties of your friends now than your own dislike to giving trouble. You are an inexperienced traveler; and there are many changes in your mode of traveling to be encountered before you reach England. Your maid was the best that could be procured under the circumstances, but still we do not know so much of her capabilities as of her character. It is of great consequence to you to reach England with as little delay as possible, and this for the sake of Dixon more than for yourself. All sorts of accidents and contretemps may arise, occasioning you much distress. Now, Mrs. Forbes knows, I have been several times in France—once on a reading party in Auvergne for three months; and she felt that her anxiety on your account, which is very great on account of your not very recovered health, would be materially lessened if I traveled with you."

"But you have only just arrived in Rome."

"True; I have just begun what new journey is to a bachelor, and shall be finding my way again before long. At present my full intention is to open Mrs. Forbes's mail, the moment it is in my power, and I hope you will not consider me in any other light than that of a courier engaged by her to escort you all the way to Rome. And now I shall go out again and see what chance there is of this cowardly steamer."

It would have required more energy than Elinor professed at this time to combat a resolution which both words and manner expressed as determined. She would assuredly have traveled alone with her maid; she did not feel the need of the services he offered; but she was utterly indisposed to argue the point. Her interest was centred in the thought of Dixon and his approaching trial, and the perplexity as to the mode in which she was to get to him.

They embarked late that evening in the tarty Santa Lucia, and Elinor immediately went to her berth. She was not sea-sick; that might possibly have lessened her mental suffering; which all long journeys would have. Higo perched in an upper berth, she did not like disturbing the other occupants of the cabin till daylight appeared, and then she dressed and dressed, and went on deck. The vessel was just passing the rocky coast of Elba, and the sky was flushed with rosy light, that made the mountains on the island of the most exquisite purple. The sea still heaved with yesterday's storm, but the motion only added to the sparkle of her purple and white foam that dimpled and curled on the blue waters. The air was delicious after the closeness of the cabin, and Elinor felt wondered that more people were not on deck to enjoy it. One or two straggliers came up, time after time, and began pacing the deck. Dr. Livingstone came up before very long; but he seemed to have made a rule of not obtruding himself on their company more than was one of some use. After a few words of commonplace morning greeting he likewise began to walk backward and forward. Elinor sat quietly watching the lovely island receding fast from her view—a beautiful vision never to be seen again by her mortal eyes.

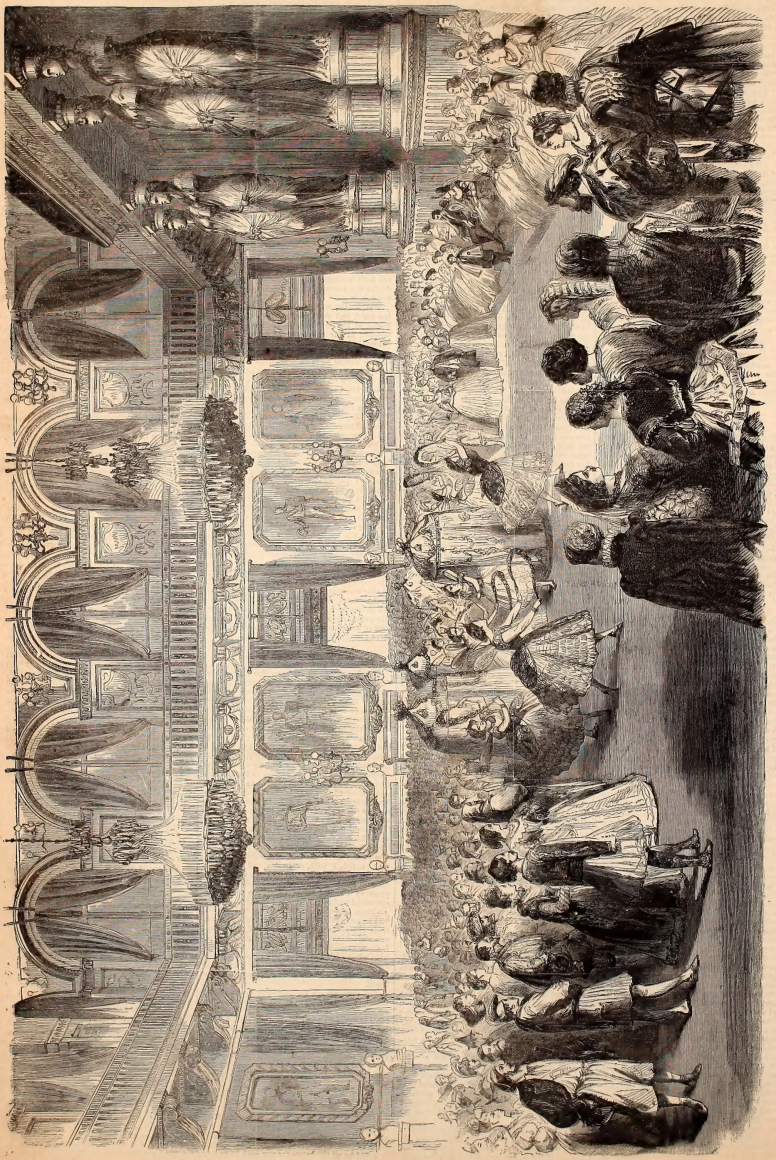
WATCH—NIGHT.

DIE I frighten you, mother?—so white and cold,
And so silently here at your bed?
I could not sleep on the narrow night
For the battle of which we read.

THEY say he was foremost in every charge,
Till the hurlers held their breath,
Or paused in the midst with such a cheer
For the man who was quite with death!

THEY say he was quiet and just the same—
So quiet when asking for pay!
But I know—I know how he went away,
Dashed ever to the front.

DID the fiercest pain for a tender soul
Is doubt and its jealous pride?
Though we do not die when we suffer so,
Till the faithless are tried.



I TOLD him he was not worthless land,
Despite my sense of wife;
But I wear him yet in my heart of hearts,
And I love him with all my life.

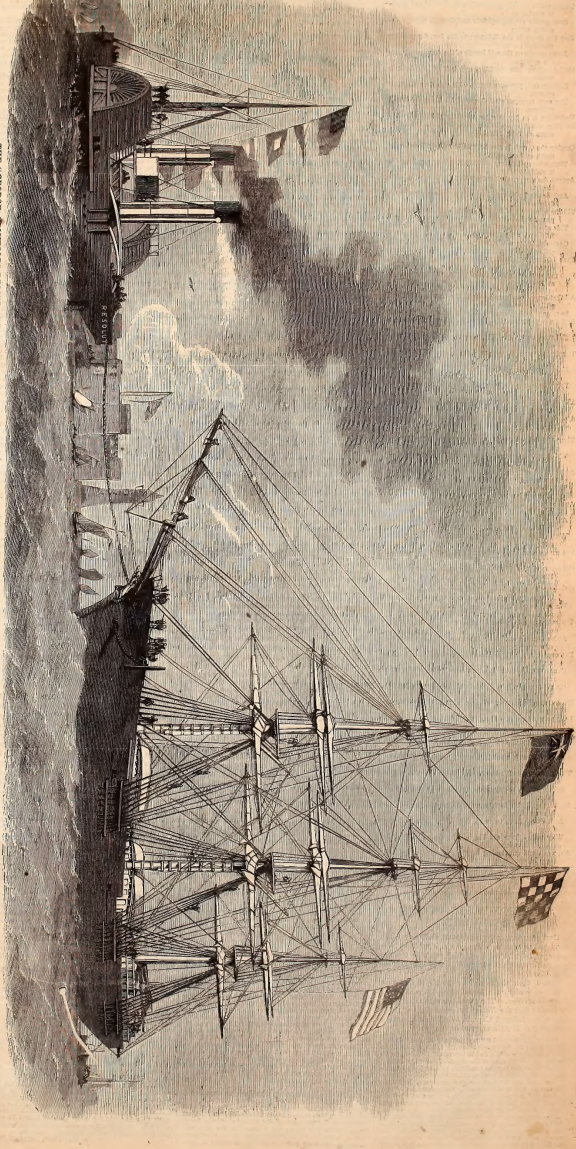
I MUST go to bed, I shall never rest
Till I falter before his feet;
And there I shall die if he raise he not,
And come me with kisses sweet.

I SHALL die! I shall die if I may not look
Once more in my hero's eyes,
And see the fire of the olden love
In their passionate deeps arise!

I HAVE wronged his truth, I have wronged his love,
And all for a whispered lie!
I have sent him to wander in search of death—
Ah, mother!—he should die!

I WILL suffer all—I deserve it all!
But, mother, I'm mad to go
And beg him to take me back again,
For I love him—I love him so!

THE GRAND BALL AT THE TUILERIES—THE BEES QUADRILLE.—[See next Page.]



THE LATE BALL AT THE TUILERIES.

We publish on page 204 a fine illustration of the "BEES QUADRILLE" at the recent Grand Ball given by the Emperor Napoleon at the Tuileries. It was the sensation of the day in Paris, and has been much talked of here. The Times Paris correspondent wrote:

"The pleasures of the Carnival were never more brilliant than the present year. The amount of money spent in dress is frightful; and while the poor are getting rich, the rich are getting poor. One millinery establishment, that of Worth & Bobergh, of which Monsieur Worth is the artist-designer of the toilets of his fair customers, made bills on the single costume ball of the Empress on Monday last to the extent of $200,000! And yet there were not quite four hundred ladies at the ball, and Worth & Bobergh, although they are the fashionable house the present season, did not furnish all the costumes at the ball. At this ball, which was private, and to which invitations were made directly by the Empress, the following Americans were invited, which was a very large list in view of the limited number of persons at the ball: Mrs. Dayton, in robe of moire antique and powdered hair; Miss Dayton, as Red Riding Hood; Mrs. Ridgway, of Philadelphia, in Marchioness; Mme. Pillé, of New Orleans, powdered hair; Miss Minnie King, of Georgia, Undine? Mrs. Pennimen, of New York; Miss Pennimen, Ophelia; Mrs. Moulton (Miss Greenough, of Cambridge, Mass.), in Salamander; the Viscountess de Gabriac (Miss Phalen, of New York), Hungarian costume; Mrs. Eustis (Miss Corcoran, of Washington); Miss Eustis, of Louisiana; Mrs. Butterfield, of New York; Mrs. Dr. Thomas W. Evans, of Paris; Miss Watling, of Philadelphia; the Countess de Moltke (Miss Hinton, of New York), in Marchioness, covered with diamonds; and the Countess de Ganay (Miss Ridgway, of Philadelphia). The American ladies, as those of your readers will see who are acquainted with them, were chosen by her Majesty, not only on account of their high position in French society, but also for their general personal beauty and well-known taste in dress. It was an occasion for the display of all the wealth in diamonds and other precious stones of which each was possessed; for, while it is bad taste to make an inordinate display of diamonds on ordinary occasions, a costume ball admits any extravagance in this line the wearer chooses to make. The Empress represented on this occasion the wife of a Doge of Venice of the sixteenth century, and wore all the crown jewels. She was literally embossed in diamonds. The page was black velvet, over a robe of scarlet satin, bearing cataelles of diamonds. The Imperial Prince, dressed in black velvet knee-breeches and Venetian mantle, was present, and danced twice—once with the Princess Anna Murat, and once with Mlle. de Chatenubourg. His dance with his cousin the Princess Anna created no little amusement, for while the Prince is only seven years old—and, of course, very short for a ball-room performance—his partner was princely in dimensions as well as in title. The Princess Anna wore a Neapolitan costume. The Princess Mathilde Bonaparte was in the costume of Anne of Queves, of Holbein, and wore the whole of her famous collection of emeralds. The Princess Clotilde Bonaparte, with the hair frosted, had also copied a picture from the Louvre, and her robe of brocat glistened like a rising sun. The Princess Gabrielle (Augustine Bonaparte) was in syrian costume. The Princess de Metternich in Night, illuminated with diamonds. The Countess de Perugny in burning fire. The Countess Walewska in Amazon Louis XIV., powdered hair, corn-colored robe, gold buttons. The belle Italian Countess Castiglione, dressed in a costume remarkable for its want of costume, was the hit of the evening. She was dressed as "Salammbo," copied from the new Carthaginian romance of Gustave Flaubert, author of Madame Bovary. Naked arms and shoulders, short dress, and feet naked in sandals, dress of black velvet, falling straight, with a long train, which latter was borne by the young Count de Choiseul: who, in turn, had his face blackened to represent an Egyptian page, and who, besides carrying the train of the famous daughter of Hamilcar, held over her head an umbrella of the genuine Robinson Crusoe dimensions. The superb Castiglionière were on her head a diadem of gold; her robe, which was without waist, was held by a rich clasp of diamonds, and was copied exactly after the floating tunics worn by the women of the upper classes in the period of Carthaginian history in which Salammbo lived. She promenaded, not on the arm of the faithful Mathe of the romance, but on that of the Count Walewska, who delivered her over to the Emperor, and who, in turn, left her to enjoy a long and close conversation with the young Chevalier Nigra, Italian Embassador at Paris. The "surprise" of the evening was the "Quadrille des Abeilles." At twelve o'clock several large bee-hives were carried in by villagers in the costume of Watteau's pictures, and from them issued a charming and graceful swarm of bees, among whom were the Princesses Troubetzkoi and Dolgorouki, Mlles. Beaucard, Coppens, Magnan, de Taschet, de Vatry, Kisdakoff, Errazu, Pereira, dressed in golden corsage and shining wings, and who at once proceeded to dance the quadrille, which had been arranged and taught them for the occasion by Mazante, of the Grand Opera.

THE "GEORGE GRISWOLD" AT LIVERPOOL

We illustrate on this page the arrival of the relief ship "GEORGE GRISWOLD" at Liverpool, with the cargo contributed by New York merchants and other citizens of the United States for the relief of the suffering mechanics of England. She arrived on the 9th of February. Her cargo consisted of 200 boxes of bacon, 50 barrels of pork, 500 bushels of corn, 500 barrels and boxes of bread, a quantity of rice, and 13,236 barrels of flour. The contributions on board from the New York Produce Exchange were 1500 barrels of flour, 500 bushels of corn, and 50 barrels of pork. She left New York on the 13th of January, and after an average run across the Atlantic was on the 9th February telegraphed off Port Lynas, sailing for Liverpool with a fair wind. As the telegraph was published and became generally known the New Steam Tug Company dispatched their powerful boat Rainbow gratuitously to assist the ship into port. The Rainbow fell in with the ship about three o'clock, near the bar, and immediately took her in tow; but they did not reach the anchorage in the river until nearly three hours after high tide. The George Griswold had the American and English flags flying, and the steam-tug was also gayly decorated for the occasion. On reaching the Rock Fort she was welcomed with the customary salute by lowering a flag, which was duly acknowledged, and shortly after entering the river a salute of eighteen guns was fired from the North Battery. She reached the anchorage off Seacombe about half past five P.M. Her coming was cordially greeted by a great concourse of people.

THE SNOW-STORM AT BELLE PLAIN.

UNDER arches that the pines make (full of weird and ghostly shadows);
Over gently sloping uplands and through strange deserted vales;
Past the forest in the distance; to the low, far-reaching meadows;
Borne swiftly on the cold breath of the damp northeastern gales;
Half laughing into sunshine, and half sobbing back to rain—
Seeking still, yet ever flying, with a dull and restless tremor,
The next moment all defiance with a fierce sun-tinted glamour,
Undecided if in joy to come or wild resistless pain,
Eddying round us—whirling from us—came the snow-storm at Belle Plain.

Coming thus, and in the balance trembling for one instant, and one only,
Then with sudden fury bursting o'er the camp beneath, it whirled
Around the meagre shelter-tents that decked the hill-side lonely,
And the wind with rage incessant each successive snow-flake hurled,
Till the trees grew white like spectres, and old earth was pure again.
This at dusk was, and night's shadows falling dim on field and river
Gave the storm a wilder aspect. To their tents, with chill and shiver,
Each jostling each in eager haste, and filled with fright, amain
Fled the men, with hasty footsteps, from the snow-storm at Belle Plain.

All that long, slow dragging night, the snow so white and pitiless, descended
In strangely eddying circles, flying far and flying near;
And through the sombre day that followed the sullen storm extended
Till the grayish daylight faded; then down fell, more cold and drear,
The dark shades of the second night, and till that wild night's wane
More thickly round the silent camp the snow fell, ever drifting
From before the damp northeast wind, blowing coldly, never shifting,
Till camp and woods were mantled in a robe without a stain,
And every thing lay buried in the snow-storm at Belle Plain.

Thus the wild, fierce storm continued, in its fury unabated,
Till the nights as twain were counted, though the days told only one;
And through the long hours watched we, and so patiently we waited,
With bowed faces toward the east sky, waiting, watching for the sun.
And we sighed to think the sunny South was but a phantom vain,
And we prayed for the old Northland, with its regal icy splendor—
With its hearts so warm and true, so loving and so tender—
Till we conjured up our homes again (oh! wild, bewildered brain!
Crazed men of the Potomac, in the snow-storm at Belle Plain).

Our wild hasheesh-dream dispelling, came that second brilliant morning.
We had watched so for its advent—we had prayed so for its dawn,
That we felt the Bow of Promise the glad eastern sky adorning;
And when the cold hills flushed with light, the cruel storm was gone.
But over camp, and over woods—on field, on hill-side, and in lane—
Over uplands, over meadows—even under the pine arches—
On every road where patient mule and weary teamster marches—
On every thing, or far or near, that might the pearly gems retain,
Lay, pure and white, the flakes that fell in the snow-storm at Belle Plain.

Thus came it; thus it ended. We who cowered so 'neath its bluster
Look back with a soldier's carelessness, and idly wonder why;
Then, contented with the present, seek the sun, whose undimmed lustre
Shines bright to-day upon us from the overarching sky.
We wait until the roads mend. You watch the Union's throes of pain,
And, sitting there in quiet, most impatiently you wonder
Why to-day from old Virginia booms no loud artillery's thunder.
Ah, weak and questioning heart! you would never ask again,
Could you see us while embargoed by a snow-storm at Belle Plain.

OUR IRON-CLADS IN THE OGEECHEE.

OUR attentive correspondent at Port Royal has furnished us with the sketches which we reproduce on pages 193 and 196, and which relate to the recent performances of our iron-clad fleet in the Ogeechee River.

One of them shows us how the pirate Nashville was destroyed by the iron-clad Monitor Montauk, Captain Worden. The Herald correspondent, after stating that the Nashville showed signs of moving, which induced Captain Worden to steam up toward Fort M'Allister, goes on to say:

At five minutes past seven o'clock we let go our anchor about twelve hundred yards below the fort, and veered out fifteen fathoms of cable, and in two minutes thereafter we let slip an 11-inch shell at the object of our aims and desires. There she lay hard and fast, at about twelve hundred yards distant, a good mark, as the sequel will show.

The instant we fired our first shot the battery fired three guns at us, and in thirty seconds thereafter another one. But we did not pay any attention to them, and left the battery in the hands of the three gallant gun-boats, who threw their shells into it in splendid style.

At eleven minutes past seven fired our 11-inch gun, the shell falling a little over the Nashville. In just five minutes afterward the enemy hit our pilot-house, fair and square, with an 8-inch shot, which broke in two pieces, one falling on the turret top and the other on deck, doing no damage and producing no unpleasant sensation whatever.

At twenty-two minutes past seven the 15-inch gun was fired with a 10-second shell, which landed quite close to the Nashville. The fort banged away at us, but they did not exhibit such careful gunnery as on previous firings. We paid no kind of notice to the scamps behind the piles of sand, as we were bent on the blowing up of the would-be pirate.

By-the-way, when we went up first we noticed quite a number of persons on her deck; but after two or three firings they were not to be seen. They had a full head of steam on her boilers, and she was blowing off furiously from her escape-pipe.

At twenty-seven and a half minutes past seven o'clock we fired our 15-inch gun again, with a 10-second shell, which landed plump into the pirate, between her foremast and paddle-box. It exploded beautifully, and there was no doubt in our minds that we should soon see her in flames. This was only our fifth shot, and if the result does not show good gunnery, pray tell me what is to be considered a standard? Acting-Master Pierre Giraud worked both the guns, and his good marksmanship was now established beyond a doubt. From the turret only the masts and smoke-stacks were visible, giving, of course, but a very small mark to fire at.

After firing our eighth round we were obliged to cease firing, so as to see what the fire was doing on board of the Nashville.

To our gratification we were enabled to see a very dense volume of black smoke arising from the forward part of the vessel, and in a couple of minutes thereafter the flames were distinctly visible, forcing their way up, and gradually creeping aft, until they reached nearly to the base of the smoke-stack. The fog was slowly creeping down upon us, threatening to shut out the glorious sight; but it would light up at intervals, showing us in a few minutes a vast sheet of flames, which shot upward far into the smoky canopy above them. It was not long before the smoke-stack guys were burned away, and the huge stack tottered and then fell over on to the port paddle-box, stirring up the glowing embers, which rose and mingled with the darkness above the doomed vessel.

Nothing but night, to give a darkened back-ground to the livid flames, could have added any thing to the grandeur of the scene before us. Our weary watching was now reaping its reward, and our hearts beat with joy and congratulations. Slowly but surely the fire did its work: the rigging caught fire in several places, and torches seemed set, as it were, over a vast funereal pile. We fired occasionally at her until it became evident that we could not add any thing more to her speedy dissolution. At intervals the flames would rush up in a body aft and die out forward, as if the fire king was rushing fore and aft in joy at the freaks in his realms. All this time the fort was firing at us, stopping only when the fog would entirely hide us from view.

At six minutes past eight o'clock we ceased firing, having only fired fourteen times. We waited, watching for about thirty minutes the burning of the steamer, and then up anchor and stood down the river. At this time the Nashville was entirely enveloped in flames, the paddle-boxes were fast crumbling away, and streaks of fire were rapidly making huge crevices in her once graceful hull.

At thirty-five minutes past nine o'clock an explosion took place amidships, throwing up a column of white smoke, which, when its inertia was lost, spread itself out like a huge umbrella. It looked like steam, and quite a number who witnessed it pronounced it to be steam, which escaped from the bursting of her boilers. It probably was the explosion of the 100-pounder rifle gun, from the fact that the outline of the hull was not seriously affected by the explosion.

In ten minutes afterward a terrific explosion took place aft. The fire had reached the magazine, and a spark had, in a flash, set loose the latent power of untold tons. Her hull was not able to withstand a shock like that, and a vast white volume quickly ascended aloft, and spread out until it met a sufficient amount of atmospheric resistance, when it mingled with the smoke from the burning hull. The mainmast was gone, the quarter torn down to the water's edge, and the hull riven into countless fragments. Some little time afterward the foremast fell, and the destruction was complete. Far away over the lowlands the smoke spread itself, as if veiling from their view those who might be watching the annihilation of a vessel once lovely in form, graceful in her motion, and noted for her speed—a vessel built for peaceful uses, but by a band of desperadoes turned into a pirate (a bloodless one). The tide of life was at an ebb, and in a short time she would be but a mass of tangled machinery and charred relics.

It was useless, of course, to remain any longer in range of the enemy's guns, and Captain Worden ordered the gun-boats to withdraw from the action and cease firing.

On the way down the river the Montauk narrowly escaped an accident, depicted in our second illustration on page 198. The Herald correspondent thus alludes to it:

While withdrawing from action we passed directly over three torpedoes, one of which exploded directly underneath our boilers, raising the vessel up bodily and slewing her around. The sensation was of course a very peculiar one, and for a time we could not realize that we had been hit by an infernal machine. It started a little leak, but nothing to speak of, as it was repaired in a few minutes.

Our picture on page 196 shows us THE BOMBARDMENT OF FORT M'ALLISTER, which was more intended to test the fighting qualities of the iron-clad gun-boats than to take the fort. The same correspondent of the Herald who witnessed the action from the Montauk thus recounts the affair:

At thirty-five minutes after eight the iron-clads were up at about the following distances from the work: Passaic, 1200 yards; Patapsco, 1600; Nahant, 1900. Here they anchored.

In five minutes afterward the enemy opened with two guns, followed by another in rapid succession, hitting close to the Passaic, when she let slide an 11-inch shell, which fell short of the fort. At fifty-five minutes after eight the Para opened with her 13-inch mortar. The engagement, or rather target practice, now began.

At nine minutes after nine we anchored, having cleared the vessel for action, ready to run up if we were needed.

We had on board Captain Upshur and his clerk and quite a number of the officers of the Sebago, who came on board to witness the scene; and as we lay ahead of all the vessels excepting the iron-clads, our turret top offered excellent facilities for observing the firing.

Our boys were scattered around the decks as passive spectators of an action in which they were very desirous of participating; but as we had done some service before, it was but fair that we should now do some looking on.

The iron-clads fired slowly, gradually getting the range, while the bummers promised to throw in some shells in a short time.

The rebels were busy, and at intervals we could see that they hit the Passaic pretty fairly; of course we could not tell what damage was done, but from our experience we felt confident that they could not harm her much. As the moments flew the practice from the iron-clads became more accurate, the Passaic bearing off the palm for some time, when the Nahant came up to the mark, delivering her shell finely and making some elegant shots. At twenty minutes before eleven o'clock two of her shells landed in the traverses, throwing up the sand to a tremendous height and filling the air with clouds of earth. The crews of the vessels around us gave hearty expressions of their approbation by subdued cheering and loud clapping of their hands.

The rapid fire of the iron-clads caused the rebels to slacken their fire from their three guns and an 11-inch mortar, which they had been working with great spirit.

The wind had now breezed up from the northwest and gradually increased into almost a gale; but it had the good effect to drive away the smoke quickly from their vision.

The Patapsco pitched in her shells, doing some execution in the rear of the work, just skipping the parapet in their flight. Although we kept a minute record of each gun fired on both sides, it would be too voluminous to place within the limited space of our columns. It was bang, bang, smoke, fire, sand; and I guess but few ever saw such a beautiful sight. Secesh stood up to their guns manfully, and their gunnery was by no means meagre.

At times the enemy would not reply for several moments, and when he opened afresh the guns would belch out from a different place. Our shells were doing tremendous execution in the sand, but for some time we thought without damaging any guns. Finally a 15-inch shell from the Nahant exploded under one of the rebel guns, throwing it up into the air quite a distance.

The Nahant's people went to dinner as quietly as if not under the fire of the enemy; and after dinner they came out on deck to take a good look at their target. Secesh tried hard to hit her with their mortar, but did not succeed. The accurate firing of the Nahant elicited the heartiest commendations from the spectators, who were piled upon our turret and on all elevated points of the other vessels.

The outlines of the fort, which early in the morning had presented such regularity, now began to assume an entirely different aspect. Huge holes were clearly discernible, and it did not look like the work we saw in the bright glow of the morning's sun.

At thirty-two minutes past three P.M. the Nahant withdrew from the action, having accomplished all she desired to do in the way of exercising her guns' crews and lubricating her working gear. At fifty-five minutes past three P.M. the Patapsco followed, and the Passaic some little time afterward. They all dropped down the river, the rebels firing very rapidly at them as they quietly went away from the fort.

They hit the Passaic several times, landing a 10-inch shot on the top of her turret, whole and uninjured. They also hit her fair and square on her deck with an 11-inch mortar shell, which, strange to say, did not do any material damage, except, of course, fracturing the armor. It struck between the beams. I begin to think you can not injure our iron-clads in any manner possible. She was hit thirty-three times, and I have the same old story to write—"Nobody hurt, and no damage done." I could not have been made to believe that these vessels could withstand shot, shell, and torpedoes, used in every conceivable manner, until I saw with my own eyes the results. It is wonderful and strange.

We can not forbear quoting this correspondent with regard to the sensations experienced by persons in an iron-clad when she is hit. He says:

About half past eight o'clock our pilot-house was hit a tremendous blow by a shot. Your correspondent was at the instant of impact on one knee writing a paragraph in his note-book. The shock was somewhat severe, and afterward he found that the shot struck close to his head.

It unbalanced me, and I tumbled over against the side of the narrow pilot-house, when, to my surprise, I was struck by a piece of iron bolt with the nut attached (weighing about one pound), first on the shoulder and then on the knee. Some of the other bolts were knocked out. The iron was, no doubt, of an inferior quality, and had they been of the same character as those in the turret, such an event would not have taken place. In view of such an accident, and suffering from the shock, I left the pilot-house.

* * * * * * *

The sensation below decks was far different than that which I had experienced in the pilot-house on Tuesday last for four hours and a half and the two hours of to-day.

The sound of our own guns was more acute and unpleasant, and well it might be, when it is taken into consideration that the whole volume of sound from the discharge of each gun passed directly over and within a few inches of our heads, and the concussion passing into the system through the brain by the top of the head. I can not say that it was painful, but it was far from pleasant, and, in addition to this, you were scarcely ever able to hear the word of command when the guns were fired. To hear the officer say, "Are you ready?"—"Fire!" takes off much of the unpleasantness of the shock; but below you do not have that warning.

* * * * * * *

It was just six minutes past eleven o'clock. I was standing in the ward-room, and in conversation with Dr. Brayton, when a most terrific blow was struck upon our deck plating directly over my head. I was driven with much force into a chair, and my whole muscular system seemed for about two minutes perfectly paralyzed. I was faint, and could scarcely obtain my breath. I never experienced such an unpleasant sensation in the whole course of my life. It was a heavy shock to my whole system. In fact it exceeded my experience in the pilot-house, and I thought I done wrong in quitting it. And while absorbed in such thoughts slam! came another such a shot, but, fortunately for me at least, about six feet away from where the first one struck. Weak as I was this again gave me a shock, and I was forced to say, "That was the unkindest cut of all." I soon recovered from the intense pain I suffered, and resumed my notes, but was continually in apprehension of having the dose repeated. Fortunately, however, it was not.

It is a perfect and complete dressing for the Hair. Read the following testimonial:

U. S. MARSHAL'S OFFICE,
New York, Nov. 6, 1861.

WM. GRAY, Esq.,
Dear Sir: Two months ago my head was almost entirely BALD, and the little hair I had was all GREY, and falling out very fast, until I feared I should lose all. I commenced using your Hair Restorative, and it immediately stopped the hair falling off, and soon restored the color, and after using two bottles my head is completely covered with a healthy growth of hair, and of the same color it was in early manhood. I take great pleasure in recommending your excellent Hair Restorative, and you may also refer any doubting person to me.

ROBERT MURRAY, U. S. Marshal,
Southern District, New York.

Other testimonials may be seen at the Restorative Depot, 801 Broadway, New York.

Manufactured and sold by the proprietor (WM. GRAY), at the Restorative Depot, 801 Broadway, New York, and for sale by all druggists.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS. NEW STYLE.
BRANDRETH PILLS PURGATIVE PROPERTIES.

A lady, travelling on the Continent of Europe, called upon Pamun Cyrus, of Barcelona, Spain, a dealer in Drugs and Medicines, and inquired for BRANDRETH'S PILLS. He did not sell the medicine for sale. The lady requested him to send to New York for a supply for her, and she left with him money for the same. When the ship arrived, the lady left with Mr. Cyrus four dozen, with a request he would sell them for her. He did so, and from that small beginning, and without any effort whatever from Principal Office, his sale has become so extensive in Barcelona as to absorb nearly three hundred gross per annum, or 44,000 boxes of BRANDRETH'S PILLS. In fact, so great was the efficacy of Daymon Cyrus' Brandreth's Pills propagate themselves." That is the way, those who use them become well satisfied with their high medicinal and health-restoring qualities, and as such recommend them to their friends.

It is admitted they are the most innocent, most efficacious and certain, and withal the most RELIABLE PURGATIVE KNOWN. The majority of medicines of this class are poor imitations of this, the Original Universal Medicine.

Public favor is constantly decided by merit; we therefore hope that this excellent life-saving medicine may be everywhere introduced, and its own merits will do the rest. It is adapted to all ages, all sexes, all climates, and being out by one dick invariably ameliorates the disease, and perseverance cures in a majority of cases.

MAGIC TIME OBSERVERS

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM!

BEING A REVOLVING CASE, ON OPEN BACK, AS GENTLEMAN'S WATCH COMBINED, WITH PATENT SELF-WINDING IMPROVEMENT.

The New York Illustrated News, the leading pictorial paper of the United States, in its issue of Jan. 10th, 1863, on page 247, with engravings, gives a full description of this most pleasing novelty, of which the HOWARD BROS., of New York, are the sole importers. It is called the MAGIC TIME OBSERVER, and is a hunting and open-face watch combined. One of the most reliable, correct, and decidedly the best and cheapest time-piece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has a beautiful and durable case, with its machinery, its own winding attachment, rendering it a very correct timekeeper. The cases of this watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 10 carat gold. It has the improved lever safety lever movement, and is warranted an accurate time-piece.

Price, superbly engraved, per case of hald cases, $700 00. Sample Watches, in neat morocco boxes, for those proposing to buy at wholesale, $80. If sent by mail, the postage is 36 cents. Address

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

FEW ARE EXEMPT.—We don't refer to the Draft. Millions escape the conscription. But few, very few, are exempt from Dyspepsia. The grand army of Dyspeptics are a multitude that no man can number. Thousands of new recruits are added to it daily. Yet there is no difficulty in securing exemption. HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS, taken as a preventive, renders the weakest stomach DYSPEPTIC-PROOF. Nay, though you are already enrolled among the victims, the use of this inestimable tonic will insure your discharge in a healthy condition, and without being liable to be seized again. In plain terms, this famous stomachic and alterative so infallibly invigorates the digestive organs, which are the seat of complaint, that it not only expels the spirits, fevers, and ills, but strengthens the body, and is a potent antidote to the deleterious influence of damp and cold. HOSTETTER'S BITTERS can be obtained in any first class Drug Store in the country.

Lyon's Kathairon.

This delightful article for preserving and beautifying the human hair is daily growing in favor with the original proprietor, and is now made with the same care, skill, and attention, which first created its immense and unprecedented sales of over one million bottles annually. It is still sold in all cases in large bottles. Two million bottles can easily be sold in a year when it is again known that the Kathairon is not only the most delightful hair dressing in the world, but that it cleanses the scalp of scurf and dandruff, gives the hair a lively, rich lustrous growth, and prevents it from turning gray. These are considerations worth having. The Kathairon has been tested for over twelve years and is warranted as described. Any lady who values a beautiful head of hair will use the Kathairon. It is finely perfumed, cheap and valuable. It is sold by all respectable dealers throughout the world.

American Watches

For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AS ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Anchor and Lepine of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, BOSTON, MASS., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of our manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

CUTTING AWAY THE DAM AT THE HEAD OF THE VICKSBURG CANAL.—SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 215.]

FORWARD—MARCH!

FORWARD? Yes, we are going!
What craven turns back?
See the blood that is flowing
To moisten the track!
Blood from loyal hearts torn
When our foes passed this way,
A red pathway has worn,
We must walk there to-day!

Forward? Yes, God be praised!
We are all of one mind,
When His standard is raised
We dare not lag behind.
Dark the world grows around,
And shall we hide our light?
Traitrymen demon abound,
What can we do but fight?

What are you, friend, or I,
While the Union's enslaved?
Who should mourn if we die,
So the nation be saved?
Oh! the earth closes tight
Where a coward finds rest,
But her green sods fall light
On the patriot's breast!

Yes, we're all marching on,
Sword in hand, side by side,
Bidding rebels begone
Where our flag is defied;
Till the land is united
That they've torn in twain,
And the flag they have slighted
Shall triumph again!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1863.

NOW FOR A VICTORY!

THE news from all parts of the country confirms the view we took last week of the despairing condition of the rebels, and the restoration of confidence throughout the North. Since we wrote the loyal people of the United States have been lending their money to Government for the prosecution of the war at the rate of a million and a half per day. The Assistant-Secretary of the Treasury has been obliged by his own hero to expedite the printing of bonds, for the engravers could not furnish them as fast as the people wanted to buy them. Gold has fallen twenty per cent., and the collapse of the currency, so much dreaded at one time, is now indefinitely postponed.

On the other hand, each arrival from the South reveals a gloomier picture than the last. Starvation reigns at Mobile, Richmond, and Charleston. Flour is $60, $80, and $100 a barrel. The rebel currency, which is the only money current in Secessia, is so depreciated that gold sells at 600 per cent. All traffic of every kind is at an end. Agriculture has been ruined by the Conscription Act. The growth of manufactures, which had commenced when the blockade was established, has been checked by the currency collapse, and those which are still working are worked by the Government. A correspondent in Richmond writes that operations of prices are most fitful, for the simple reason that no one knows what which he can avoid selling, and the railways are monopolized by Government, and from want of attention to repairs are fast wearing out—thus depriving the people of the States which have been the theatre of the war of the means of obtaining provisions from other localities. As to civil rights, the poor people of the South have none at all. Bands of ruffians, armed with authority from Jeff Davis and his generals, scour the country, seizing young men and impressing them, stealing property of all who differ with them, burning cotton, and laying the face of the land as waste as an African desert. Such is the picture as we find it in the rebel papers and the narratives of Southern refugees. Of such a condition have two years of rebellion reduced the sunny South.

It is evident that this accursed insurrection only needs the coup de grace to finish it. That the rebels, however straitened for provisions and harassed by other tribulations, will succumb before they have been beaten, we are not prepared to believe. The rebel army will feed itself, though every one else in the Confederacy starve; and pride will keep the leaders steadfast as long as it is possible to keep their armies together. But the news from the South indicates clearly that the rebels are in that state that a single defeat will destroy them utterly. Such a repulse as we met at Fredericksburg—which for sixty days plunged the North into despondency and almost despair—would be fatal to the insurgents. Their armies would melt away as the French army did after Waterloo—when a magnificent corps of some 80,000 men disappeared in a single day so thoroughly that next morning it was impossible to collect 1000 of them together. Discouragement and despair would overwhelm garrison after garrison, regiment after regiment, and we should very quickly have counter revolutionary movements in each Southern State, and hastily organized popular demonstrations in favor of the Union. Backed by a decided victory, the argumentum ad ventrem may be relied upon to finish the work.

But a victory we must have. Who will be the General to win it? Hooker, they say, is moving more or less rapidly through the mud of the Rappahannock. Grant is not only engineering, but is getting ready to fight in the Southwest. Banks's cannon has been heard near Fort Hudson. Hunter's bugle has sounded the advance at Port Royal. Rosecrans is feeling his way toward Southeastern Tennessee. Which of these Generals will be the one to enthrone himself in history as the man who put down the great slavery rebellion? There will be, we honestly think, but one more great battle. Who shall be the man to win it?

THE BRITISH PIRATES.

THE British pirate Florida bids fair to win as prominent a place in the annals of successful piracy as the other British pirate, the Alabama. The destruction of the Jacob Bell, with a cargo worth a million, has been followed by the destruction of another vessel, also, it is said, richly laden. The work goes bravely on.

When these vessels were placed on the stocks in England, the British Government was notified that they were intended to be pirates. At every step in their construction the evidence of their destination accumulated, and was carefully laid before the British Government. Minister Adams from week to week informed Lord Russell of the character of the Florida and the Alabama, and placed at his disposal the opinion of Queen's Counsel to the effect that the construction of these vessels was a violation of neutrality. The Earl was deaf to all remonstrance. "Her Majesty's Commissioners of Customs" at Liverpool and elsewhere, having pocketed with their pockets well lined with Southern money, discovered no evidence that either the Alabama or the Gorgo, alias the Florida, were destined for the service of the Slave Confederacy. It was not until Earl Russell felt sure that the Alabama had got fairly to sea that he issued orders to detain her. Like motives led the Earl to allow the Nile and Barbadoes the pirate Florida is a welcome visitor. Mallt is asked to Government House, and congratulated by the British colonists on the destruction of American vessels. The Alabama is feted in Jamaica; and the merchants of Kingston turn out on Change to give a right royal reception to the pirate Semmes, who was not only remembering that these British colonies were planted as pirates' nests, grew up on the profits of buccaneering, and were mainly peopled by the illegitimate offspring of pirates and mulattoes.

That it has been and is still the purpose of the British authorities, from Earl Russell down to the tide-waiters in "Her Majesty's Customs," to help these pirates to get to sea, and to assist them in their work of destroying American commerce, it is impossible, in view of the diplomatic correspondence before Congress, to doubt for an instant. Only a few days ago, Mr. Layard, on behalf of the British Government, stated in Parliament that he had no information of any vessels being built for the rebels in England, though the fact of their construction had been published in all the papers, with the names of the builders, and the sites of the dock-yards where the vessels are building. Two of the so-called "Liverpool privateers" have been launched by Mr. Laird, the builder of the Alabama.

All the indications point to a general complicity among the governing classes of England against our merchant navy. The gradual progress of our merchant marine, the superiority which our builders have attained over British constructors, and the general preference given by shippers in Asiatic and South American ports to American over English bottoms, have aroused the alarm of the "Liverpool interest," and Englishmen are ready to avail themselves of the alliance of pirates to regain the carrying trade of the world. Every British official, from Earl Russell to the half-disguised traitors who officiate as consuls in our ports, is possessed with the idea that now or never is the time to drive American ships from the face of the ocean.

This is one of the inconveniences of the war in which we are engaged, and we must bear it like men. When peace comes—then will come a reckoning.

THE LOUNGER.

LETTER TO AN ENGLISH FRIEND.

MY DEAR SIR,—Although you have so clear a perception of the scope of our civil war, and so sincere a sympathy with the efforts of the Government, I observe that you still conceive some sort of separation to be desirable and feasible, if not inevitable, and you add that many of our truest friends abroad are of the same opinion. If, however, you will look carefully at the facts, I am very sure that you will see, as we do, that the only alternative of the Government is the total overthrow of armed rebellion and a return to the constitutional methods of settling differences, or submission to its own ruin.

In the matter of disunion there are two points to be considered: first, the consequences, and, second, the methods.

If we make the attempt to recognize the "Confederacy," and succeed in maintaining Northern unity, we surrender the navigation of our great rivers to a treaty settlement. We abandon Chesapeake Bay, which reaches almost to Philadelphia. We renounce all the Southern coasts and forts from the Capes of Delaware to and through the Gulf of Mexico. Those forts command the mouths of the rivers and the course of our Pacific and South American commerce. Your Thames is an inconsiderable river. Would Great Britain relinquish the control of its mouth to a foreign power for the sake of peace? What would its foreign possession be but the seed of future war? Besides this, we must establish an internal boundary line of 1500 miles, to defend against the most hostile of enemies. The greatest wars have been the defense of such lines. Such a line with us would be always festering; for slaves will escape, and the passions of borderers who have been wrenched asunder by civil war and consequent hate are unneutralizable. Then the Northwest is the granary of the continent. The Mississippi is its natural road to market, and the Northwest must and will control it. What conceivable treaty could guarantee that control as the Union does? You will tell me that the self-interest of trade will suffice. But why should it? Who keeps peace under a treaty which it has broken under a Union? There are other passions quite as strong as selfishness.

But when, by the secession, we have surrendered the coasts, and the rivers, and the forts, we have done so to a power that has and can have no naval necessities, and is at most therefore at once seek a maritime alliance. Disunion thus immediately establishes two foreign states upon our soil. And by the law which, by the force of peace accepted by us, we must adopt, the North is almost territorially divided between the former point of the Lakes and the highest of the Slave region. And all this renunciation of territory, navigation, coast, commerce, internal communication, national peace, safety, and importance—all this whittling down of the imperial United States to a miserable cluster of belted political appendages—when made after a war waged to maintain its pristine extension and power, is simply a conquest by the enemy, and an enemy that hates us the more because he was part of us, the ever-ready ally of any European or foreign foe against us, the willing and constant aggressor of our peace, and the humiliated foe at arms.

This is upon the supposition that we ourselves propose an armistice and settlement. If, on the other hand, the rebels sue for peace, it will be infinitely easier and safer for the Government to maintain the Union upon terms that secure peace than to intrust the fortunes of that peace to an angry and sullen, although for the moment defeated, foreign power.

But any conceivable method of disunion is not less disastrous than the consequences. It is often forgotten by our friends that union is an instinct with the great mass of our people, because union is synonymous with nation. We perfectly understand that disunion is our struggle and our success. It is this feeling which has hitherto enabled the Slave Power to carry all its measures. It had but to threaten disunion, and the country fell upon its knees in abject assent. It is the same feeling which has made the word "Abolitionist," which was originally a term of Pharisaical contempt, odious party-name in our history.

Let us then suppose that the attempt at disunion is by the people. First of all, at the separating line must be determined. As there is no natural division this line must be purely arbitrary. Upon what principle, will you establish it? I Davis will claim all the Slave States as his natural domain. But Kentucky does not willingly go with him, nor Missouri, nor Tennessee. Maryland has a strong reflectious tendency, but there is a vital Union element in the State. Is that is to be done? To be a Border State has been bad enough under the old system of one nation. How will it be when the border is to be a battle ground between powers? Who will stand in the breach? Evidently there can be no solution. The question must be referred to the people of the States concerned. Let Maryland, for instance, decide by popular vote whether she will go with the South or the North. But if she decides to go with the latter Pennsylvania a Border State. Pennsylvania will therefore say at once, "I shall not let Maryland decide whether I am to be a Border State or not." And she, too, will demand her vote upon the question.

And so we shall immediately arrive at the practical perception that the only truth that is preserving one stone we have loosened the whole arch. The old national system will be gone, and the national bond being snapped each free State becomes a solitary community. But by the supposition, while thus the free States are divided, the rebel States are a close, cohesive power. Nor only that, but they have shown their ability to maintain themselves in a long struggle against enormous odds, and they have compassed the destruction of the old system. Is it not inevitable, then, that the remaining States will establish a new system or gravitate toward the only united national power upon our late domain? And inasmuch as Union is the most vital principle, and the law for the maintenance of the old form of Union will then have failed, will not the combatant that remains victor have every motive to dictate the terms of a new Union? Party-spirit is still fierce. The North, even the most ardent citizens, are not united upon any thing but the policy of preserving the Union, and when "the war for the Union," which is the common platform of good citizens, is ended by the conceded dissolution of the Union, every citizen will revert to his party allegiance. One party will cry, "We have been fighting for the Union, not for the ningar, and having lost the game we call for a fresh deal. We like slavery, and we go for a union with the South." Another will cry, "You can't mix oil and water. Any union of slave and free States, unless slavery or freedom are put in course of rapid extinction, will inevitably land us in another war." Intestine trawls will at once bristle all over separate States which have lost the strength and unity of a common purpose; and consequent anarchy will thus invite the forcible interference of the combined power which has compelled the separation.

When we are in a position to do what you suggest—namely, to curtail the dimensions of the rebellion, to push out the rebels from our system, and to hold them in check by a Sepoy army—we shall be masters, and our national peace, prosperity, and honor will be most wisely secured, as I said, by maintaining the Union. To offer any terms of composition until we have established that position is to confess our inability to do the work we have undertaken; in other words, to concede victory to the rebellion, and confess our national ruin.

As a foreigner, your view of our war is that of human welfare at large, not especially that of the existence of our Government. Yet your sympathy is with the Government, and why? Because you believe that the great cause of popular liberty requires its success. Nor can any thing be more disastrous to that Government and fatal to that cause than its defeat by armed rebels upon its own domain? The parallel which is constantly drawn in Europe and by many here between the attitude of our Government toward the rebellion and that of Great Britain toward the American Colonies is radically false. The relation between Britain and the Colonies was purely colonial, and the geographical separation makes all the difference. If you would suppose a parallel case, it must be that of two or three counties of Yorkshire, like Yorkshire and Kent, rising in rebellion, not because they had suffered the slightest injury or injustice, but because they could not control a certain local county laws repulsive to the common conscience of mankind over the whole empire. If the Imperial Government could be justly accused of gratifying a lust of dominion in aiming to reduce the rebellion by arms, so may we, but not otherwise.

You will thus see, I hope, that we are shut up to the issue of victory or ruin. The "last experiment" is simply the appeal of the most reckless and depraved of our party politicians to popular ignorance and prejudice, counting for its power upon the natural fatigue of a tremendous war, its necessary expense, and, above all, upon the brutal prejudice against the African race. Could such a movement become in any manner general, and by means of such arguments and such men as support it, the war for the Union would be indefinitely lost here, and faith in the capacity of men for self-government would be every where extinguished. The Union is now the only honest word of our destiny, but of that of free men throughout the world.

Faithfully yours.

THE OPERA.

AFTER all there is no manager like Maretzek. He has been familiar to us all now for many years. From the historical days of Truffi and Bosworth to these very nights in which we hear one of the best companies that ever sung in New York. Maretzek has been the most faithful and unwearied of operatic benefactors. His management has been always skillful and enterprising, and the charge of the lyrical and dramatic interests of the public is enough to try the stoutest heart. The success of the present company is as sure as it is deserved, and it is another obligation of the public to Maretzek.

COTOPAXI.

It has been the happiness of Mr. Church to achieve a more popular reputation than any American painter since Allston. Cole, Durand, Kensett, and Gignoux, our other masters of landscape, have a justly won and sustained fame among the few cultivated lovers of art, but Mr. Church, Inman, Page, Huntington, Elliott, Gray, and Hicks, the historical and portrait painters. But the name of Church is on everybody's lips familiar to the general public. He alone, with the confidence of success, ventures to paint a picture and has completed. No other name, perhaps, among our artists would summon such crowds as his.

The reason of this popularity is the justice of the public preference, are questions which I do not mean to consider now. What fame is, what reputation is, what success is, are questions which lead us into a region of subtle distinctions. As a Lounger, I have only to mention that one of the pleasantest public sights in the summer is Goupil's gallery in Broadway, where, in the spacious upper hall, hangs in solitary splendor Church's last great picture. They are parts of a whole in the painter's design, which is evidently nothing less than an epic of the Tropical World. If the artist's invention in the selection of a subject so suggestive, so magnificent, so effective, and practically untouched, the public has been happy that the Dore has such an interpreter. You may listen to all the objections; you may hear of the want of imagination, of the unequal detail, of the figures in the foreground, of the false glitter, and yet, after all, as we see in the statue of the Dying Gladiator exactly what Byron saw and sung, so we shall henceforth see in our cavities of the Tropics precisely what Church sees and paints. After months of barren pictures the Tropics is no vague word, but a vivid, gorgeous image.

The Cotopaxi shows the apparently smooth, symmetrical cone of the volcano in the first distance. A vast plume of smoke floats from its point across the sky in heavy, corrugated clouds, through which the sun, just risen, shines, irradiating a lake which fills the middle distance. Beyond the cone are a few mountain peaks, and upon the right, in the depth of the picture, a group of restless hills. From the fore-ground to Cotopaxi is a stretch of rocky plateau, fifty miles broad, clad lightly with thin grass. This plateau is divided from the right fore-ground and depth of the scene by a deep abyss into which the lake discharges its water, that foams over jagged rocks and whirls in blue mist toward the front. In the fore-ground descends a sheer precipice, against which Indians are strolling in the cool. The plateau above stretches, a level promontory of rock, toward the lake, the reflection of the sunlight gleaming along its glittering surface. In the extreme corner of the left fore-ground is a road along which comes a peasant leading a lama, and a tropical thicket is pierced by a bowery path in which the luminous shadow is one of the marvels of the work. A lake in the midst of rocky plateaus, through a rift of which it flows away—the cone of the volcano, with the heavy smoke cloud, through which the sun glares as he flies—the cliffs and plateau stained with the myriad shifting hues of lichens, and herbulous with lilac, whispering grass, a cluster of trees in a corner—is the substance of the picture.

Its power is in the impression it conveys of the resistless force of tropic nature, expending itself in apparently aim-less grandeurs and useless magnificence. The sense of solitude withering in its splendor, of a torrid fierceness which seems to aim at aridity, but is baffled by unexpected and inexplainable beauty, the supreme disdain with the equator hurls at high civilization and human mastery and progress, are subtly reproduced in this painting, having in the spectator's mind the effect of that profound sadness, which the sight or the story of the Tropics always inspires.

The handling is of the same character and excellence as in Mr. Church's other works. The extraordinary elaboration of detail, as seen in the trees at the left, in the rockiness of the rock, and in the variety of surface, is unsurpassed even by the Pre-Raphaelite doctors. Yet it is accomplished to a breadth of effect which is equally striking. Brilliant and masterly effects of light and color with the greatest facility are not uncommon. Duhad achieved them wonderfully in very small pictures. But Diaz sacrificed every thing to that single point. It was often enough upon the canvas with a pallet knife. It was the crudest pigment. But Church secures the light, the brilliancy, the telling and broad effect without hurting the delicacy of detail. You have the granulations of the bark and the broad splendor of the trees. There is no niggling. It is honest work, resulting from the most sagacious observation.

Let us hope, some happy day, to see the Heart of the Andes, the Niagara, the Icebergs, and the Cordilleras and the Andes of the Ecuador all combined in a single exhibition.

—In the ante-room of the gallery there is a proof of the engraving of the Heart of the Andes, the result of three years' labor of ten hours a day. It is an exquisite specimen of line engraving worthy the most careful and intelligent study.

FROM ONE OF THE PEOPLE.

THE Lounger commends the following correspondent to the Delmonico Committee as a citizen in extreme need of "sound political information":

RIDGEFIELD, March 18.

DEAR LOUNGER.—Dr. Mackay, the New York correspondent of the London Times, must, from the nature of his communications, reside in an atmosphere laden with the poison of sedition. His letter, dated January 28, says:

"The beginning of the end draws near. The patience of the people is nearly exhausted. Three years have been disgusted with the war and the Administration. The dregs of corruption remained itself to the world. Silence casts nowhere.

"Even the Democrats and the Abolitionists have begun to despair of their cause, their President, and themselves, and are now not only the disunionists and enemies of the Union into the North and South, but into a third republic in the West, accompanied by the utter destruction of credit, if not by a crowning act of national bankruptcy."

The first sentence is true, but not with the meaning of the correspondent of the London Times. The beginning of the end draws near; but it will be the end of this gigantic Southern rebellion, and not the dismemberment of the Union. "The patience of the people is well-nigh exhausted," writes this profound student of American politics, and full-grasped character of American nationality. The patience of the people can never be exhausted to a point where they would consent to national disgrace and extinction for the sake of a few years of uncertain peace. They want no base and baby for raising to a national throne. Congress is a safety-valve through which the surplus steam escapes. But the great heart of the American people throbs as strong and as loyal to-day as ever in its best hayseat glittered through Broadway. When will the "correspondent of the London Times learn something of the nature of the American people, and something in regard to American politics? The two things may date treason by the hour; but the country has taken their measure. Neither does Horace Greeley speak for the American people; for they do not believe in his doctrine of peaceable secession. From the nature of his position Dr. Mackay can not judge justly of our crisis. A man must be among and of the people in order to feel of their pulse.

What does Dr. Mackay mean by the word "Exterminate?" Does he intend that it shall represent those who are for exterminating the rebellion? If he means this, then he must "exterminate" half of the American citizens. Perhaps the fire of his excited imagination has conjured a people, demon-like, rushing South on a sculping expedition!

I beg the correspondent of the London Times, who is here fishing at least for the bone and sinew of the dirty stuff that he can find, to interpret his communications now and then with a little common sense. He need not be afraid of the article—it will not hurt him.

THE SONG OF SONGS.

A most timely and admirable war-song is the following "broadside," which has been widely distributed among the Union soldiers, who are now "sitting upon stumps by the roadside and in the woods of the South," and who have a tolerably clear "understanding of politics and the duties of the citizen."

N.B. Justice to the Delmonico Committee for the diffusion of Copperhead literature requires us to state that the song is not issued under their auspices.

N.B. 2. The Honorable Isaac Toucey does not sing this song at the close of his speeches for Mr. Thomas H. Seymour. Neither was he humming it when he sent off all the national ships of war to the ends of the earth, in order that the rebellion might encounter no opposition.

The writer of the song is Charles G. Leland; the air, "My love she's but a lassie yet."

O! we're not tired of fighting yet!
Or we're not tired of fighting yet!
We're not the boys to frighten yet!
While drums and fifes can merrily wail be coming.
With the ball and bayonet!
For we can hit while they can pound,
And so let's have another round,
Seems is bound to lick the ground,
And we'll be in their pantry yet!

O! we're not tired of trumping yet—
Of soldier-life or camping yet;
And rough or level, sun or devil,
We are game for stamping yet.
We've lived through weather wet and dry,
Through hail and fire, without a cry;
We wouldn't freeze and couldn't fry,
And haven't got through our ramping yet.

We haven't broke up the party yet;
We're rough, and tough, and hearty yet;
Who talks of going pays what's owing;
And there's a bill will smart ye yet.
So hang the doors, and lock 'em tight!
Secede, you've got to settle your bill!
We'll have a little dance to-night;
You can't begin to travel yet!

O! we're not tired of fighting yet,
Nor ripe for dismantling yet!
Before they do it, we'll go through it,
There'll be some savage biting yet.
Then rip hurrah for Uncle Sam,
And down with all secesh and shame!
From Davis to Yellandigham,
They all shall rue their treason yet!

UPON THE REVOLUTION.

IT is part of the design of the Cooper Institute to furnish every season a series of popular lectures upon the most timely and permanently valuable topics, and several courses have been delivered this winter. Among them those of Professor G. W. Greene upon the American Revolution are worthy of especial notice; for they are the fruit of the extensive research and scholarship of a grandson of one of the most illustrious of Revolutionary heroes, General Greene, the friend of Washington. Professor Greene is in possession of his grandfather's private papers, which he was preparing for publication when the war began. Newer interests are now likely to postpone, if not entirely to prevent, their appearance. Meanwhile a series of discourses upon the Revolution has been prepared and delivered by Professor Greene before the Lowell Institute in Boston with the greatest success. They have been repeated, or are even now repeating, at the Cooper Institute. Professor Greene's scholarly accomplishments and hereditary interest in the great theme are the sure guarantees of the interest and value of his discourses. The Lyceum Committees of the next season might wisely bear the fact in mind.

LITERARY.

IN reply to numerous inquiries the Lounger says, what he omitted to say in his article upon "The Trial of the Constitution," by Sidney George Fisher, that it is published by Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia.

"Sylvia's Lovers" is the new novel by Mrs. Gaskell—a story of English life, told with the circumspect favor and dramatic power for which the authoress of "Mary Barton" has long since established her fame. It has been greeted with great praise by the London critics, and shows that Mrs. Gaskell is not yet to be superseded by the fresher triumphs of Mrs. Wood or the authoress of "Aurora Floyd." Indeed Mrs. Gaskell and Miss Evans, the author of "Adam Bede" and "Romola" (now publishing in Harper's Magazine), are still unrivaled among the "female novelists" of England. Published by Harper & Brothers.

In this number of the Weekly is the brilliant opening of Charles Reade's new novel, "Very Hard Cash." Mr. Tom Hughes must look to his laurels. Mr. Reade begins by a most spirited picture of boat-racing at Oxford, and places four marked characters upon the stage. The breeze blows in his stories from the very beginning. There is a storage in the style, a brisk movement, a distain of weariness and prosiness, that make his pages sparkle. There are no better tales to read in numbers than Reade's, for this dramatist habit leads him to finish every part like a scene upon the stage. Begin with the beginning.

The value of General Butterfield's "Outpost Duty" may be inferred from the fact of the large Government orders for copies of the same. The accomplished Chief of Staff in the Army of the Potomac has prepared a most timely and lucid manual. It is both the illustration of his own military intelligence and a friendly service to his fellow-soldiers. Published by Harper & Brothers.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

"SAY, Mike, what sort of potatoes are those you are planting?" "Sure ones, to be sure; yer honor wouldn't be thinking I would plant boiled ones."

"Page, what is that picture over the mantle-piece?" The vain father answered, "Why, that's pigs's arms, my darling." "Then why don't you have your legs put up here?" was the reply.

A gentleman who had lost his wife, whose maiden name was Little, addressed the following to Miss More, a lady of diminutive stature:

"I've lost the little one I had,
My heart is sad and sore,
But I'm sure I should be very glad
To have a little more."

To which the lady returned the following answer:

"I pity much the loss you've had;
The grief you must endure—
A heart by Little made so sad,
A little More won't cure."

The butler to Lord B——— gave up his place because his lordship's wife was always scolding him. "Good gracious!" exclaimed his master, "you've little to complain of; ye may be thankful ye're no married to her."

A certain old lady, whenever she hires a servant-man always asks, "Can you whistle?" On being asked the reason of this curious question she always gives the answer, makes him whistle when he goes to draw the ale unlawfully, thus securing him from tasting.

The philosopher Rien said pleasantly of the King who by handfuls pulled his hair off his head for sorrow, "Does this man think that baldness is a remedy for grief?"

The man who attempted to whittle a her of coup, has injured his voice by trying to sing a stave off a barrel.

A railroad contractor recently tried to take a ride on a "train of thought," and failing off, was run over by a "passing event."

He who said that the half is often better than the whole, might have added that none at all is often better than the half.

Young ladies are like arrows—they are all in a quiver till the beau comes and can't go off without them.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

What Christian name reads both ways the same? Hannah.

Why is Ireland likely to become very rich?
Because its capital is always doubling (Dublin).

Why have wine and cake very bad morals?
Because one is always drunk, and the other is often tipsy.

Why is a pretty woman like a lock?
Because she is a thing to a door indeed.

What is the difference between a good and a bad oyster?
One is a native and the other is a neither.

If the eyes and nose were going to run a race which would win?
The eyes, for the nose would be blown, while the eyes would run till they dropped.

What difference was there between a lady's nose and chin?
Twixt the two lips.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE YAZOO PASS EXPEDITION.

On Intelligence from the Southern army arrived, disconnected, and somewhat contradictory. On 23d the Department at Washington received a dispatch from Admiral Porter stating that he has received information from Lieutenant Commander Watson Smith that on the 7th instant the whole expedition arrived in the Tallahatchie. The vessels all got through in fighting condition, excepting the Petrel, which lost her wheel.

On 27th a dispatch was received at Washington from Memphis stating that our fleet had reached the junction of the Tallahatchie and Yallobusha Rivers, and there had had a fight, on 13th, with a rebel fort, called Fort Pemberton, at or near a place called Green Wood. Later advices, without date, coming by way of Cincinnati, add that our fleet had disembarked from their transports and were besieging this Fort Pemberton.

On 30th news reached St. Louis to the effect that the steamer Belmont, with the Eighth Missouri, had succeeded in entering Yazoo River, above Haines' Bluff. Her course was through Cypress Bayou, which debouches into the Yazoo opposite Johnson's plantation, and thence through Steele's Bayou into the Sunflower, which empties into the Yazoo twenty miles above Haines' Bluff. The Belmont was accompanied by a light gun-boat. As soon as it was could possible to get through, four gun-boats followed it. It is also stated that the rebels are burning the cotton crops and destroying their approach; likewise that they are safe-ering from want of food.

THE ATTACK ON PORT HUDSON.

Admiral Farragut, supported by General Banks, has attacked Port Hudson. Our accounts of the affair are thus far very meagre. The rebel story is that given in the richmond Whig of 11th:

"The bombardment commenced on Port Hudson at two o'clock on the 14th. At twelve o'clock in the night a desperate engagement took place, the enemy attempting to pass our batteries under cover of the darkness.

"The fleet was three months. Our gun-boat proved in a damaged condition. The United States sloop-of-war Richmond passed our batteries, the enemy's ships and our batteries. One large vessel was completely riddled, a third badly crippled. The rest got away with little loss.

"Our victory was complete. There were no casualties on our part. Thirty-five men of the Twenty-fourth of this Mississippi were brought in by our cavalry, several of them severely wounded.

"Farragut's flag-ship went down the river disabled."

On the other hand, it is stated that the fleet passed from New Orleans that on 14th Admiral Farragut came into action with his fleet of Port Hudson, and after a fierce encounter with the batteries, succeeded in passing the fort with his fleet, consisting of eight vessels, including the Mississippi behind, which ran aground, and was set on fire by order of the Admiral, to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy's works. Dispatches from Southwest Pass, Louisiana, appear to confirm this statement. They are dated on the 15th, and add that heavy firing between the fleet on the 14th and the Colonel Clark, and to General Banks, was slightly wounded, and that the army was in good health and would move in a few hours.

THE LAKE PROVIDENCE CANAL.

The water was let into the canal at Lake Providence on the 14th inst. The aperture is twenty feet wide, and was opening at its mouth still wider. The greatest part of the town was threatened with an overflow on the following morning.

SKIRMISH IN TENNESSEE.

The following dispatch has been received at head-quarters of the army:

MURFREESBORO, TENNESSEE, March 26, 1863.

Major-General Halleck, General-in-Chief:

General Rosecrans reports from General Hall's brigade, on a scout near Milton, on the road to Liberty, that he was attacked this morning by a force of rebel cavalry and artillery about eight or ten regiments and after a four hours' fight succeeded in driving them back. He is up seven killed and thirty-one wounded, including one captain.

The rebel loss was thirty or forty killed, including three commissioned officers, one hundred and fifty wounded and twelve prisoners, including three commissioned officers.

W. S. ROSECRANS, Major-General.

DISTRESS IN DIXIE.

The Richmond papers are crushing fearfully over the want of the luxuries of life which they have now suffering. All the country around the localities where these armies are situated is completely stripped of provisions, and the only resource lies in the railroads, which are said to be giving out for want of laborers to keep them in order. The wood-work is rotting and the machinery getting out of repair. The Richmond Examiner says that "if they are allowed to fall through, from any cause, Government and people may prepare for a retreat of our armies, and the surrender of much invaluable country now in our possession."

DEATH OF GENERAL SUMNER.

The army of the United States and the cause of loyalty against rebellion have sustained a serious loss in the death of Major-General Edwin V. Sumner, who died at Syracuse on 21st, rather suddenly, of congestion of the lungs.

GENERAL STUART'S NEW AID.

"The rebel cavalry leader, STUART, has appointed to a position on his staff, with the rank of Major, a young lady residing at Fairfax Court House, who has been of great service to him in giving information," etc.—Daily Paper.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE PIRATES IN PARLIAMENT.

In the House of Commons Mr. Cardwell asked if the Government was informed of ships preparing for the Confederate States in England similar to the Alabama and Florida, and that the attention of the Government had been called to more than one vessel of the kind, and whether has been yet furnished to enable the Government to interfere. He said, however, that strict search had been given for all suspected vessels to be closely watched.

TWO MORE LAUNCHED.

Messrs. Laird, of Birkenhead, England, have launched two steamers—the Queen-Sony and Thunder—from their yard at that place. There vessels form part of the seven Chinese fleet recently spoken of as being building in England, under that pretense, for the service of the rebels of the South.

ARRIVAL OF THE PRINCESS ALEXANDRA.

The Princess Alexandra, of Denmark, now the wife of the Prince of Wales, had reached Windsor Castle.

POLAND.

THE REBELLION.

The French and English Governments are quite agreed, it is said, as to their policy on the Polish question. Peace to them, they regret the partition of the ancient kingdom, but accept it as a fact which can not be reconsidered; but they speak earnestly, at the same time, of the solemn promises made of granting liberal institutions to the Poles.

PROLOGUE.

IN a snowy villa, with a sloping lawn, just outside the great commercial sea-port, Barlington, lived, a few years ago, a happy family. A lady, middle-aged, but still charming; two young friends of hers; and a periodical visitor.

The lady was Mrs. Dodd; her occasional visitor was her husband; her friends were her son Edward, aged twenty, and her daughter Julia, nineteen; the fruit of a misalliance.

Mrs. Dodd was originally Miss Fountain, young lady well-born, high-bred, and a denizen of the fashionable world. Under a strange concurrence of circumstances she coolly married the captain of an East Indiaman. The dead done, and with her eyes open, for she was not, to say, in love with him, she took a judicious line; and kept it; no hankering after Mayfair, no talking about Lord "This" and Lady "That," to commercial gentlewomen; no amphibianage. She accepted her place in society, reserving the right to embellish it with the graces she had gathered in a higher sphere; in her home, and in that person, she was little less elegant than a countess; yet nothing more than a merchant-captain's wife: and he reared that commander's children, in a suburban villa, with the manners which adorn a palace. When they happen to be there.

This lady had a bugbear: viz. Ridicule. She could not endure the smart technicalities current; that ecstasies did not overpower her distaste; she called them "jargon!" "slang" but too coarse a word for her to apply to slang: she excluded even a good "racier idiom" along with the real offenders; and monosyllables in general ran some risk of having to show their passports. If this was arbitrary, it went on fairly. Life was open, free, and youthful with her young pupils; and had the art to put herself on their level, often, when they were single-eyed, and would feign infantine ignorance, in order to hunt trite truth in couples with them, and detect, by joint experiment, that rainbows can not, or do will not, be walked into, nor Jack-o'-lanthern be captured like a worship; and that, dissect we the vocal dog—its hair is like a lash—never so skillfully, no fragments of palpable bark, no sediment of tangible squeal, remains inside him to bless the inquisitive little operator, etc., etc.

When they advanced from these elementary branches to Languages, History, Tapestry, and "What Not," she managed still to keep by their side, learning with them, not just hearing them lessons down from the top of a high throne of maternity. She never checked their curiosity, but made herself share it; never gave them, as so many parents do, a white-lying answer; wooed their affections with subtle though innocent art; thawed their reserve; obtained their love, and retained their respect. Briefly, a female Chesterfield; her husband's lover after marriage, though not before; and the mild moonlight of the step-sister, the favorite companion and bosom friend, of both her children.

They were remarkably dissimilar; and perhaps I may be allowed to preface the narrative of their adventures by a delineation; as in country churches an individual pizes the key-note, and the tune comes raging after.

Edward then, had a great calm eye, that was always looking folk full in the face, making his countenance comely and manly, but no more; too square for Apollo; but suffced for John Bull. His figure it was that charmed the curious observer of male beauty: he was five feet ten; had square shoulders, a deep chest, masculine flank, small foot, high instep. To crown all this, a head, overflowed by ripples of dark-brown hair, sat with heroic grace upon his solid white throat, like some glossy falcon new lighted on a Parian column.

This young gentleman had decided qualities, positive and negative. He could walk up to a five-barred gate, and clear it, alighting on the other side like a fallen feather; could row all day, and then dance all night; could fling a cricket ball a hundred and six yards; had a lathe and a tool-box, and would make you in a trice a chair, a table, a doll, a nut-cracker, or any other movable, useful, or the very reverse. And could not learn his lessons, to save his life.

His sister Julia was not so easy to describe. Her figure was tall, lithe, and serpentine; her hair the color of a horse-chestnut fresh from its pod; her ears tiny and shell-like, her eyelashes long and silky; her mouth small when grave, large when smiling; her eyes pure hazel by day, and tinged with a little violet by night. But in jotting down these details, true as they are, I seem to myself to be painting fire, with a little snow and saffron mixed on a marble pallet. There is a beauty too spiritual to be chained in a string of items; and Julia's fair features were but the china vessel that burned over with the higher loveliness of her soul. Her essential charm was, what shall I say? Transparence.

"You would have said her body o'ergat."

Modesty, Intelligence, and, above all, Enthusiasm, shone through her, and out of her, and made her an airy, fiery, beautiful thing. Briefly, an incarnate sunbeam.

This one could learn her lessons with unreasonable rapidity, and, until Edward went to Eton, would insist upon learning his into the bargain, partly with the fond notion of coaxing him on; as the company of a swift horse forces a slow one; partly because she was determined to share his every trouble, if she could not remove it. A little choleric, and indeed downright prone to that more generous indignation which flows at the wrongs of others. When heated with emotion, or sentiment, she lowered her voice, instead of raising it like the rest of us: she called her mother "Lady Placid," and her brother "Sir Imperturbable." And so much for outlines.

Mrs. Dodd laid aside her personal ambition with her maiden name; but she looked high for her children. Perhaps she was all the more ambitious for them, that she had no rival aspirants in Mrs. Dodd. She educated Julia herself from first to last: but with true feminine distrust of her power to cope with Edward's education, she sent Edward to Eton at nine.

This was shocking bad tactics. For at Eton is no female master, to coax dry knowledge into a slow head. However, he made good progress for a two hundredth part of a boy.

After Eton came the choice of a profession. His mother recognized out four; and these her discreet ambition appointed to him in two. For military heroes are shot now and then, however pacific the century; and naval ones drowned. She would never consent to his entering this class of accidents. Glory by all means; glory by the pail; but safe glory, please; or she would none of it. Remained the bar, which need be long and, within these reasonable limits she left her dear boy free as air; and not even hurried; there was plenty of time to throw pinnets over the mill, the university to either. This last essential had been settled about a twelvemonth, and the very day for his going to Cambridge was fixed, when one morning Mr. Edward formally cleared his throat: it was an unusual act, and drew the ladies' eyes upon him. He called the opportunity up by delivering calmly and ponderously a connected discourse, which stretched them by its length and purport. "Mamma, dear, let me look the thing in the face." "This was his favorite expression, as well it might." "I have been thinking it quietly over for the last six months. Why send me to the university? , I shall be out of place there. It will cost a lot of money, and no good. Now, you take a fool's advice! Don't you waste your money and papa's sending a stall fellow like me to Oxford! I did bad enough at Eton. Make me an engineer, or something. If you were not so fond of me, and I of you, I'd say send me to a blacksmith, with a pickaxe; you know I've got no head-piece."

Mrs. Dodd had last aghast, causing Edward deprecating looks at the close of each ponderous sentence, but too polite to interrupt a soul, even on so talking occasion. She now saw plain who she could afford very well to send him to Oxford, and begged leave to remind him that he was too good and too sensible a man to play the fool, like the young men who did not really love their parents. "Then, as for learning, why we must be reasonable in our aims. As she best we can, on love. We know you have no great turn for the classics; we do not expect you to take high honors, like papa; Mr. Hardie besides, that might make your head ache: he has sad headaches his self, poor Julia. But, my dear, a university education is indispensable to you, to give the signs of it follow a gentleman through life, to lay nothing of the noble acquaintances and lasting friendships he makes there: even those few distinguished persons who have risen in the world without it, have openly regretted the want, and have sent their children: and that says volumes to me."

"Why, Edward, it is the hall-mark of a gentleman," said Julia, eagerly.

Mrs. Dodd caught a flash of her daughter; "and my silver shall never be without it," said she, warmly. She added presently in her usual placid tone, "I beg your pardon, my dears, I ought to have said my gold." With this she kissed Edward tenderly on the brow, and drew an embrace and a little grunt of resignation from him.

"Take the dear boy and show him our purchases, love!" said Mrs. Dodd, with a little gentle accent of half reproach, scarce perceptible to a male ear.

"Oh yes!" and Julia rose and tripped to the door. There she stood a moment, half turned, with arching neck, coloring with innocent pleasure. "Come, darling. Oh, you good-for-nothing thing."

The pair found a little room hard by, paved with china, hockery, glass, baths, kettles, etc.

"There, Sir. Look them in the face and us, if you can."

"Well, you know, I had no idea you had been and bought us a cartload of things for Oxford." His eye brightened; he whipped out a two-foot rule, and began to calculate the cubic contents. "I'll turn to and make the cases, Ju."

The ladies had their way; the cases were made and dispatched; and one morning the Bus came for Edward, and stopped at the gate of Albion Villa. At this sight mother and daughter both turned their heads quickly away by one independent impulse, and set a bad example. Apparently neither of them had calculated on this paltry little detail. They were game for theoretical departures; to inapalpable universities; and "an auf wiedersehn, Bus, Bus of the mind," it would not have dejected for a moment their lofty Spartan souls on glory bent; safe glory. But here was a flight of wood, and Edward going bodily away inside it.

The victim kissed them, threw up his portmanteau and bag, and deported across an Italian sklex. The victors watched the pitiless Bus quite out of sight; then went up to his bedroom, all disordered by packing, and, on his very face of it, vacant; and sat down on his little bed interwining and weeping.

Edward was received at Exeter College, as young gentlemen are received at college; and nowhere else, I hope, for the credit of Christendom. They showed him a hole in the roof, and called it an "Attic;" grim pleasantry! being a sanctum in the modern Athens. They inserted him; told him what hour at the top of the morning he must be in chapel; and left him to find on his circles. His class were welcomed like Christians, by the whole staircase. These undergraduates abused one another's crockery as their own: the joint-stock breakables had just dwindled very low, and Mrs. Dodd's bountiful contribution was a godsend.

The new-comer soon found that his views of a learned university had been narrow. Out of place in it? why, he could not have taken his leave in a better market; the modern Athens, like the ancient, cultivates muscle as well as mind. The captain of the university eleven saw a cricket ball thrown all across the ground; he instantly sent a professional bowler to find out who that was; through the same embassador the bowler was enabled to play on club days; and proving himself an infallible catch and long stop, a mighty thrower, a swift runner, and a steady, though not very brilliant, bat, he was, after one or two repulses, actually adopted into the university eleven. He communicated this ray of glory by letter to his mother and sister with genuine delight, coldly and clumsily expressed; they replied with frigid and fluent repute. Advancing steadily in that line of academic study, toward which his genius lay, he won a buckle once, and once a little silver buckle: and soon after brought a pewter pot, with a Latin inscription, recording the victory at "Fives" of Edward Dodd; but not too arrogantly; for in the centre of the pot was this device, "The Lord is my Illumination."

The Curate of Sandford, who pulled number six in the Exeter boat, left Sandford for Witney: on this he felt he could no longer do his college justice by water, and his parish by land, nor escape the charge of pluralism, preaching at Witney, and rowing at Oxford. He fluctuated, sighed, kept his Witney, and laid down his oar. Then Edward was solemnly weighed in his Jersey and flannel trousers by the crew, and proving only eleven stone eight, whereas he had been ungenerously suspected of twelve stone, was elected to the vacant oar by acclamation. He was a picture in a boat; and oh!! well pulled, six!!! was a hearty ejaculation constantly hurled at him from the bank by many men of other colleges, and even by the more genial of rowing the cads, as the Exeter glided at ease down the river, or shot up it in a race.

He was now as much talked of in the University as any man of his College, except one. Singularly enough that one was his townsman; but no friend of his: he was much Edward's senior in standing, though not in age; and this is a barrier which does not always exist over—without direct encouragement—at Oxford. Moreover the college was a large one, and some of "the sets" very exclusive; young Hardie was Doge of a studious clique; and careful to make it understood that he was a reading man who boated and cricketed, to avoid the fatigue of lounging; not a boatman or cricketer who strayed into Aristotle in the intervals of Perspiration.

His public running since he left Harrow was as follows; the prize poem in his fourth term; the scalp in his sixth; the Ireland scholarship in his eighth (he pulled second for it the year before); Stroke of the Exeter in his tenth; and cockneted aure of a first class, to consummate his two-fold career.

To this young Apollo, crowned with variegated laurel, Edward looked up from a distance. The brilliant creature never bestowed a word on him by hand; and by water only such observations as the following: "Exeter, Six!" "Well pulled, Six!" "Very well pulled, Six!" Except, by-the-by, in one race; when he swore at him like a trooper for not being quicker at starting. The excitement of nearly being bumped by Brazenose in the first hundred yards was an excuse; however, Hardie apologized as they were dressing in the barge after the race: but the apology was so stiff, it did not pave the way to an acquaintance.

Young Hardie, rising twenty-one, thought nothing human worthy of reverence but Intellect. Invited to dinner, on the same day, with the Emperor of Russia, and with Voltaire, and with meek St. John, he would certainly have told the coachman to put him down at Voltaire.

His quick eye detected Edward's character; but was not attracted by it: says he to one of his adherents "what a good-natured youth that Dodd is! Phœbus, what a name!" Edward, on the other hand, praised this brilliant in all his letters, and recorded his triumphs and said on his witty sayings as leaked through his own set, to reinvigorate mankind. This roused Julia's ire. It smouldered through three letters: but burst out when there was no letter, but Mrs. Dodd, meaning, Heaven knows, no harm, happened to say merely, in a propos of nothing, "You know, love, we can not all be young Hardies."

"No, and thank Heaven," said Julia, defiantly. "Yes, mamma, she continued more slowly to Mrs. Dodd's eyebrow, which had curved; "your mild glance reads my soul; I detest that boy." Mrs. Dodd smiled. "Are you sure you know what the word 'detest' means? and what has young Mr. Hardie done, that you should bestow so vicolent a sentiment on him?"

"Mamma, I am Edward's sister," was the tragic reply; then, kicking off the baskin pretty nimbly, "there! he beats our boy at every thing, and ours sits quietly down and admires him for it: oh! how can a man let any body or any thing beat him? I wouldn't; without a desperate struggle." She clenched her white teeth and imagined the struggle. To be sure, she owned she had never seen this Mr. Hardie, but after all it was only Jane Hardie's brother, as Edward was hers; "and would I sit down and let Jane beat me at Things? never! never! never! I couldn't."

THE PROFESSIONAL BOWLER WELCOMING THIS NEW-COMER.

"Your friend to the death, dear; was not that your expression?"

"Oh, that was a slip of the tongue, dear mamma: I was off my guard. I generally am, by-the-way. But now I am on it, and propose an amendment. Now I second it. Now I carry it."

"And now let me hear it."

"She is my friend till death—or Eclipse; and that means until she eclipses me, of course." But Julia added softly, and with sudden gravity: "Ah! Jane Hardie has a fault, which will always prevent her from eclipsing your humble servant in this wicked world."

"What is that?"

"She is too good. Much."

"For example?"

"Too religious."

"Oh, that is another matter."

"For shame, mamma! I am glad to hear it: for, I scorn a life of frivolity, but then again I should not like to give up every thing, you know."

Mrs. Dodd looked a little staggered, too, at so neat a scheme or capitulation. But "every thing" was soon explained to mean balls, concerts, dinner-parties in general, tea-parties without exception of Scripture, races and operas, cards, charades, and whatever else amuses society without perceptibly sanctifying it. All these, by Julia's account, Miss Hardie held unwarrantable, and was now denouncing (with the young the latter verb treads on the very heels of the former). "And, you know, she is a district visitor."

This climax delivered, Julia stopped short, and awaited the result.

Mrs. Dodd heard it all with quiet disapproval and cool incredulity. She had seen this same young ladies headed of so many young enthusiasms, by a wedding-ring. But while she was searching diligently in her mine of ladylike English—mine with plenty of veins in it, begging her pardon—for expressions to convey inoffensively, and withoutheat, her conviction that Miss Hardie was a little, furious, simpleton, the post came, and swept the subject away in a moment.

Two letters; one from Calcutta, one from Oxford.

They came quietly in upon one solver, and were opened and read with pleasurable interest, but without surprise, or misgiving; and without the slightest foretaste of their grave and singular consequences.

Rivers deep and broad start from such little springs.

David's letter was of unusual length for him. The main news were, first, the date and success of his return home. His ship, a very old one, had been condemned in port: and he was to sail in a fine new built vessel, the Jack Ketch, to see the Cape; where her captain, just recovered from a severe illness, would come on board, and convey her and him to England. In future, David was to command one of the company's large steamers to Alexandria and back.

"It is rather a come-down for a sailor, to go straight ahead like a wheel-barrow, in all weathers, with a steam-pot and a crow of coal-heavers. But then I shall not be parted from my sweetheart such long dreary spells as I have been this twenty years, my dear love: so is it for me to complain?"

The second topic was peculiary: the transfer of their affections from India, whose interest was higher than at home, but the capital not so secure.

And the third was ardent and tender expressions of affection for the wife and children he adored. These effusions of the heart had no separate place, except in my somewhat arbitrary analysis of the honest sailor's letter; they were the under-current.

Mrs. Dodd read part of it out to Julia; in fact all but the money-matter: that concerned the heads of the family more immediately; and Cash was a matter her daughter did not greatly stand, nor care about. And when Mrs. Dodd had read it with beaming eyes, and kissed it tenderly, and read it all over again to herself, and then put it into her bosom as naively as a milkmaid in love,

Edward's letter was short enough, and Mrs. Dodd allowed Julia to read it to her, which she did with panting breath, and glowing cheeks, and a running fire of comments.

"Dear Mamma, I hope you and Ju are quite well—"

"Ju," murmured Mrs. Dodd, plaintively.

"And that there is good news about papa coming home. As for me, I have plenty on my hands just now: all this term I have been' (training' scratched out, and another word put in: ter—oh, I know:) 'cramming.'"

"Cramming, love?"

"Yes, that is the Oxfordish for studying."

"For smalls."

Mrs. Dodd contrived to sigh interrogatively. Julia, who understood her every accent, remarked her that "smalls" was the new word for "little go."

"'—Cramming for smalls; and now I am in two races at Henley, and that rather puts the snaffle on reading and gooseberry pie' (Goodness me," said Julia to my chance of being plowed for smalls."

"What does it all mean?" inquired mamma, "gooseberry pie?' and 'the snaffle?' and 'plowed?'"

"Well, the gooseberry pie is really too deep for me: but plowed is the new Oxfordish for 'plucked.' O mamma, have you forgotten that? Plucked was vulgar, so now they are plowed."

"—For smalls; but I hope I shall not be, to vex you and pussa."

"Heaven forbid he should be so disgraced! But what has the cat to do with it?"

"Nothing on earth. Puss? that is me. How dare he? Did not forbid all these nicknames, and all this Oxfordish, by proclamation, last Long."

"Last Long?"

"Hem! last protracted vacation.

"—Dear mamma, sometimes I can not help being down in the mouth' (why it is a string of words) 'to think you have not got a son like Hardie.'"

At this unfortunate reflection it was Julia's turn to suffer. She deposited the letter in her lap, and fired up. "Now, have not I cause to hate, and scorn, and despise, le petit Hardie?"

"Julia!"

"I mean to dislike with propriety, and gently to abominate Mr. Edward Hardie."

"—Dear mamma, do come to Henley on the tenth, you and Ju. The university eights will be there, but the best boats of the Oxford and Cambridge river will; and the Oxford head boat is Exeter, you know; and I pull six."

"Then I am very sorry to hear it; my poor child will overtask his strength; and how unfair of the other young gentlemen; it seems unnecessary unreasonable."

"And I am entered for the sculls as well, and if you and 'the Impetuosity' (Vengeance!) 'were both there I should be safe, I do think I should be lucky this time. Henley is a long way from Barkington, but it is a pretty place; all the ladies have to say, and I want to see both the universities out and a stunning race—"

"Oh, well, there is a train, quite. One would think number was going to race lightning, instead of Oxford Cambridge.

"—If you can come, please write, and I will get you nice lodgings: I will not let you go to a noisy inn. Love to Julia and no end of kisses to my pretty cat.

"'From your affectionate Son,

"'EDWARD DODD.'

They wrote off a cordial assent, and reached Henley in time to see the dullest town in Europe; and also to see the river for about half an hour or two; so impetuously came both the universities pouring into it—in all known vehicles that could go their pace—by land and water.

CHAPTER I.

It was a bright hot day in June. Mrs. Dodd and Julia sat half reclining, side by side, in an open carriage, by the brink of the Thames at one of its loveliest bends.

About a furlong up stream the silvery stone bridge, just mellowed by time, spanned the river with many fair arches. Through these the coming river poured, sparkling a long way above, then came meandering and shining down, loitered cool and sombre under the dark vaults, then glistening away in a broad sheet of water where sat its two fairest visitors that day; but at that very point flung off its serpentine habits, and shot straight away in a direct line for Oxford, making water a mile long, down to an island in midstream; a little fairy island with old trees and a white house in the middle. And the fairy ise the broad current parted, and both silver streams turned purple in the shade of the grove; then united and melted from the sight.

This noble and rare passage of the silvery Thames was the Henley race-course. The starting-place was down at the island, and the goal was up at a point in the river below the bridge, and above the first bend. And all this was a broad sheet, unruffled by the racing, and enjoying luxuriously the glorious stream, the mellow bridge crowded with carriages, and fair open meadows stretched a broad band of bright color above the dark figures clustering on the battlements—and the green meadows opposite with the motley crowd streaming up and down.

Nor was that sense, which seems especially keen and delicate in women, left unsatisfied by the general bounty of the time. The green meadows on the opposite bank, and the gardens at the back of our fair friends, had the sweet fresh odors at their liquid benefactor gliding by; and the sun himself seemed to burn perfumes, and the air to scatter them, over the whole merry crowd, that bright, hot, smiling, airy day in June.

Thus tuned to gentle enjoyment, the fair mother and her lovely daughter leaned back in a delicious languor and reposed on the soft cushions, with unflagging, though demure, interest, and furtive curiosity, the wealth of youth, beauty, nature, agility, grace, and high training, that two great universities had poured out upon those obscure banks; all dressed in neat but overlighting clothes, on the hottest day of the season, or else in Jerseys, white or striped, and flannel trowsers, and straw-hats, or cloth caps of bright and various colors, and gayly chatting, laughing, chaffing, larking, and whirling stunted bludgeons at Aunt Sally.

But as for the sport itself they were there to see, the centre of all these bright accessories. "The Racing," as Julia called it, was not restand it nor try, nor care a hook-and-eye about it. But this mild dignified indifference to the main event received a shock at two p. m. when the first heat for the cup came on, and Edward was in it. So then racing became all in a moment a most interesting pastime, as pastimes should be. Loving. He left them to join his crew. And, soon after, the Exeter glided down the river before their eyes, with the beloved one rowing quietly in it. His Jersey revealed not only the working power of his arms, as sunburnt below the elbow as a ploughs, and as corded above as a blacksmith's, but also the play of the great muscles across his broad and deeply-indented chest; his oar entered the water smoothly, gripped it severely, then came out clean, and feathered clear and tunably on the rising recovery, the boat jumped, and then glided, at each neat, easy, powerful stroke.

"Oh, how beautiful and strong he is," cried Julia. "I had no idea."

Presently the competitor for this heat came down, the Cambridge boat, rowed by a fine crew in broad striped Jerseys. "Oh dear!" said Julia, "they are odious and strong in this boat too. I wish I was in it—with a grubby, but steady win, poor boy."

While rock-saver staircase to Honor being inaccessible, the race had to be decided by two unfeminine trifles called "Speed" and "Bottom."

Few things in this vale of tears are more worthy a pen of fire than an English boat-race is, as seen by the runners; and none else have ever seen one, or can paint one. But I, unhappy, have nothing to do with this race, except as it appeared to two ladies seated on the Henley side of the Thames, nearly opposite the winning-post. These fair novices then looked all down the river, and could just discern two black streaks on the water, one on each side the little fairy isle; and a great black patch on the Berkshire bank. The threatening streaks were the two crews: the black patch was about a hundred Cambridge and Oxford men, ready to run and hallo with the boats all the way, or at least till their puff or wind should be run plus hallooed out of their young bodies. Then less fleet and enduring, but equally clamorous, were the various Athenians, type of a shorter yell and run when the boats should come up to them. Of the natives and casual visitors, those, who were not nailed down by bounteous Fate, ebbed and flowed up and down the bank on their several sides, but always in the way as much as possible, and of getting knocked into the Thames as little as might be.

There was a long dreary suspense.

At last a puff of smoke issued from a pistol down at the island; two oars seemed to splash into the water (one with a white sleeve); and the black patch was moving; so were the threatening streaks. Presently was heard a faint, continuous, distant murmur, and the streaks began to get larger, and larger, and larger; and the eight splashing oars looked four instead of two.

Every head was turned down the river. Groups hung craning over it like nodding bulrushes.

Next the runners were swelled by the stragglers they picked up; so were their voices; and as came the splashing oars and roaring lungs.

Now the excitement in Jerseys became distinct. The oarsmen's heads and bodies came swinging back at every stroke, and you seemed to flash the water savagely, like a connected row of swords, and the spray spurted at each vicious stroke. "Now, Exeter, now, now, now!" "Go it Cambridge!" "Well pulled Oxford!" "You are gaining, hurrah!" "Well pulled Trinity!" "Now, Oxford!" "Now, Cambridge!" "Now is your time, Hardie, pick her up!" "Oh, well pulled, six!" "Well pulled, stroke!" "Up! Up! Put her a bit!" "Cambridge!" "Oxford!" "Hurrah!"

At this Julia turned red and pale by turns. "Oh, mamma!" said she, clasping her hand and coloring high, "would it be very wrong if I was to pray to God that he may win?"

Mrs. Dodd had a monitory finger; it was on her left hand; she raised it; and, that moment, as if the hand was a signal, the boats, fore-shortened no longer, shot out to treble the length they had looked hitherto, and came broadside and one palpitating body, the oblique rowers stretched like greyhounds in a chase, darting forward at each stroke so boldly, they seemed flying out of the boats, and surging back at every perbly, an eightfold human wave: their nostrils all open, the lips of some pale and glutinous; their veins distended, their grimly, livid eyes, their eyes all glowing, their supple bodies swelling, the muscles writhing beneath their Jerseys, and the sinews standing out on each bare brown arm; their little shrill coxswains shouting imperiously at the young giants, and working round and with them, like fiends at a finish; the oars and bodies flung whole into each magnificent effort; water foaming and flying, row-locks rigging, crowd running, tumbling, and howling like mad; and Cambridge a boat's nose ahead.

They had not long passed over the spectators, when Oxford put on a furious spurt, and got fully even with the leading boat. There was a broader coat of white paint on Exeter's oars, than Cambridge sparred desperately in turn, and stole those few feet back; and so they went fighting every inch of water. Bang! A cannon on the bank sent its smoke over both competitors; it dispersed in a moment, and the boats were seen pulling shoulder to shoulder, Cambridge with four oars, Oxford with six, as if that gun had winged them both.

The race was over.

But who had won our party could not see, and must wait to learn.

THE ARMY OF THE CUMBERLAND.

WE are indebted to an occasional correspondent, Mr. Barrows, of the Ninety-third Ohio, for the three pictures of the Army of the Cumberland, which we publish on page 213. Mr. Barrows writes:

"General M'Dowell M'Cook's head-quarters are situated 2½ miles south of Murfreesboro, a short distance from the Shelbyville turnpike. He occupies the mansion in which, a few months since, the owner, Mr. John Childress, resided. It is a commodious and tasteful building of the better class of Southern residences in this part of the country, as we see few and far between. It is built of the superior brick which the soil of this region affords. Mr. Childress, though a wealthy and influential man, never took a very prominent part in the rebellion, but he quietly acted and sympathized with the leaders of the Southern movement. He remained in quiet possession of his property during the reign of General Buell, and did not find it necessary to withdraw. But when the tide of war turned against the rebels again at Murfreesboro he gathered together his movable household property, including some thirty slaves, and fled in company with Bragg's retreating hosts, leaving his beautiful home to the tender mercies of the "Lincolnites."

The trunk-work, represented in sketch No. 3, and the stockade defended it, were built by General Mitchel. The former is now used as a footbridge—simply a plank for foot at present run farther south than Murfreesboro.

In the view of the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, "looking south," the hill on the right is just beyond our picket-lines.

OUR ARMY IN THE SOUTHWEST.

WE devote pages 209 and 212 to illustrations of our Army in the Southwest, from sketches by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis. On page 209 we publish an illustrated description of CUTTING AWAY THE HEAD OF THE CANAL.

The "mud machine" Sampson is seen-hind at work digging into the dam on the upper side. Its huge iron scoop is seen in the extension-arm, as it rises from the water, and descending the barrier which now keeps the Mississippi waters out of the bed of the canal. Below this machine is seen the "Father of Waters" himself has taken a hand in the game. This scene is depicted on page 209, under the title of

BREAK IN THE LEVEE.

Owing to heavy rains and the rapid rise of the Mississippi, the water upon Vicksburg and the head of the canal gave way, and the water poured in at a tremendous rate. The force of the current, however, did not last long, as the water filled much of the canal, but caused a crevasse on the western side, through which the water flowed in such profusion as to inundate the lower part of the peninsula to the depth of four or five feet. When the fracture occurred a number of soldiers were on the levee, and were thrown into the torrent; but were swam and scrambled out; but several of them would have been drowned but for the timely arrival of John C. Keller, one of the officers of the transport Scotland, who succeeded at great personal risk in placing them, one after more upon terra firma, much wetter if not wiser men.

The Times correspondent writes:

Night before last the men on the dam at the canal way under a pressure of ten feet of Mississippi, and in a few minutes Quitedear there was a mighty rush of boiling through in a manner that would do honor to a Brobdingnagian sluice-way. Unfortunately the water was dam that came pouring through did not come along the ditch—for most of the dam, by from a foot to two feet below, the consequence of which promises to be that, before the can can be completed, a number of feet must be taken off of which we can make no use. The dredging machine at work at the head of the canal, and there possibly it is of some use to the dredge. Two or three days will decide the matter, and then we shall know whether the time and talent of and long-worked-at canal will prove a failure or a success.

The Tribune correspondent, writing two days afterward, says:

Since the breaking of the dam of the canal, as I mentioned in my last letter, the water has been swollen through the rain which has been descending in torrents, until the lower part of the peninsula is inundated to the depth of from four to five feet. On this account the fields have been rendered impassable, and the Chicago has been ordered to Milliken's Bend, 10 miles above, where the planters say that the Mississippi has so yet made only a beginning of mowing.

The low familiar with the Mississippi says that the land above the canal will not be flooded, though the water rises to the height of 50 feet above low-water mark, or 40 feet under water. The dam at or near the mouth of Lake Providence is still standing, but a crevasse has been made in the embankment on the west side, which admits into the lake nearly as much water as flows through the canal. The water is supposed will run along inside of the levees constructed by the rebels, and thence into the swamps, which are lower than where our troops are, without flooding the land more deep than a few inches.

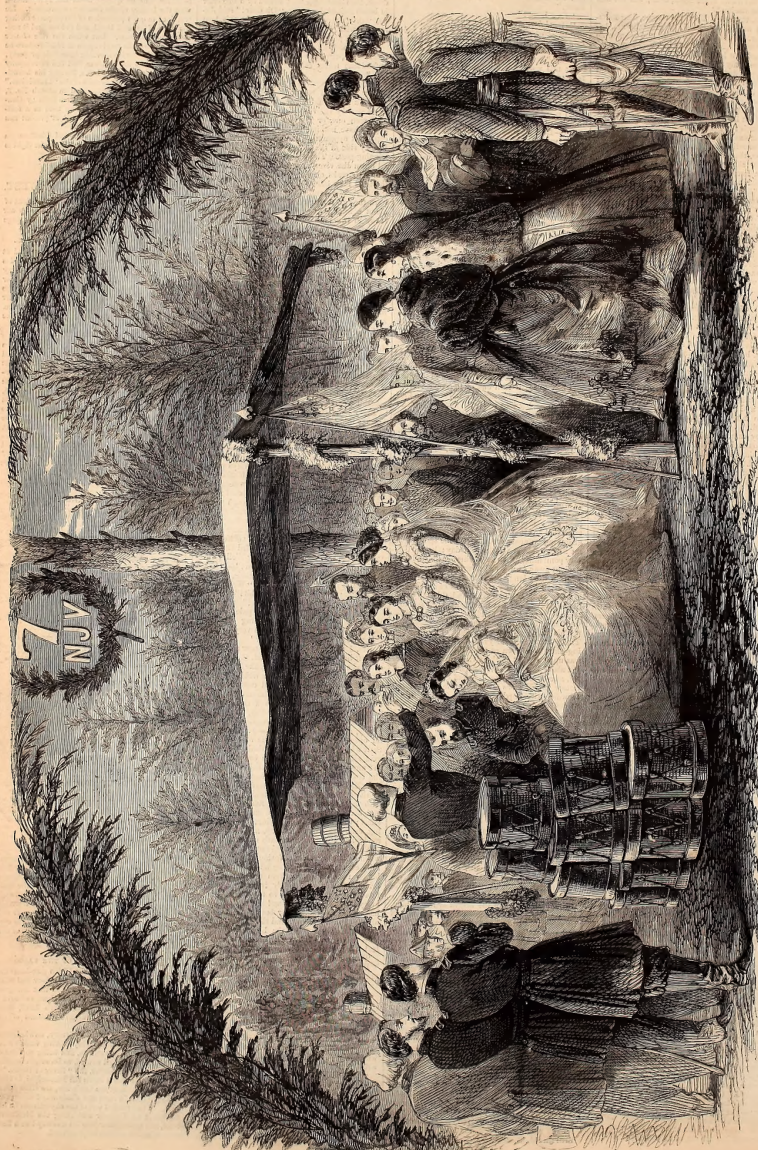
The canal itself is not likely to be injured by the departure of the water, but will require a thorough cleaning—being deepened and widened by the rush of the current. The old dam, it is thought, will be left as a protection of the soil inside of the levee, but about seven feet below the level of the river.

The break in the canal are not to be repaired, and no one can doubt ourselves to what the falling down here, as Fredericks, and the YAZOO PASS may result.

On page 212 we illustrate

WARRENTON FROM OUR BATTERIES.

Mr. Davis writes: "The town of Warrenton, ten miles below Vicksburg, is the farthest point up the river the rebel boats care to come at this time. It was after this place that the fight between the Indianola and the runs of the rebels occurred. In my sketch I give near the town the name Queen of the Hills, and below it Rebel. It will be seen by the sketch how easily the levee is converted into an 'earth-work' for the reception of batteries."



The sketch by our special artist of

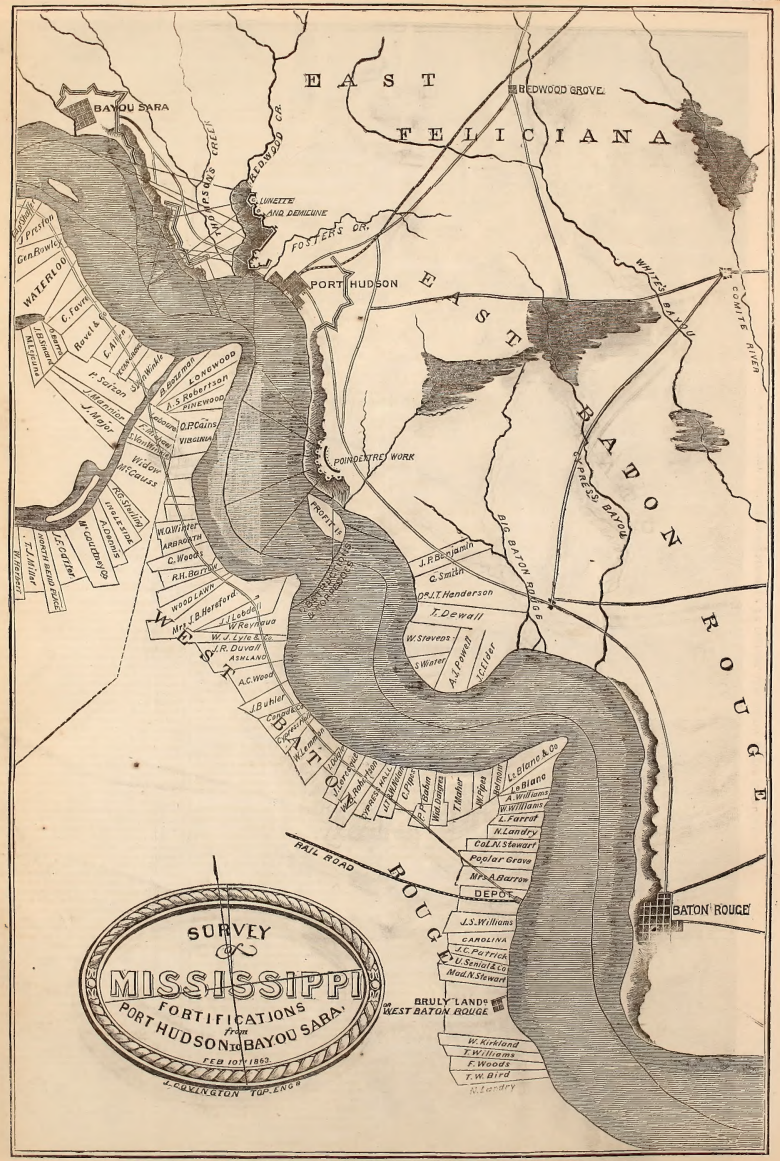
gives a representation of the scene that meets under Admiral Porter, guarding the river and waiting for the signals from the fleet that has gone through the YAZOO PASS below Helena, to begin a simultaneous attack upon Haines's Bluff, some twenty miles from the disembogument of the stream.

The YAZOO is a peculiar, dreary, unwholesome stream, its pale-green, sickly-looking waters having their origin in swamps, and being so fatal to health that it is well named, as its origin implies, in the aboriginal tongue, the "River of Death."



The sunset scenes down the Mississippi, in spite of the dreariness of the landscape, are often splendid—gorgeous in light and shadow and variegated tints. They remind one of the sky-glances he has witnessed in Tuscany and along the Mediterranean, and which either inspire or destroy like a flash of imagination into an inspired soul.

Suddenly there was a shock and stound all over the vessel, her progress was stopped, and a rocking vibration was felt every where. The quarter-deck was filled with blasts of steam, which obscured every thing. Sick people came rushing up out of their berths in strange undress; the steerage passengers—a motley and picturesque set of people, in many varieties of gay costume—took refuge on the quarter-deck, speaking loudly in all varieties of French and Italian patois. Ellinor stood up in silent wondering dismay. Was the Santa Lucia going down on the great deep, and Dixon unaided in his peril? Dr. Livingstone was by her side in a moment. She could scarcely see him for the vapor, nor hear him for the roar of the escaping steam.

"Do not be unnecessarily frightened," he repeated, a little louder. "Some accident has occurred to the engines. I will go and make instant inquiry, and come back to you as soon as I can. Trust to me."

He came back to where she sat trembling.

"A part of the engine is broken, through the carelessness of these Neapolitan engineers; they say we must make for the nearest port—return to Civita, in fact."

"But Elba is not many miles away," said Ellinor; "if this steam were but away you could see it still."

"And if we were landed there we might stay on the island for many days; no steamer touches there; but if we return to Civita we shall be in time for the Sunday boat."

"Oh, dear, dear!" said Ellinor. "To-day is the second—Sunday will be the fourth—the assizes begin on the seventh; how miserably unfortunate!"

"Yes," he said, "it is. And these things always appear so doubly unfortunate when they hinder our serving others. But it does not follow that because the assizes begin at Hellingford on the seventh that Dixon's trial will come on so soon. We may still get to Marseilles on Monday evening, on by diligence to Lyons; it will, it must, I fear, be Thursday, at the earliest, before we reach Paris—Thursday, the eighth—and I suppose you know of some exculpatory evidence that has to be hunted up?"

He added this unwillingly; for he saw that Ellinor was jealous of the secrecy she had hitherto maintained as to her reasons for believing Dixon innocent; but he could not help thinking that she, a gentle, timid woman, unaccustomed to action or business, would require some of the assistance which he would have been so thankful to give her; especially as this untoward accident would increase the press of time in which what was to be done would have to be done.

But no. Ellinor scarcely replied to his half-inquiry as to her reasons for hastening to England. She yielded to all his directions, agreed to his plans, but gave him none of her confidence, and he had to submit to this exclusion from sympathy in the exact causes of her anxiety.

Once more in the dreary sala, with the gaudy painted ceiling, the bare, dirty floor, the innumerable rattling doors and windows! Ellinor was submissive and patient in demeanor, because so sick and despairing at heart. Her maid was ten times as demonstrative of annoyance and disgust; she who had no particular reason for wanting to reach England, but who thought it became her dignity to make as though she had.

At length the weary time was over, and again they sailed past Elba and neared Marseilles. Now Ellinor began to feel how much assistance it was to her to have Dr. Livingstone for a "courier," as he had several times called himself.

He secured the earliest places in the diligence while Ellinor and the maid were only struggling through the douane, along with most of their fellow-passengers; he provided that a comfortable meal should be ready for them before starting; and placed them in the coupé, which he had secured for the long day-and-night journey, himself retiring to the "interieur." All through the traveling across France he occupied another compartment or another carriage to that in which Ellinor was placed; but he was always at their window if there was any stoppage, to learn their wishes and wants. The waters of the Rhone were out, and flooded the country through which the diligence had to pass, and caused a delay of two days. Ellinor seemed as one stupefied with repeated disappointments. At Paris he brought Ellinor a Galignani of two days old. He could not help looking over her shoulder as she searched its columns for some of the intelligence she craved. There was nothing to be learned from them; a bare announcement of Dixon's approaching trial for a murder committed sixteen years ago was all that was to be seen. Ellinor laid down the paper, and sighed.

"We shall be in England to-morrow," said he, with quick sympathy. "We can be in Hellingford the morning after to-morrow."

"Thank you; you are very good. But after I am in England I must go on alone. You must not think me ungrateful," continued she, with a faint effort at a smile on her pale face. "Some time I will tell you how glad I am you have come with me. I could not have done without your kind help, though I thought once I could. But just now I have no heart to express gratitude or any other feeling but one."

"But you say you once thought you could have done without my help on the journey, and yet you see I have really been of use to you—may it not be the same now?" asked he, anxiously.

"No," said she. "It was all plain sailing then, but now I must do all myself as well as I can; a terrible— You must trust me now to judge for myself, for I am aware of circumstances which— I can not go on talking about it, for you have been so kind to me I shall say something that I shall be sorry for afterward."

And with this he was obliged to be content.

Off again, to the coast of France, across the Channel to London, as fast as steam could carry them.

"Where now?" said the Canon, as they approached the London Bridge station.

"To the Great Western," said she; "Hellingford is on that line, I see. But, please, now we must part."

"Then I may not go with you to Hellingford? At any rate you will allow me to go with you to the railway station, and do my last office as courier in getting you your ticket and placing you in the carriage."

So they went together to the station, and learned that no train was leaving for Hellingford for two hours. There was nothing for it but to go to the hotel close by and pass away the time as best they could.

Ellinor called for her maid's accounts, and dismissed her. Some refreshment that the Canon had ordered was eaten, and the table cleared. He began walking up and down the room, his arms folded, his eyes cast down. Every now and then he looked at the clock on the mantle-piece. When that showed that it only wanted a quarter of an hour to the time appointed for the train to start, he came up to Ellinor, who sat leaning her head upon her hand, her hand resting on the table.

"Miss Wilkins," he began—and there was something peculiar in his tone which startled Ellinor—"I am sure you will not scruple to apply to me if in any possible way I can help you in this sad trouble of yours."

"No, indeed I won't!" said Ellinor, gratefully, and putting out her hand as a token. He took it and held it; she went on a little more hastily than before: "You know you were so good as to say you would go at once and see Miss Monro, and tell her all you know, and that I will write to her as soon as I can."

"May I not ask for one line?" he continued, still holding her hand.

"Certainly; so kind a friend as you shall hear all I can tell—that is, all I am at liberty to tell."

"A friend! Yes, I am a friend; and I will not urge any other claim just now. Perhaps—"

Ellinor could not affect to misunderstand him. His manner implied even more than his words.

"No!" she said, eagerly. "We are friends. That is it. I think we shall always be friends; though I will tell you now—something—this much—it is a sad secret. God help me! I am as guilty as poor Dixon, if, indeed, he is guilty; but he is innocent—indeed he is!"

"If he is no more guilty than you, I am sure he is! Let me be more than your friend, Ellinor—let me know all, and help you all that I can, with the right of an affianced husband."

"No, no!" said she, frightened both at what she had revealed, and his eager, warm, imploring manner. "That can never be. You do not know the disgrace that may be hanging over me."

"If that is all," said he, "I take my risk; if that is all, if you only fear that I may shrink from sharing any peril you may be exposed to."

"It is not peril; it is shame and obloquy," she murmured.

"Well! shame and obloquy. Perhaps, if I knew all, I could shield you from it."

"Don't, pray, speak any more about it now; if you do, I must say 'No.'"

She did not perceive the implied encouragement in these words; but he did, and they sufficed to make him patient. The time was up, and he could only render her his last services as courier, and none other but the necessary words at starting passed between them. But he went away from the station with a cheerful heart; while she, sitting alone and quiet, and at last approaching near to the place where so much was to be decided, felt sadder and sadder, heavier and heavier.

CHAPTER XVII.

All the intelligence Ellinor had gained since she had seen the Galignani in Paris had been from the waiter at the Great Western Hotel, who, after returning from a vain search for an unoccupied Times, had volunteered the information that there was an unusual demand for the paper because of Hellingford Assizes, and the trial there for murder that was going on.

There were no electric telegraphs in those days; at every station Ellinor put her head out and inquired if the murder trial at Hellingford was ended. Some porters told her one thing, some another, in their hurry: she felt that she could not rely on them.

"Drive to Mr. Johnson's, in the High Street—quick, quick. I will give you half a crown if you will go quick."

For, indeed, her endurance, her patience was strained almost to snapping; yet at Hellingford station, where doubtless they could have told her the truth, she dared not ask the question. It was past eight o'clock at night. In many houses in the little country town there were unusual lights and sounds. The inhabitants were showing their hospitality to such of the strangers brought by the Assizes who were lingering there, now that the business that had brought them was over. The judges had left the town that afternoon, to wind up the Circuit by the short list of a neighboring county town.

Mr. Johnson was entertaining a dinner-party of attorneys when he was summoned from dessert by the announcement of a "lady who wanted to speak to him immediate and particular."

He went into his study in not the best of tempers. There he found his client, Miss Wilkins, white and ghastly, standing by the fire-place, with her eyes fixed on the door.

"It is you, Miss Wilkins! I am very glad—"

"Dixon!" said she. It was all she could utter.

Mr. Johnson shook his head.

"Ah! that's a sad piece of business, and I'm afraid it has shortened your visit at Rome."

"Is he—?"

"Ay, I am afraid there's no doubt of his guilt. At any rate the jury found him guilty, and—"

"And!" repeated she, quickly, sitting down, the better to bear the words that she knew were coming.

"Is condemned to death!"

"When?"

"The Saturday but one after the judges left the town, I suppose—it's the usual time."

"Who tried him?"

"Judge Corbet; and for a new judge I must say I never knew one who got through his business so well. It was really as much as I could stand to hear him condemning the prisoner to death. Dixon was undoubtedly guilty, and he was as stubborn as could be—a sullen old fellow who would let no one help him through. I am sure I did my best for him, at Miss Monro's desire and for your sake. But he would furnish me with no particulars, help us to no evidence. I had the hardest work to keep him from confessing all before witnesses, who would have been bound to repeat it as evidence against him. Indeed I never thought he would have pleaded 'Not Guilty.' I think it was only with a desire to justify himself in the eyes of some old Hamley acquaintances. Good God, Miss Wilkins! what's the matter? You're not fainting!" He rang the bell till the rope remained in his hands. "Here, Esther! Jerry! Whoever you are, come quick! Miss Wilkins has fainted! Water! Wine! Tell Mrs. Johnson to come here directly!"

Mrs. Johnson, a kind, motherly woman, who had been excluded from the "gentleman's dinner-party," and had devoted her time to superintending the dinner her husband had ordered, came in answer to his call for assistance, and found Ellinor lying back in her chair white and senseless.

"Bessy, Miss Wilkins has fainted; she has had a long journey, and is in a fidget about Dixon, the old fellow who was sentenced to be hung for that murder, you know. I can't stop here; I must go back to those men. You bring her round, and see her to bed. The blue-room is empty since Horner left. She must stop here, and I'll see her in the morning. Take care of her, and keep her mind as easy as you can, will you, for she can do no good by fidgeting."

And knowing that he left Ellinor in good hands, and with plenty of assistance about her, he returned to his friends.

Ellinor came to herself before long.

"It was very foolish of me, but I could not help it," said she, apologetically.

"No; to be sure not, dear. Here, drink this; it is some of Mr. Johnson's best port-wine that he has sent out on purpose for you. Or would you rather have some white soup—or what? We have had every thing you could think of at dinner, and you've only to ask and have. And then you must go to bed, my dear—Mr. Johnson says you must; and there's a well-aired room, for Mr. Horner only left us this morning."

"I must see Mr. Johnson again, please."

"But indeed you must not. You must not worry your poor head with business now; and Johnson would only talk to you on business. No; go to bed and sleep soundly, and then you'll get up quite bright and strong, and fit to talk about business."

"I can not sleep—I can not rest till I have asked Mr. Johnson one or two more questions; indeed I can not," pleaded Ellinor.

Mrs. Johnson knew that her husband's orders on such occasions as the present were peremptory, and that she could come in for a good conjugal scolding if, after what he had said, she ventured to send for him again. Yet Ellinor looked so entreating and wistful that she could hardly find in her heart to refuse her. A bright thought struck her.

"Here is pen and paper, my dear. Could you not write down the questions you wanted to ask? and he'll just jot down the answers upon the same piece of paper. I'll send it in by Jerry. He has got friends to dinner with him, you see."

Ellinor yielded. She sat, resting her weary head on her hand, and wondering what were the questions which would have come so readily to her tongue could she have been face to face with him. As it was she only wrote this:

"How early can I see you to-morrow morning? Will you take all the necessary steps for my going to Dixon as soon as possible? Could I be admitted to him to-night?"

The penciled answers were:

"Eight o'clock. Yes. No."

"I suppose he knows best," said Ellinor, sighing as she read the last word. "But it seems wicked in me to be going to bed, and he so near in prison."

When she rose up and stood she felt the former dizziness return, and that reconciled her to seeking rest before she entered upon the duties which were becoming clearer before her now that she knew all, and was on the scene of action.

Mrs. Johnson brought her white-wine whey instead of the tea she had asked for; and perhaps it was owing to this that she slept so soundly. When she wakened the clear light of dawn was fully in the room. She could not remember where she was; for so many mornings she had wakened up in strange places that it took her several minutes before she could make out the geographical whereabouts of the heavy blue moreen curtains, the print of the lord-lieutenant of the county on the wall, and all the handsome ponderous mahogany furniture that stuffed up the room. As soon as full memory came into her mind she started up; nor did she go to bed again, although she saw by her watch on the dressing-table that it was not yet six o'clock. She dressed herself with the dainty completeness so habitual to her that it had become an unconscious habit, and then—the instinct was irrepressible—she put on her bonnet and shawl, and went down, past the servant on her knees cleaning the door-step, out into the fresh open air; and so she found her way down the High Street to Hellingford Castle, the building in which the courts of assize were held—the prison in which Dixon lay condemned to die. She almost knew she could not see him; yet it seemed like some amends to her conscience for having slept through so many hours of the night if she made the attempt. She went up to the porter's lodge, and asked the little girl sweeping out the place if she might see Abraham Dixon. The child stared at her, and ran into the house, bringing out her father, a great burly man, who had not yet donned either coat or waistcoat, and who, consequently, felt the morning air as rather nipping. To him Ellinor repeated her question.

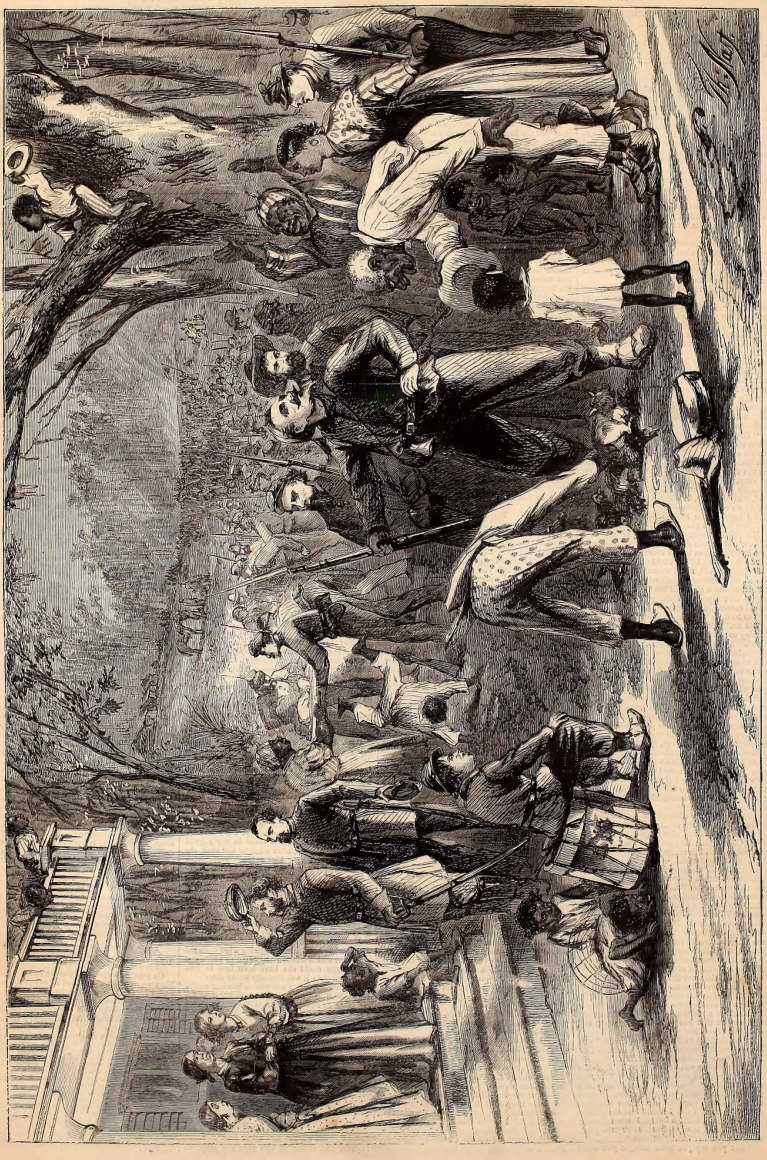
"Him as is to be hung come Saturday se'nnight? Why, ma'am, I've naught to do with it. You may go to the governor's house and try; but, if you'll excuse me, you'll have your walk for your pains. Them in the condemned cells is never seen by nobody without the sheriff's order. You may go up to the governor's house, and welcome; but they'll only tell you the same. Yon's the governor's house."

Ellinor fully believed the man, and yet she went on to the house indicated as if she still hoped that in her case there might be some exception to the rule, which she now remembered to have heard of before, in days when such a possible desire as to see a condemned prisoner was treated by her as a wish that some people might have, did have—people as far removed from her circle of circumstances as the inhabitants of the moon. Of course she met with the same reply, a little more abruptly given, as if every man was from his birth bound to know such an obvious regulation.

She went out past the porter, now fully clothed. He was sorry for her disappointment, but could not help saying, with a slight tone of exultation,

"Well, you see I was right, ma'am!"

A WEDDING IN CAMP.



We reproduce on page 216 a picture of Mr. Waud's, representing A Marriage in the Camp of the Seventh New Jersey Volunteers in the Army of the Potomac. Mr. Waud writes:

"An event to destroy the monotony of life in one of Hooker's old regiments. The camp was very prettily decorated, and being very trimly arranged among the pines, was just the camp a visitor would like to see. A little before noon the guests began to arrive in considerable numbers. Among them were Generals Hooker, Sickles, Carr, Mott, Hobart Ward, Revere, Bartlett, Birney, Berry, Colonel Dickinson, and other aids to General Hooker; Colonels Burling, Farnham, Egan, etc. Colonel Francine and Lieutenant-Colonel Price, of the Seventh, with the rest of the officers of that regiment, proceeded to make all welcome, and then the ceremony commenced. In a hollow square formed by the troops a canopy was erected, with an altar of drums, officers grouped on each side of this. On General Hooker's arrival the band played Hail to the Chief, and on the approach of the bridal party the Wedding March. It was rather cold, windy, and threatened snow, altogether tending to produce a slight pink tinge on the noses present; but the ladies bore it with courage, and looked, to the unaccustomed eyes of the soldiers, like real angels in their light clothing. To add to the dramatic force of the scene, the rest of the brigade and other troops were drawn up in line of battle not more than a mile away to repel an expected attack from Fredericksburg. Few persons are wedded under more romantic circumstances than Nellie Lammond and Captain De Hart. He could not get leave of absence, so she came down like a brave girl, and married him in camp. After the wedding was a dinner, a ball, fire-works, etc.; and on the whole it eclipsed entirely an opera at the Academy of Music in dramatic effect and reality."

IN DIXIE.

On page 220 we publish a picture, by Mr. Thomas Nast, representing the arrival of one of our regiments on a Southern plantation, and their reception by the ladies and negroes of the plantation. The picture explains itself. We append, however, a newspaper extract from an officer's letter in Dixie:

Heavy planters live all along the road, whose broad acres extend for miles, and whose aristocratic mansions show them to be the nabobs of the soil. Long rows of negro cabins are seen at short distances from the residence, indicating that the "institution" still flourishes here. These negroes, in large numbers, men, women, and children, come and evince the most comical and unsophisticated manifestations of delight at our appearance. The older ones bow, and grin, and scrape, and throw themselves into all sorts of the most ludicrous attitudes. The younger ones dance and frisk about in high glee. "Gora-mighty bless you, gemmen—may you live allers!" exclaimed a delighted old darkey as we passed yesterday. At the same time he bowed himself almost to the ground. These poor creatures are about all the friends we have in this region. They most willingly give all the information they have.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL ROBERT B. MITCHELL, COMMANDING AT NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL LEONARD F. ROSS, COMMANDING YAZOO EXPEDITION.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

BRIGADIER-GENERAL ROBERT B. MITCHELL.

GENERAL ROBERT B. MITCHELL, whose portrait we give on this page, is a native of Richland County, Ohio. At the age of nineteen he went to the Mexican war, a private in the Company of the present General George W. Morgan. He served twenty-seven months and reached the rank of First Lieutenant. After his return he completed his law studies with "Miller and Morgan," in Mount Vernon. During his practice in the adjoining counties he subsequently married a daughter of Hon. Henry St. John, of Tiffin.

In 1856 he went to KANSAS. His home is Mansfield, Linn County. In 1857 and 1858 he represented the Free State party of that county in the Legislature. In 1859, Governor Medary appointed him Treasurer of the Territory. In 1860 he was appointed Adjutant-General by Governor Robinson. At the breaking out of the rebellion he volunteered as a private, raised a Company, was elected its Captain, and afterward was unanimously elected Colonel of the "Kansas Second" by its officers. He led his regiment in the battle of Wilson's Creek, where he received four wounds, one of which proved almost fatal. His regiment here earned the title of the "Bloody Second."

As a compliment to him and his regiment, General Cameron ordered it to be mounted at a time when he was dismounting cavalry. For services at Wilson's Creek Colonel Mitchell was made a Brigadier. He was assigned to command the expedition to New Mexico, which, after the battle of Shiloh, had to be abandoned. He then embarked with a brigade from Leavenworth to reinforce General Halleck. Much of the time that he has been with Generals Halleck, Rosecrans, and Buell he has been commanding a division. He has been in many small engagements. He took an active and distinguished part in the battle of Perryville as commander of a division. He met John Morgan with his division at Lancaster, Kentucky, and drove him out after a severe engagement.

When General Rosecrans succeeded General Buell General Mitchell was placed in command of Nashville. The post, in labor and responsibility, is almost equal to a Department. General Mitchell is understood to have performed the varied and delicate duties of his position with so much diplomatic and military skill as to have elicited from General Rosecrans the highest praise and a most urgent recommendation of his promotion. The Union men of Nashville are unanimous in their admiration of his prompt and rigid method of dealing with the rebels.

GENERAL LEONARD F. ROSS.

WE publish on page 221 a portrait of GENERAL LEONARD F. ROSS, the commander of the Yazoo River Expedition, and append the following sketch of his life from the Herald:

Brigadier-General Leonard F. Ross, the military commander of the Yazoo River Expedition, is a native of Illinois, in which State he was born in the year 1823. He is, therefore, about forty years of age. He was a First Lieutenant of the Fourth Illinois Volunteers during the Mexican war, and commanded Company K during part of the term of that regiment's service, which lasted from July, 1846, to May, 1847. At the commencement of the present rebellion he resided at Lewiston, Fulton County; and when the call was made for three years' volunteers, he raised the Fourth District or Seventeenth Regiment of Illinois Volunteers, and was chosen the Colonel of the same, with a commission dating from May 20, 1861. The regiment was stationed at Peoria, Illinois, until the middle of June, 1861, when it was sent to Alton, on the Mississippi River. It garrisoned several points in Missouri successively, until about the beginning of December, when Colonel Ross was placed in command of the post at Cape Girardeau. It was about this time that General Grant prepared for his advance into Kentucky. In the following January Ross's command garrisoned Fort Holt, Kentucky, and formed part of the reconnoitring force to the rear of Columbus, Kentucky. During the siege and capture of Fort Donelson, from February 13 to 16, his regiment formed part of the Third Brigade (General Paine) of General M'Clernand's Division of General Grant's army. It also participated in the battle of Shiloh, where Colonel Ross gained some distinction, and his regiment lost, in killed, wounded, and missing, nearly 150 men. On the 25th of April, 1862, he was made a Brigadier-General of Volunteers, and during the siege of Corinth commanded the Third Brigade of General Judah's (formerly M'Clernand's) Division of General Grant's army. During the summer and fall of 1862 his brigade formed a portion of the force under General M'Clernand that guarded the Memphis and Charleston Railroad. When General Grant reorganized the Department of the Tennessee, on the 22d of December, 1862, General Ross was placed in command of the Eighth Division in the Sixteenth Army Corps, then under General Hurlbut. On the 8th of February he was transferred to the command of the Fifteenth Division of the same army, General J. E. Smith taking charge of the Eighth Division. His newly-appointed force was then stationed at Helena, of which post he was placed in command. From this position he was again removed to take charge of the Yazoo Pass Expedition, of which he is now the military commander.

SALE OF CONFISCATED BLOOD-HORSES AT NEW ORLEANS.

ON page 221 we present a very interesting sketch, by our New Orleans correspondent, of a scene that occurred there on the 3d March. It was on the occasion of the forced sale, by auction, of a large stock of blood-horses, once the property of Messrs. Kenner and Minor, now in rebellion against the Union. The seizure and confiscation of these horses was by an order issued by Major-General Butler, and afterward confirmed by Major-General Banks.

Messrs. Kenner and Minor were long celebrated for possessing some of the very finest blood-horses in the country. Many exhibited on this occasion were splendid animals, tracing back their pedigree through long generations, and with the blood of Lexington and other famous chargers coursing in their veins. It was painful to see horses worth two or three thousand dollars selling for only a few hundreds. The principal purchasers seemed to be agents for people in the North, and many a splendid bargain was made on this occasion.

The sale took place at the open space near French's stables, on Philippa Street. When the crowd assembled, largely sprinkled with gayly dressed officers, and the noble-looking animals were brought out one after another, to exhibit their action during the bidding, the scene was one well worthy of the pencil of a Rosa Bonheur.

IN HOSPITAL.

"YES, there's no use denying that we had rather a stormy time of it."

And Captain Ferdinand Lawrence stroked his mustache, and complacently handled the scabbard of his sword, as he spoke, with the air of a hero who has no objection to being properly appreciated.

Grace Bryan had listened to the whole of his circumstantial description with blue, dilated eyes fixed on his, curved lips, half apart, and a cheek where the color varied, as you have seen sun and shadow chase one another over slopes of blossoming grass. No wonder that the doughty Captain felt inwardly elated at the success of his eloquence. Had he at last struck the responsive key-note to this pale young beauty's nature? Was his long servitude of love at last to meet its exceeding great reward?

Oh, Captain Lawrence, Captain Lawrence! could you but have seen into the hidden mysteries of Grace Bryan's thoughts, what a crash there would be among the dazzling colonnades and airy pediments of your grand Chateau en Espagne! But love is blind, and so, unfortunately, is self-esteem.

"Captain Lawrence," said Grace, with her little hands nervously interlocked, and her serious eyes never moving from his face, "was there not a private in your company called John Harral?"

Captain Lawrence gave a quick, involuntary start, but recovered himself immediately, though with a heightened color on his dark cheek:

"Harral—Harral; yes, I believe there was."

"And can you tell me what has become of him?"

"Upon my word," said the Captain, with a little uneasy laugh that was decidedly at variance with the keen glance shooting from underneath his bent brows—"Private Harral is a lucky fellow to have inspired such an interest!"

"Can you tell me what has become of him?" repeated Grace, as calmly as if she had not heard the covert sneer.

"One don't keep the run of these privates," said Lawrence, carelessly; "but if Miss Grace really cares to know, why, of course, my poor services are at her disposal!"

He drew out a little memorandum book, neatly bound in black morocco, and leisurely turned over the leaves.

"Let me see—Gates—Hall—Hanna—oh, here it is! Harral, John—marked 'missing.' Just the sort of fellow to take particularly good care of his bones and sinews—deserted, I dare say. Oh, they will do it, Miss Grace. Hold on, though, here's another entry. Harral—killed in the action—buried on left side of creek—hum—m—m. Any thing else I can do for you, Miss Grace?"

But Grace did not answer; she did not even ask to see the treacherous "minutes" which might have revealed their own inconsistency. She sat like one stunned, with hands still folded, and eyes mechanically fastened on the winter sunshine that quivered along the opposite wall, while the blood slowly receded from her cheek, and the color from her lip.

"Gracious Heavens, she has fainted!" ejaculated the Captain, springing from his seat. Hallo here, somebody! Bring camphor, Cologne, any thing! Confound Private Harral!"

Are there any wounds so bitter that Time, whose gentle finger draws the mantle of velvet grass over new-made graves, and puts the chiaro-oscuro of many sunrises and sunsets between us and our griefs, can not heal them? Yes, there are some that bleed on silently, and mine life and heart away with their unseen gush—and such a one was hidden under Grace Bryan's sad smile and heavy eyes, always luminous with the melancholy shine of unshed tears.

"I assure you, Miss Grace, I consider it a very Quixotic piece of business," said Captain Lawrence, in accents of grave displeasure. "You'll do nobody any good, and only upset your own nerves. It's all nonsense, this idea of ladies visiting the hospitals—what can a woman who has been accustomed to shriek at the sight of a spider do in the midst of such dreadful scenes? My dear Mrs. Bryan, do persuade your daughter to abandon this absurd fancy!"

Mrs. Bryan looked helplessly from her daughter to the Captain, and then back again.

"Captain Lawrence is right," she said. "Consider, my love, what suffering you will be compelled to witness."

"Mamma," said Grace, firmly, "is it any worse for me to witness than for these brave fellows to endure? Oh, mamma, to think that we have been sitting at home in ease and luxury while the men who periled life and limb in our behalf lie perishing within a stone's-throw of our Aladdin palaces! Let me go, for it breaks my heart to remember how selfish I have been!"

Soft-natured Mrs. Bryan looked appealingly toward the Captain. He shrugged his shoulders.

"Well, if Miss Bryan chooses to be so foolish, I have, of course, no right to interfere. Only—"

"Don't trouble yourself to finish the sentence, Captain Lawrence," said Grace, quietly. "I need not say that I have not expected the honor of your attendance, nor do I ask for it now!"

She walked out of the room with the air of a young queen. Lawrence watched her with a glance in which vexation and admiration were curiously blended.

"The superb little vixen!" he muttered between his teeth. "What evil genius has put that hospital idea in her head? However, it can't make any difference; he must be dead long ago. Only I wish I could have dissuaded her, for if— Pooh!" he broke off suddenly, "there's no use bothering myself with such an exceedingly improbable supposition. I wonder what makes me love that girl better the more she sets me at defiance? Why can't I scorn her as she scorns me? It's a curious psychological puzzle, the ins and outs of that throbbing, passionate thing that we call a heart! By all the Powers! she shall be mine if I peril my own soul to win her."

The noonday sunshine lay brightly on the floor of the long barrack room, with its wooden ceiling, and range of narrow pallets on either side, and Grace Bryan felt a sick giddiness reeling through her brain as she saw the pale, ghastly faces outlined against pillows scarcely whiter than themselves—the shattered arms—the mangled limbs bound down to wooden stretchers—the expressionless faces whence life and light were drifting away into the shoreless tide, side by side with muscles all racked and contorted by fierce spasms of pain! This, then, was a hospital!

"My dearest, you are fainting!"

"No, mamma, I am not," said Grace, resolutely battling with the involuntary recoil of her whole physical nature. "Let us go on. I feel quite well now."

How the sunken eyes of the sick men brightened as the fair, slight figure bent above them with gentle words of pitying encouragement—what healthful remembrances of absent mother and sister love returned to them with the touch of her long, soft curls upon their burning foreheads—the cool contact of her hand against their fevered palms! And as she passed on, strength and courage came back, and the surgeon himself wondered at her nerve and calmness.

They had reached the last of the white beds, where an attenuated figure was supported among pillows, with an open book before him. Not reading, however. The heavy eyelids drooped above the hollow cheeks, as if slumber had weighed them down, and there was a sort of weary repose shadowed over the sharpened features.

"He is asleep, do not disturb him!" murmured Grace, under her breath.

"No, he is not asleep," said the surgeon; "and this is one of the cases on which I most pride myself. Just gone, when he was brought here—dreadfully wounded at Fredericksburg, but he's in a fair way to recover now, thanks to our new system. Come a little nearer—he'll be glad to see you!"

The heavy lashes were slowly lifted at the sound of their footsteps, disclosing dark, grave eyes full of the strange mystery that only comes to those who have stood on Death's threshold and seen the flow of the dark, dark river!

"Harral! what's the matter! Speak to me!" exclaimed the surgeon, in dire perplexity. "A glass of wine, Johnson, quick! he's swooning again."

Where were your eyes, good Esculapius, to imagine that John Harral could swoon with those fluttering fingers in his own, those blue eyes pouring tides of eager light into his uplifted heart? Your Pharmacopœia knows no such remedies as these!

"I knew you would come, Grace. I knew you would not leave me all alone!" he murmured, with the passive bliss of a child who wakes from hideous dreams to find his face against his mother's bosom.

For Grace Bryan had laid her cheek on his pillow and breathed one whisper into his ear—a whisper that was like the pulsing of magnetic life through his veins.

"Tell me once more that you love me! Let me hear it over and over, dearest!" he said, with closed eyes. "Ah, I shall soon be well now!"

It was not until they were in the open air, safe beyond the hospital ward, that Grace Bryan fulfilled the Captain's prediction, and fainted.

"Of course; didn't I tell you it would be so?" triumphantly exclaimed Captain Lawrence, twisting the fingers of his buckskin glove round and round. "A woman can't help fainting in such a place."

"It was not from foolish terror, nor shrinking tremors," said Grace, meeting his exultant eye with the serene glance that disarmed its fire at once.

"No; what then?"

"From great happiness—the happiness of meeting one whom I have mourned for as dead."

"Mourned for as dead?" vaguely repeated the Captain.

"I have seen John Harral this day."

"Oh!" said Captain Lawrence, after a moment's blank silence, during which the ticking of his watch sounded like a thousand trip-hammers, and his face turned a dull yellow. "Indeed! Pardon me, but I've just recollected—good-morning—hope to see you again."

And so Captain Ferdinand Lawrence walked off the stage of Grace Bryan's existence.

Need we describe how Miss Grace transformed herself into nurse, physician, and consulting faculty to a hospital consisting of one patient? And how she found it an even more "interesting case" than the honest ward surgeon had done? If our readers want any more explicit details they must ask Mrs. Harral.

Just Tribute to Merit.

AT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, LONDON, JULY, 1862.

Duryeas' Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners, the acquisition of all prominent manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Prepared Corn Flour" of this and other countries notwithstanding. The food and luxury of the age, without a single fault. Our brief will explain its merits. Sold by Grocers, Druggists, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without bin-glue, with few or no eggs, at a cost absolutely the most economical. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. A little boiled in milk will produce rich Cream for coffee, chocolate, tea, &c. Put up in 1 pound packages, under the trade mark "Maizena," with directions. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Manufactured at Glen Cove, Long-Island.

Wholesale Depot, 166 Fulton Street.

The Diaphragm Filter,

With additional improvements, has been awarded two Gold and three Silver Medals by the American Institute and Institutes and by the Massachusetts Mechanics' Charitable Association. The well season and the low state of the New Reservoir make the Croton Water very unclean. Price $4.

The DIAPHRAGM FILTER, manufactured by ALEX. ANDER SMITH & SON, 345 4th Street, New York, is the kind of Pressure Filter to which I alluded in my recent report to the Croton Board. I consider the plain cotton stone which constitutes the filtering medium to be an excellent article for the purpose. The fountain is simple, durable, and requires to be removed occasionally to insure its action. JAMES R. CHILTON, M.D., Chemist.

$10 positively needs this $1. Something urgently needed by every person. Very light and portable. Agents wanted. Call or send for a sample and how to make $10 per day. 10 cents, that retail for $1, by

ONE OF MANY CASES.

2d Corporal Leiter at 194 Canal Street, New York:

J. J. C. Cook, publisher of the Saint Lawrence Standard, Potsdam, Vt., says: he was attacked with DYSPEPSIA, and suffered so severely from it, that not a particle of food could be swallowed without occasioning the most unendurable sensation in his stomach. For five years he suffered from this dreadful complaint, when he used BRANDRETH'S PILLS. The first dose did not seem to benefit him much, but the second produced a change, and by the time he had taken six boxes, a COMPLETE CURE was effected. He says: "My dyspepsia was gone, and my expectation of an early death vanished."

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being reluse manufactures sent to the country because unsalable at home, and used here only for packaging and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AS ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Ancres and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

OUR COUNTRY'S DEAD.

Nor those who sleep beneath the sod,
To meet us here no more;
We kissed the very path they trod
Unto a holier shore.
Still smiling, as we said,
"These dear ones are not dead."
Nor even lost, but only gone before."

Here, by our side, the dead we meet!
Our dead—their presence pulls
Upon us, as their lagging feet
Tread where the sunlight falls.
Honor our call in vain,
They answer not again—
Death has closed up their ears to Freedom's calls.

When rings the clarion voice of War—
War against truth and right;
When Treason triumphs over law,
These dead rise in our sight,
And fix their ghastly eyes
Where Parricide our land
As if their very glance her stars should blight!

You can not speak of liberty
But they will cringe, and sigh,
And wonder if they'll ever see
Such days as have gone by.
They plant for future years
Myrtads of gloomy fears,
And love to count how thick the crop will be!

Away with them! Bury these dead!
They but defile our land:
Away with them! and in their stead
Bid loyal freemen stand!
Look up—look up on high!
See victory draw nigh!
Know that your country's freedom is at hand!

THE CONFEDERATE LOAN IN EUROPE.

THE rebel agents, it seems, have succeeded in persuading some speculative bankers in Europe to undertake the negotiation of a Confederate loan of $15,000,000. The money is wanted to pay for the steamers which English men are building for the Emperor of Europe, and any sacrifice would be cheerfully undergone to procure it. It is called a "cotton loan." The bonds covenant that the Confederate States will pay to the holder, in twenty years from date, the sum of money expressed in the bond, or, if the holder prefers, will deliver to him, at a point within the Confederate States, at any time between the date of the bond and the expiration of six months after the conclusion of peace, a quantity of raw cotton equivalent to the value of the bond, estimating the cotton at 54d. per pound.

The British journals give prominence, in connection with this loan, to the house of Erlanger, of Paris and Frankfort, and wish to have it understood that it is a continental enterprise. As, however, the cotton is to be valued and shipped, and the coupons are to be paid in the same money, the real operators in the affair must be Englishmen. The London Times, which has uniformly decried our securities, and called upon the crown lawyers to prosecute any one who tried to negotiate a loan for the United States, comes out warmly in favor of the rebel bonds, and has already puffed them to a premium.

Well, we don't know that we have any right to complain. If we can stand the fitting out of rebel privateers in England, we can also endure the negotiation of rebel loans in the same country. It is not precisely what we expected. But life is full of similar disappointments. There are a good many English capitalists who are investing money in our stocks; and we suppose the single small publishers of Great Britain will contend that strict neutrality requires us to wait for other capitalists, with Southern proclivities, to invest their means in "cotton bonds." For the sake of that latter, it will be a pity if the Southern guerillas burn up all the cotton at the South; and it will be a still greater pity if Jeff Davis should repeat for their benefit the repudiation he so successfully practiced in the case of Mississippi. But this is not our business.

If we are to ourselves, and, in the homely language of the President, "keep our pegging on" at the work of suppressing the rebellion, the adventurous speculators who have taken these bonds will by-and-by find that their debtor has ceased to exist. The season for active operations has already commenced; and if our generals and admirals are as prompt and as lucky as they were at this time last year, the foreign loan of $15,000,000 to the rebels will prove of no more substantial use to them than the Alabama or the Florida.

LORD LYONS'S DISPATCH.

A MOST curious and important dispatch from Lord Lyons to Earl Russell, dated Washington, November 17, 1862, has been published in the British papers and is reproduced here. In this dispatch Lord Lyons states that on his arrival at New York from Europe, on 8th November ult., he was waited upon by "the Conservative leaders," who were exulting in the triumphs achieved by the Democratic party at the elections in Ohio, Indiana, Pennsylvania, and New York; that "foreign mediation" was the thought uppermost in their minds; that they dreaded its coming too soon, as "a premature proposal of foreign intervention would afford the radical party a means of reviving the violent war spirit, and of thus defeating the peaceful plans of the conservatives;" that the success of such a proposal required that "it should be deferred till the control of the Executive Government should be in the hands of the Conservatives;" that the Conservative leaders so talked as to lead Lord Lyons to perceive that they "desired to put an end to the war, even at the risk of losing the United States altogether;" that their aim was "an armistice to be followed by a convention;" that "the more sagacious members of the party are aware that the probable consequence even of an armistice would be the establishment of Southern independence;" but that they deem it "wiser to agree to a measure which is inevitable and not hopeless war;" that "if their own party were in power, they would be disposed to accept an offer of mediation.....and would desire that the offer should come from the Great Powers of Europe conjointly."

These astounding statements will be read with amazement and indignation. They will thrill thousands who voted the Democratic tickets in New York, Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. Whatever may be the views of the Democratic or Conservative leaders, who made such haste to parade their country's agony before a foreign embassador, the masses of the Northern people, Democratic or Radical, Conservative or Republican, most certainly have never entertained any desire for foreign intervention, but on the contrary, from first to last, at every and all times, have most strenuously and unequivocally protested against foreign interference, and averred their intention to resist it at all hazards.

Nor is there the slightest degree of ground for stating that the party which triumphed at the recent elections has ever expressed or entertained a desire for the termination of the war by the division of the country; on the contrary, it is notorious that throughout the States where the Democracy are dominant the people have willing hearts, and are ready hands, for the most the prosecution of the war, at any and all costs, by every lawful and available method, until the rebellion is finally crushed.

To state, as Lord Lyons has done, that the Democratic party would, on obtaining the control of the Government, welcome foreign intervention as a means of reviving the war spirit, during the independence of the South, is a libel so gross that his lordship owes it to himself to let the public know the names of the "Conservative leaders" who so basely traduced their fellow-countrymen.

That there is, in this city, a nest of malignant Copperheads, who have no other notion of patriotism than the reptile to which they owe the sobriquet they bear; men who would sell out America independence for the price of a pound of cotton, or the profit on a shipment of wooden buttons and bowie-knives to South Carolina—whose principles are sordid as their views are base, and corrupted as their hearts—we have long since informed us. He, too, was taken in and crammed by these pretended Democratic leaders: deceived by their smooth talk, and fascinated by their Champagne and turtle, he allowed himself to be so thoroughly humbugged by them that his letters informing the Times here would be worse than waste paper, and ridiculously with the accounts of the bombardment of Sumter. That the same clique should have been equally successful with Lord Lyons, and the minister who succeeded Russell is no wonder; but is it possible that so astute a diplomatist as Lord Lyons can be similarly humbugged? Are we to suppose that the real leaders of the Democracy are the men who will control the executive if the Democrats carry the election in 1864, diametrically tell these Englishmen that they were for the ruin of the United States, and in favor of a foreign commission to divide our estate?

If the reports respecting conversations, or the "Conservative leaders" will have a difficult account to render to the public.

THE LOUNGER.

ABOUT GENTLEMEN.

"WITH the Lounger college a friend, whenever it will come conveniently, by sending a check for $100, to procure an English novels, magazines, and better cut of sweepers than most when they use the word gentlemen. There are obviously several grades in their estimation. What is the highest, according to our received understanding in country 'good society' in England?

"May we not, without the least loss of self-respect, allow that there is an ideal of the gentleman in England that we do not see in America? Are there not in Europe artists, so to speak, accomplished in the minor social benevolences and graces, whom we, with the best opportunity that the country affords in such accomplishment, can not rival? And do not such social artists establish a standard type, a school of more nearness, of which there are innumerable imitators? Is not this the evident attempt to succeed in the style required of those who would assume the useless English title of gentleman in this city?

"'Gentleman,' as a mere statement of family descent, etc., is not intended in these inquiries. Yet the question arises, would any man with a very strong and unmistrollable individuality of character pass muster as a gentleman of the finest type in English society—as, for instance, an irrepressibly humorous man, an exceedingly egotistic, or an extremely vehement man, allowing that every where there are unquestionable exaggerations of all these types? Does a good, simple-hearted, well-bred, and carefully-nurtured English girl of the better sort of the quiet middle-class ever feel quite satisfied that a Frenchman or other foreigner is a perfect gentleman? And is there not an incurable confusion of ideas which leads an Englishman to suppose that one who has not the technical style can not have the essential qualities of a gentleman? He takes it for granted that every honest man wishes to be a gentleman, and that, if he does not confess to the external fashion, which is the easiest part of it, he is not and does not care to be so. Hence, when in observing he meets men who disregard this external standard, he sets them down for upstarts, adventurers, and nondescripts.

"The accounts to the writer, at least, for certain experiences of Englishmen traveling in this country, which are confidence to our American could have encountered. Does the Lounger's experience confirm this? Has the Lounger seen Englishmen who has been in Washington since the war commenced who did not evidently mean to say, 'Mr. Lincoln is not even a gentleman?' meaning simply, 'Mr. Lincoln may be an honest sort of man in a crude way, and perhaps even with some eccentric talent, but without common grace, or he would certainly have learned to conform to the standard of the gentleman.'

"As custom establishes the meaning of words, and as the definition given by modern English literature and opinion is the test of gentlemanly standard in manners and in character, may we not freely admit that, in this sense, the President is not a gentleman, and yet be proud of his position? In fact, the Lounger hesitates, his prejudice notwithstanding? If we admit that his stories sometimes drop in the mouth of a gentleman, the answer would not put them, must we be ashamed of it? It would be a very good thing to have a gentleman for our ruler, because of a person of gentlemanly habits. But may we not say that 'polish' is not of the last importance just here and now?

"A CORN-HILL HOER."

The note of our correspondent touches the subject of a very pretilies discussion which is suggested by Trollope's "North America" book, and the talk of certain persons in "society." As Mr. Russell informs us, he fell, upon his arrival in this country, into certain circles which had much to say of the vulgarity of the rail-splitter. Yet doubtless all the persons in such circles were partisans of Mr. Buchanan, who represented England in London, and who betrayed his country. That is to say, they could consider a man "gentlemanly" who in his private intercourse was unctuous, but in his discharge of supreme public trusts was false. Doubtless, also, the same persons considered the Marquis of Hartington "a gentleman," and the young officer who approved him "ungentlemanly." It is clear that in such minds there is no accurate standard whatever by the name of what is gentle or socially gentlemanly.

There is no doubt, as our correspondent suggests, that there is a gentlemanly manner in society which the English novel and current opinion mentions as a man to determine if he be a gentleman; and, in that sense, the President is not a gentleman. But the different organization of our society plays the most ludicrous pranks with this standard. Where the social position and hereditary wealth are united the standard becomes and remains tolerably fixed. We have there a class combining the qualities by such a standard is futile. There is a polish and ease of manner known as gentlemanly because persons of certain habits of life and fortune often have it. But it is precisely the quality which sharpers most easily imitate. The criticism of this social directed upon the President, of which Russell and Trollope speak, was itself a proof of the want of what is truly gentlemanly upon the part of those who uttered it. For the very essence of a gentleman, in any large and noble sense, is that he instinctively emphasizes between essentials and which is the eternal fact, and manner, which is the most transitory of appearances. Gentlemanliness, like every other quality, has a kernel and a shell. The nut may be sound and sweet in every particle, however rough the envelope, as it may be dusty fruit and rotten, however smooth and pretty the skin.

The sting of social satire is its exposure of this discrepancy. The moment we strip off the shell and wipes away the paint, and reveals the haggard, horrid features. He pulls out the false teeth; he searches of the false hair. In terse and telling phrasing, and shows the decrepit, lame, shriveling reality. He sits at the feast as Socrates sat at the banquet of Agathon, and by philosophic analysis forces upon a lovely guest. The character whom we second, but under his glance she wavered and changed; and, changed and changed; and, slipping to the floor, glided away, a loathsome serpent.

But in this country of no Socrates, and in a high place. Since "gentlemen" of fine manners have plunged us into this fearful war by the most corrupt political schemes, and during the year has swarmed with technical "gentlemen" and "ladies," and a society composed of such was the very last place to distinguish between manners and nobility. The historian of the war will do his work very imperfectly if he does not reveal the influence of that kind of social blandishment upon our troubles. For the power of manners, however subordinate, is not to be denied. And the historian of the war will equally fail if he does not count it among our signal good fortunes that when the very fundamentals of society are to be tried by fire, the chief magistrate and representative man of the people was truly a representative, even to exaggeration, of those qualities which are American as distinguished from European.

FROM A DIARY.

THIS morning Dash met Blank at Mallard's, where he was taking a cup of chocolate. Blank asked him if he had joined the United Club.

"I have not," said Dash; "may I ask you by such a question?" rejoined Dash.

"Insult!"

"Why, yes. Do you think a gentleman wishes to belong to a club which refuses to expel a traitor, even if it does not actually receive his money in dues? Is there no self-respect left?"

"Oh," said Blank, quickly, "you are speaking of the affair at the corner of Twenty-first Street and Avenue?"

"Of course," replied Dash.

"Well, my dear boy, you are behind the age. That is the Dimmion Club."

I lately dined in company with one of those inane young gentlemen who, as Theodore Winthrop says in "Cecil Dreeme," grace slavery and think they are aristocratic. The young gentleman went on for some time, when Mrs. —— said to him, pitifully,

"If you sympathize with the rebels, why don't you go and join them?"

"I, Madame! I assure you I am perfectly loyal."

"Indeed?"

"Why, certainly, only I stand by the Administration, not by the Administration."

"So Vallendigham says."

"I mean I am no Abolitionist."

"So Brooks says."

"That is, I am not one who is alienating the South."

"So Tom Seymour says."

"In other words, I am a Union man, but I don't think war can restore it."

"So Toucey says."

"In fact, my dear Madame, the war is unconstitutionally carried on."

"So George Tickner Curtis says."

"I mean that our liberties are in danger."

"So Fernando Wood says."

"Well, but isn't the war fratricidal?"

"So Ben Wood says."

"Come, then, he's hopeless?"

"So the London Times says."

"Yes, my dear Madame, but what on earth do you say?"

"I say that whoever stands against the Administration in the war stands against the Government. I say that whoever says he is no Abolitionist means that he intends to embrace the war. I say that whoever is afraid of alienating the South is afraid of irritating a snake that has already stung him to death. I say that whoever thinks that force can not restore the Union does not know that Union is the most irresistible instinct of the American people. I say that whoever thinks that the constitutionality or rebellion is in danger of being split by the tempest in which he is trying to split his hair. I say that those are not the critics are inspired by the Government and not by the Southern, wrote and prays for the success of the rebellion and the annihilation of all civil liberty and order. I say that whoever calls the war fratricidal has no more conception of national unity than those leaders are said to have of honesty. I say that whoever considers the cause of the United States hopeless has not cause in his heart, and is utterly ignorant of the character of the people and of the facts of the situation. That is what I say, Madame; that is what every truly American man and woman says and believes."

The young gentleman made no reply. But the next day, at the Club, he said to a friend, "I dined yesterday at Mrs. ——'s, and she had an awful Abolitionist to it."

——tells me that the other day he was coming to Rochester from Lockport upon the railroad, and was presently attracted by the sound of a warm debate between two persons near him. The whole car became deeply interested and attentive. The debate was upon the necessary policy and ethics of the war. It was upon the point to be replaced about the sovereign rights of States and the decentralization by the Government. The debate was this:

"The fact is, that I approve of slavery, and I hope to see the day when it will be introduced throughout the United States. That is the only way in which I can develope free trade in the matter. I have lived at the South, and I admire Southern society. It is a mere mistake to suppose that there is any restriction of free speech. A gentleman may say any thing he chooses. I have heard all kinds of sentiments expressed there. I am entirely in favor of slavery. The slaves are better off than the workingmen of the North. If I am not mistaken, the line is not very far distant when the prejudice against slavery will disappear."

—— says that he heard this curtain to the end, and before the debate was interrupted. Eagle, who had told him a tale of his Southern travel, he immediately took part in the conversation.

"You say," said he, that you like slavery; that it seems to you a proper and desirable system of society; and that you believe the prejudice against it will disappear. Of course no man of sense would stop to argue such proposition with you. Slavery is due for its fall in this country. It has plunged into a civil war, and it is already drowning in the blood it has shed. But you said also that it is a mere mistake to suppose that there is any restriction of free speech in the slave region. Now, Sir, my name is Eagle, and I live in Buffalo. I am a Democrat, and a friend of mine, Mr. Eagle, for whose perfect veracity I vouch. He was residing in Memphis in the autumn of 1859. He was sitting in a car, as you are now. He was surrounded by Southerners, as you are by Northerners. The conversation fell upon politics, and he naturally and quite calmly expressed his views. He said that slavery ought to be restricted as it was then, and that it was a pity that it ought to go every where in the country. He said that he thought slavery a wrong, just as you say that you think it right. The whole earful of passengers became immediately excited, and shouted, 'Lynch him—a Black Republican.' They said he had no business in the South. They got hotter and hotter, and at length resolved to stop the train and hang him on the spot. He was in a terrible track; and it was with great difficulty that a few more sensible men succeeded in rescuing him. He was rescued, but he said he was attacked and suspected man until he got beyond the border. You sit here in a free State of liberty, and say that you prefer slavery, and our only emotion is that of amusement and disgust. But the single emotion of the two cars shows exactly the difference between the civilization of Free and Slave States. It is better, when a man says, 'I love liberty,' there is a thrill of fear. In the former, when a man says, 'I love slavery,' there is a smile of contempt."

—— says that the face of Copperhead turned blue, but he made no reply.

A POOR "ARTICLE" OF REBEL.

THE most pitiful and mean of all rebels are those who have escaped from the rebel section to the North, and devote their time and tongues to the abuse of the Government whose protection they have sought. The inexorable despotism of the rebel away, the enormous prices of living, the certainty of rebel conscription have driven them away. They reach a city where they can say just what they please, where the aspect of life and the means of living are all that a little afraid as possible by the bloody attempt of a faction to overthrow the Government, and they openly express their delight in every disaster that befalls that Government, and at every success of the rebellion from whose dominion they have run away.

They denounce the unconstitutional acts of the Government, while the rebellion in which they delight is a stupendous act of destruction of the whole Constitution.

They declaim against the restriction of liberty of speech while their tongues are entirely unbridled: and under the dominion of their beloved rebellion, if they dared to indulge a corresponding freedom of talk, they would be incontinently silenced.

They scold at the danger to the liberties of the citizen from the Government; but when they are reminded of the reign of terror in Texas, of the inconceivable horrors which have pursued the Union men at the South, they declare that it is not the act of the rebel authorities. When, then, they are asked what kind of government it is which does not repress such atrocities at any cost, they shift the question, and reply that where there are slaves it is not safe to let people say what they will, which gives a charming foretaste of the delights of a government based upon "the system of involuntary servitude" as its chief corner-stone.

They declare that if the Government had let them alone there would have been no trouble, which is equally true of all other public offenders who resist the laws. They seem to think that they should have been allowed to steal forts, territory, and public improvements without the least notice upon the part of the Government which owned them, while no man in the country is suffered to steal so much as a watch with impunity. And with incredible and amusing stupidity some of them seem honestly to think it strange that a great, sovereign, imperial Government would not suffer itself to be snuffed out like a tallow dip.

These gentry who have not had the courage to stay at home and maintain with arms the cause which they affect to consider so just and holy, are the most contemptible phenomena of the rebellion. They congregate with our own indigenous Copperheads, and hiss at the Government to which they owe the security of their lives and rights, and the protection of all the property which has not been consumed by the relentless despotism for the success of which they so ardently pray.

A WORD ABOUT CONNECTICUT.

The interest in the Connecticut election is not merely a State and local interest; it is national, because at this time any election which proceeds upon the ground of supporting or opposing the war is an expression of opinion upon a national question. Yet it is to be borne in mind that no orator in Connecticut, not even Mr. Thomas H. Seymour himself, nor Toucey, nor Fernando Wood, has dared to pronounce for disunion. That is a policy which Vallandigham, the chief of Copperheads, eschews now, although three years ago he openly favored a dissolution of the Union into four or more parts. And no observer should forget that the majority in Connecticut has always been very small either way. Therefore, while the result of the election is interesting, it is not of that supreme importance which has been attached to it. For it is not the State of Connecticut declaring for war or peace. It is only the decision of the voters who are left in the State whether they wish to try to embarrass and paralyze the national Government in its endeavor to maintain the national existence. The great mass of the voters of that State who are in the field are unreservedly national Unionists. Let every man remember, then, that if the sense of all the legal voters was to be expressed at this election Connecticut would show herself exactly as loyal as every other loyal State. If by the result of the election she shall seem to waver, nobody will know more certainly than the seeming victors that they win because thousands and thousands of faithful citizen soldiers are away. "I appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober," said the old philosopher to the king. And the heart of every true American Unionist, in case of Mr. Seymour's election, will at once appeal from Connecticut deprived of the votes of her patriot sons in arms to Connecticut with all her citizens at home and voting.

THE OPERA.

Medori's Norma is the finest rendering of that character we have ever had in this country, except that of Grisi, who created the part. And it is the more pleasant because it is entirely unheralded. M. Maretzek arrived with his company, and with much less than the usual preliminary trumpeting they appeared—and they conquered. The spirit, the unanimity, the dramatic power and co-operation, are such as we have never seen at the Academy. The opera of "Norma" is often languid and ineffective in the representation, for the tenor usually slurs Pollio, and the basso's Oroveso is unimportant, and Adelgisa is subordinate. But, with true artistic instinct, Mazzoleni made Pollio, and Biachi Oroveso, and Madame Sulzer Adelgisa, what they ought to be; and the representation was a great and deserved success.

This is the more interesting because neither the voices nor the singers are especially magnetic. Medori's voice is full, but it has a marked tremolo, and its tone is more clear than sweet. But she is a truly noble lyrical artist, and her mien and action are of the largest and finest school. There was not a look or a posture or a movement that was not queenly. She looks all the Druidess, and her bursts of passionate emotion were of that intensity and fury which belong to the conception of the wild British forest. It was Boadicea that we saw; and the amplitude of the singer's person merely deepens the impression. There have been finer voices, in certain qualities, and more elaborate vocalization than Medori's upon the same stage, but no Prima Donna whatever—not even Grisi, for the most part, when she was here—has so prevailed by pure dramatic power.

Mazzoleni is worthy to sing with her. His organ is not of the elegiac sweetness of Brignoli's, but it is fervent and powerful; and he throws himself so fully into his part, and acts and moves with such spirit and grace, that he compels admiration and applause. Madame Sulzer sings with the same spirit; her voice is excellent, with some fine contralto notes, and her vocalization finished and true. She often divided the honors of her scenes with Medori. And Biachi completes the quartette with a most effective bass, a striking presence, and dramatic talent.

Medori is undertaking other of the grand lyrical parts. Norma was to be followed by Semiramide. Let us hope that M. Maretzek will not forget how long it is since we have had a really satisfactory presentation of "Lucrezia."

CONNECTICUT IN LOUISIANA.

Several of the Connecticut regiments in the field have already spoken to their fellow-citizens at home. The Twelfth Regiment, now in Louisiana, has added its voice, and one of its bravest officers, speaking by the consent and with the enthusiastic approval of his fellow-officers, including the old line Democrats, writes as follows:

"If the rest of the army is like the Twelfth Connecticut—and I believe it is not far different—the President need not make a disgraceful peace."

This is the universal sentiment of all the Connecticut voters who will not vote at this election; and their number will vastly surpass any majority which may be cast against the Government of the country.

THE TIME OF DAY.

Some two years ago the Lounger described a most interesting visit he had made to the factory of the American Watch Company at Waltham. He has lately been there again with increased wonder and delight. The works have been enlarged and the machinery carried to a yet finer perfection; while his own private experience of the quality of the American watch has confirmed all that he then said. And at a time when the war for American nationality engages and engrosses the profoundest interest of all loyal citizens, there is the greatest satisfaction in knowing that the minutes and days and weeks and years of that war are told by an American watch in your pocket. The beauty, the precision, the greater cheapness, the uniform excellence of a watch constructed by machinery so exquisite that the mere spectacle of its operation is poetic, gradually give the American watches a public preference which will not be deceived. The Lounger again, and with the emphasis of practical experience, commends this masterly manufacture to the attention of all his friends who wish to keep time with the onward march of American skill, and enterprise, and success. And if they are not willing to take his word for it, let them step into the pleasant office at No. 182 Broadway, and ask Messrs. Robbins and Appleton what they think upon the subject.

"SYLVIA'S LOVERS."

The dedication of Mrs. Gaskell's last novel, "Sylvia's Lovers," just issued by the Harpers, is an illustration of the earnest sympathy with which so many of the most intelligent and influential persons in England regard our war. Mr. Norton, known in our literature by his little book of the ripest scholarship, "Travel and Study in Italy," is also known less publicly as one of the most faithful and devoted leaders and workers in every form of patriotic and national effort in Massachusetts. Mrs. Gaskell properly names him among her many American friends in her dedication, which is as follows:

"This book is dedicated to all my Northern friends with the truest sympathy of an English woman, and in an especial manner to my dear friend, Charles Eliot Norton, and to his wife, who, although personally unknown to me, is yet dear to me for his sake."

LOYALTY.

When Mr. Fernando Wood tells us that he is not a loyal man, he might have spared his breath, for no one ever supposed he was. But when he says that there is no such thing as loyalty in a republic, he is sufficiently answered by the hundreds of thousands of American citizens who stand in arms from the Chesapeake to the Mississippi, and who are inspired and united by one sentiment only, and that is unswerving loyalty to the Government which their fathers made, which they have inherited, and which, by the grace of God and their good right arms, they mean to maintain.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

Economy.—How to make pantaloons last: make the coat and vest first.

What kind of men are most above-board?—Why, chessmen, of course.

While Rabelais lay on his death-bed he could not help jesting at his very last moment; for having received the extreme unction, a friend, coming in to see him, said he hoped he was prepared for the next world. "Yes, yes," answered Rabelais, "I am ready for my journey now; they have just greased my boots."

A French gentleman, who had heard rum called spirits, went into one of our hotels a few evenings since, and called for a glass of punch, requesting at the same time that it should be made with "ghosts from the Vest Indies."

The Four Seasons.—Schoolmaster: "Come here, boy, and tell me the names of the four seasons." Young Prodigy: "Pepper, mus'ard, salt, and vinegar; them's what mother seasons with."

A man who squinted, but was unaware of his infirmity, had his portrait taken by Nicholson, and, on being invited to inspect the performance, said, with rather a disappointed air, "I don't know—it seems to me—does it squint?" "Squint!" replied Nicholson, "no more than you do." "Really, well, you know best, of course; but I declare I fancied there was a queer look about it!"

"Bill, you young scamp, if you had your due, you'd get a good whipping." "I know it, daddy, but bills are not always paid when due." The agonized father trembled lest his hopeful son should be suddenly snatched from him.

A poor widow's little boy wanted a slate at school, but she couldn't afford to buy him one. The next day, seeing one in his hands, she inquired, in some surprise, "Why, Tommy, dear, where did you get that slate?" "I heard you say, when papa died," he replied, "that now he has gone we must look above when we wanted any thing, so I went up and got this slate off the roof. I wish I had a frame for it."

The individual who attempted to raise colts from horse-chestnuts went into the market the other day, and inquired for a mock-turtle to make "mock-turtle soup" of.

A New Dance.—"Shall I have the pleasure of your company for the next set?" asked a not very well educated young gentleman of a pretty young lady at a ball. "What is to be the dance, Sir?" "Ditto," said the young man, referring to his programme. "Oh, you must excuse me, then," said the young lady; "I can't dance that."

Monsieur Thouvenel, the French minister, expressing his surprise at the Japanese eating raw fish, received from the first embassador for reply, "We eat raw fish as you eat raw oysters."

A thrifty wife wonders why the men can't manage to do something useful. Might they not as well amuse themselves in smoking hams as smoking cigars?

Wanted to Know.—If a man who did not know what to do ever got a job?—and if a bald-headed man can be said to be hair-brained?

She that marries a man because he is a "good match," must not be surprised if he turns out "a Lucifer."

"What are you doing?" said a father to his son, who was tinkering on an old watch. "Improving my time," was the rejoinder.

Many schoolmasters entertain no doubt that the tree of knowledge is the birch.

Advice is like snow—the softer it falls the longer it remains and the deeper it sinks.

Some men are like musical glasses; to produce their finest tones you must keep them wet.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

Why are there no horses in the Isle of Wight?
Because the inhabitants prefer cows (Cowes) to ride (Ryde).

Why is a blush like a little girl?
Because it becomes a woman.

A man bought two fishes, but on taking them home found he had got three. How was this?
He had two, and one smelt.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

ADMIRAL FARRAGUT PASSES PORT HUDSON.

The daring attempt of Admiral Farragut to pass the rebel batteries at Port Hudson, on the Mississippi, was completely successful. The Hartford (flag-ship) and the Albatross were the only two vessels that succeeded in running the gauntlet. The firing is described as having been most terrific and continuous. The Richmond made vigorous efforts to go by the batteries; but after firing for over an hour was disabled, and had to withdraw. The loss of the Mississippi by fire is fully confirmed.

General Banks is said to have co-operated with a land force, but doesn't seem to have achieved any thing. At last accounts he was at Baton Rouge again.

THE LAST OF THE "INDIANOLA."

A dispatch has been received by Secretary Welles from Admiral Farragut dated below Warrenton, Mississippi, March 19, in which he says that about ten miles above Grand Gulf he saw the wreck of the Indianola on the right bank of the river. She was partially submerged and her upper works were very much shattered by the explosion.

THE VICKSBURG BLOCKADE.

An attempt to run by the rebel batteries at Vicksburg was made by the Union rams Lancaster and Switzerland on 25th ult. without success. According to a dispatch, dated at Cairo 31st, as soon as they came within range the rebels opened a tremendous fire. The Lancaster was struck thirty times. Her entire bow was shot away, causing her to sink immediately. All the crew except two escaped. The Switzerland was disabled by a 64-pound ball penetrating the steam drum. She floated down, the batteries still firing and striking her repeatedly, until finally the Albatross ran alongside and towed her to the lower mouth of the canal. While coming up the river the Hartford and Albatross encountered a battery at Grand Gulf more formidable than those at Port Hudson. The Hartford was struck fourteen times, and had three men killed. Both vessels returned the fire vigorously, and both were more or less injured.

GENERAL SHERMAN RETURNS.

The expedition under General Sherman, to the rear of Haines's Bluff, by way of Steele's Bayou and the Sunflower, has returned to Young's Point. There is nothing definite from the Yazoo Pass expedition under General Ross and General Quimby.

THE REBEL INVASION OF KENTUCKY.

A dispatch from Cincinnati says that the rebel raid in Kentucky has proved a failure.

SKIRMISH AT WILLIAMSBURG.

A dispatch from Fortress Monroe states that the rebels, with a force of infantry and cavalry, on 28th ult., attacked Williamsburg and were repulsed by the Fifth Pennsylvania cavalry under Colonel Lewis. The loss is not reported.

THE MONITORS AT CHARLESTON.

On the morning of the 25th ult. all the Monitors (six in number) left Hilton Head for Charleston, together with several wooden gun-boats and half a dozen schooners. The Ericsson had just arrived there with a floating nondescript in tow, called "The Devil." Its purpose is understood to be to clear channels of torpedoes and other obstructions.

GENERAL BURNSIDE IN OHIO.

General Burnside has assumed command of the Department of Ohio, and has issued his order announcing the fact, which is declared most satisfactory. Indiana is made a separate military district, under General Carrington, who reports to General Burnside.

REBEL PRIVATEERS.

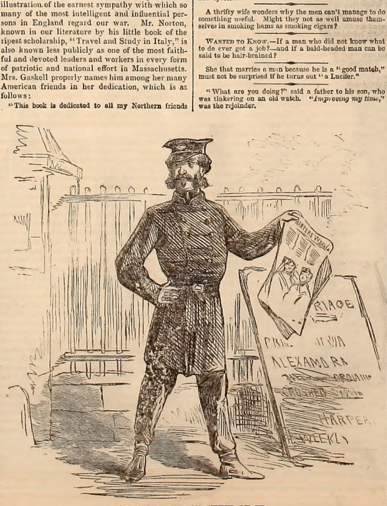
The rebel privateers continue their depredations. The Alabama burned on February 21 the splendid ship Golden Eagle, of New York, bound for Queenstown, Ireland, with guano, and destroyed on the same day the bark Olive Jane, of Boston, bound from Bordeaux to New York with a rich cargo of wines and fruits. The captain of the British bark Crusoe, from St. Thomas March 17, reports that the English screw steamers Pet, from England, and Arius, which had previously landed a cargo of cotton in Porto Rico from Mobile, both sailed on the 16th for a port in the South. The British frigate Phaeton sailed in company with them as a convoy.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

EARL RUSSELL SNEERS AT THE PROCLAMATION.

Earl Russell, speaking of the Emancipation Proclamation, says: "There seems to be no declaration of a principle adverse to slavery in this Proclamation. It is a measure of war, and a measure of war of a very questionable kind. As President Lincoln has twice appealed to the judgment of mankind in his Proclamation, I venture to say I do not think it can or ought to satisfy the friends of abolition, who look for total and impartial freedom for the slave, and not for vengeance on the slave-owner."



SLAUGHTER AT THE PRINCE'S WEDDING.

The Prince of Wales and his wife remain at Osborne, on the Isle of Wight. During the illuminations in London some seven persons lost their lives, and over one hundred others had limbs broken. The crowd was unruly, and the confusion very great.

POLAND.

THE REVOLUTION.

We have copious details of the progress of the Polish insurrection, and its gradual assumption of the character of a great European question. A portion of the revolutionary troops encountered the Russians at Sosnowitz, but were routed after a sanguinary engagement. Some of the retreating soldiers of Langiewitz were driven on to Prussian territory. On the other hand, the Poles had defeated a body of Russians near Myszozowa, killing over one hundred of them. Langiewitz held a good position and was prepared for a great engagement at the latest dates. Garibaldi had written him a letter of sympathy, in which he held out a promise of active personal assistance. This the Dictator of Poland declined. General Dembinski had published a letter in Paris, in which he classes every man—Kossuth, Ladislas, or else—who seeks to stir up the Hungarians against Austria at the present moment as an enemy of Poland. Meanwhile the Cabinets and people of England, France, Austria, and Prussia were very much agitated and alarmed by the situation of affairs in Poland. Lord Palmerston declined to state his opinion to a deputation in favor of the Poles; but the London journals seem to indicate a non-intervention policy for England. Paris was full of rumors, and it was even said that Napoleon and Austria had determined to restore the nationality of Poland, even at the cost of a war with Russia and Prussia.

A PROFESSIONAL VIEW OF IT.

New York Policeman (off duty).—"Just to think of it! Seven lives lost at the Prince of Wales's wedding! That comes of living in a place where there ain't no Broadway Squad!"

THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.—[See next Page.]

QUEEN VICTORIA AND THE PRINCESS BEATRICE.

THE WEDDING OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

WE devote a very large proportion of our space this week to illustrations of the Marriage of the Prince of Wales, which took place on 10th ult., and was the great event of the day in Europe. It is so short a time since the Prince was among us here that we are sure our fair readers will be glad to see him again—in "counterfeit presentment"—with his fair young bride. On page 236 we illustrate the PRINCESS ALEXANDRA ALIGHTING FROM THE RAILWAY CAR, looking very pretty and girlish; on page 228 we give four portraits of THE HAPPY COUPLE; on this page a portrait of QUEEN VICTORIA, with the PRINCESS BEATRICE in her arms; and on pages 232 and 233 a fine illustration of THE MARRIAGE IN St. George's Chapel at Windsor. The following narrative we condense from the graphic account of the London Times:

ST. GEORGE'S CHAPEL.

Simple, lofty, and cold, it is difficult to light up the nave of St. George's. But the difficulty was overcome yesterday by hung and rotten as rich and bright that from the windows half-way up the fluted pillars the effect was like that produced by a piece of gorgeous tapestry, or by a grand Oriental carpeting hung on the wall. The nave served as the channel and embankment of the stream which swept from the outer hall to the Chapel laden with all the pageantry of the great spectacle, and, returning thence, rolled back as the over noon, leaving the Prince and his bride on the swelling crest of all its pomp.

In the archway leading into the nave a heavy drapery of purple silk, patterned with gold, screened the interior of the temporary hall where the guests of the Queen were received, and Her Majesty's great officers and royal household assembled to form in order of procession. Through rifts and openings now and then in the veil could be seen clouds of drapery and waving plumes, and glimpses could be caught of the apartments where the wedding party rested for a while before the principal procession was formed. On the pavement a red and black carpet, with a broad cream-colored border, embroidered with the Prince's cipher and crest in alternate compartments on one side, and with the Princess's on the other, was laid from the entrance to the steps leading into the Chapel. The seven lofty columns which divide the aisles from the body broke the monotonous lines of seats covered with scarlet and yellow-fringed cloth, which rose the above tier from the narrowed fronts between the columns high up the walls beyond.

HERALDS, USHERS, AND CHORISTERS.

At 10½ o'clock the Dean of Christ Church is the first to enter the choir, but apparently only to look about him, for he does not then venture on a seat, all of which still remain only occupied by their glistening copies of the programme, bound in white silk and stamped with gold. A gorgeous group of heralds are the next comers, Lancaster and Windsor, Norroy and Gloucester, walking stiffly in their magnificent but most uncomfortable tabards, which, as they can only be worn when the Sovereign is present at State ceremonies, must have been laid by till now for a very long time. They have a serious aspect as they stalk about in these unpainly habits, looking for all the world as if some of the banners and coats of arms of the old knights around had been endowed with life, and were strolling about the floor. To them soon come a number of Gentlemen Ushers, stiff with bullion and edged about with gold, who assemble round Mr. Spencer Ponsonby, receive their last instructions, and study a carte du pays of the choir, choosing them their own places and, what is still more important, every body else's. Now and then a Guardsman in full uniform, a Silver Stick, or Gentleman-at-Arms enters for a moment to look about him, but no one stays, though it is 10½, and the knave, as can be heard from the hum of conversation, must be nearly full or filling fast. The Queen's private band begin to muster in their gallery, from which immediately issue sounds of instruments being tuned and tuned, and otherwise exasperated into a succession of the most doleful discords, varied occasionally by a tap on the drum, as if the performances were about to commence forthwith.

Madame Goldschmidt, formerly Jenny Lind, looks into the choir for a single minute, and then ascends to her place among the other ladies who are to sing the hymn of praise on this great day.

ARRIVAL OF THE NOBILITY.

At last the Marchioness of Abercorn enters, and seats herself in a stall of a Knight of the Garter, next to that over which her husband's banner floats. She is in court costume, but wearing no train, and with a magnificent circlet of diamonds round her head. As if they had been waiting for this example to start, and for some one to break the stately solitude of the shrine, many ladies follow the Marchioness quickly.

All are in full court dress, with the exception that they went no trains, and all, without exception, are dressed in velvet or satin, either of lilac, mauve, or violet color, the latter being the prevailing tone. All, too, wear feathers and diamonds in their hair, and some show tiaras of brilliants almost large enough to form head-dresses, so completely do the glittering jewels cover the head like a regal crown.

Almost the first male visitor to put in an appearance is Sir George Grey, who comes accompanied by Lady Grey. They take their places on the left, and are quickly followed by Lord and Lady Stanley, and a host of other males and official personages.

All the gentlemen are in full official uniform, and wear the chief insignia of whatever orders they have the honor to possess, collars and badges in the fullest state. No bridal favors are worn on such an occasion of state dress; but, as a kind of amende for this necessary omission, where the colors of the orders of knighthood are displayed they are in every case looped at the shoulders with bows of white satin ribbon, which answers the purpose equally well. Now that the choir is almost full, the predominance of mauve and violet colors is more marked than ever—in fact, few other tints are shown, except when ladies who fear the cold keep their white burnooses, which all without exception have, still wrapped about their shoulders. The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress are among the late arrivals. His lordship wears his robes of state, which, without being over gaudy, make a rich addition even to the mass of uniforms and gorgeous dresses around.

THE KNIGHTS OF THE GARTER.

It is quarter to twelve, and there is a short hush of expectation—one of those periods of unaccountable silence which always fall at intervals even upon the most crowded and animated assemblies. The Usher of the Black Rod, Sir Augustus Clifford, enters, and then there is another pause, that is quickly broken by a loud hum of admiration in the nave, which the more stately and select gathering in the choir only notice by increased rigidity of uprightness till the cause of the murmur is made known by the appearance at the entrance of the Knights of the Garter, all robed and jeweled in their almost regal costume, and headed by the Premier himself. They make a noble and a gallant show as they sweep up the choir like a procession of monarchs, with their long velvet mantles of imperial blue, looped at the shoulders with white ribbon, trailing after them. Lord Palmerston proceeds at once to his stall on the left, where he is joined by Lady Palmerston; and the others, after waiting for a single second in a stately group, pass also to their seats. The Premier was, of course, the most observed of all, as he stepped up lightly into his seat, and looked round him with a brisk joviality, as if about to quell a troublesome member, or evade, by a most voluminous reply, an awkward question. The Duke of Newcastle, Earl Granville, Earl Clarendon, and Earl Russell are the most noticed of the rest, and the latter when once he sits in his wide, high, ample stall, is almost lost to view.

After all the knights are seated the Lord Chancellor, in his state robes and carrying the Great Seal, passes slow and stately up the choir—alone, but a perfect pageant in himself—to his seat at the head of all.

THE QUEEN.

Suddenly there is just a perceptible movement—a kind of consciousness that something has occurred which tells at once that the Queen is either coming or has come, and all eyes are quietly directed toward the quaint old pew in the wall. In another instant the Queen herself appears, accompanied by his Royal Highness the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, the brother of the late Prince, and, as we all know, so like him as to make the resemblance almost startling as he stands by the side of Her Majesty. The Queen wears the simplest and plainest of widow's weeds—a widow's cap, a black silk dress, with white collar and cuffs, and black gloves. The only colors which appear upon her are the star of the Order of the Garter, and its blue ribbon, narrowed to the width Her Majesty usually wears across her left shoulder. She looks well in health, but thinner and older, with the permanent traces of deep grief and care stamped on every lineament of her features.

She stands at the window of the royal pew, a little withdrawn from general gaze, and only to be seen at all by those on the opposite side of the choir glancing quietly into the interior, while the Duke of Saxe-Coburg speaks, and apparently explains to her the arrangements going on below for the great ceremony which has drawn her forth from her mourning and seclusion. After a few minutes, she seats herself a little away from the window, and the Duke retires.

THE ROYAL FAMILY.

Officers of the household, pursuivants, and heralds lead the way as before, halting and making a double line below the dais, while the Princess Mary, of Cambridge, her magnificent train borne by Lady Edith Somerset, moves up the choir with the most stately grace. At the dais her attendant pauses, and she turns to gather her train over her arm, and, moving to the centre, makes a profound courtesy to her Majesty, then passes at once to her place on the north of the altar, in front of and just beneath those treasures of iron-work, the gates of Quintin Matsys. As she passes in the Duchess of Cambridge follows, with like state and ceremony, and then the Princess Beatrice, Princess Louise, and Princess Helena ascend in turn, followed by the Princes Arthur and Leopold, the latter in Highland dresses of the Royal tartan. All bow and courtesy deeply to the Queen, and the Princess Helena, who wears a train, gathers hers on her arm like the rest, and seats herself near the Duchess of Cambridge. The next is the Princess Alice, wearing a noble coronet of brilliants, who pays the same deep reverence to her mother as all the rest; then the Princess Royal, looking as young, as amiable, and as timid as when, with slow steps, she herself was led to the altar at the Chapel Royal, but this time leading by the hand a fine little boy, who, all unawed by the stately pomp around, dragged on his mother's arm, as he looked behind him at the pageant, and with difficulty brought his little feet to surmount the three steps of the haut pas. All have risen as they enter, and the Queen now rises too, and bows to her daughter with a kind and winning smile—the first that has passed across her face since she entered the chapel. Beethoven's noble march has been played as they filed in, but, as may be guessed, its strains, though beautifully rendered, are but little attended to in such a scene as this. The Queen has evidently found an object which more deeply interests her, and instead of seating herself again she remains at the closet-window, watching her royal children as they pass one after another to their seats beneath, and even when they are seated she leans over the front and remains gazing down at them steadily with an expression of fond pride which is unmistakable, and in which no trace of grief can be discovered now.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

Again the cheers come louder and more sustained than ever from the outside; again there is the same pause, broken by the trumpets and rattling kettle-drums in the Nave, and this time all save the Queen herself rise and remain standing respectfully; for it is the bridegroom that approaches. Great officers precede him, but they are little heeded; all eyes are turned upon the Prince of Wales, who, in his uniform of General, but wearing over all the insignia and purple mantle of a Knight of the Garter, comes slowly up the Choir, partly accompanied, partly followed by his brother-in-law, the Prince of Prussia, and his uncle, the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, similarly robed. The Wedding March is played as they move up with stately ease, and the Queen rises and comes fully forward as the haut pas is reached, and the three ascend and turn in line toward her, bowing deeply. The Duke of Saxe-Coburg and the Prince of Prussia retire to the south side of the altar, and the bridegroom, after kneeling a few seconds in prayer, rises and stands "the rose and expectancy of this fair State," in the centre of the haut pas, alone, with his face toward the Queen.

Such an occasion is one in which few men appear to advantage; yet the Prince gains by passing through it. With the easy grace that seems natural to all his actions he stood alone, the watched and observed of all observers, neither bashful nor confident, but with a manly royal bearing that became his illustrious birth and exalted station. He looked round upon the splendid scene for a moment quietly and easily, and his every movement, his look, his very bearing, seemed in their vivid likeness to his royal father to amaze and impress all—even those who, by their rank and station, might be supposed to be the most familiar with his features. As the sound of cheering was heard without, marking the coming of his youthful bride, he kept turning his head every moment; for from where he stood, in the centre of the altar, he could see through the screen and down the nave beyond to where the crimson curtains would hide the marshaling of the bride's procession. Often and often did he glance this way, but the curtains were motionless, and gave no sign of the coming forth of her whom all now watched for with such eager expectation that the suspense even of the slight delay seemed almost painful. Still he stood alone, and, though evidently keenly anxious for the coming of his young bride, he bore eager scrutiny of all with a quiet ease that was charming.

THE BRIDE.

At last, with a great clangor of trumpets, which at first are muffled into a rich indistinctness behind the curtains, the long-looked-for procession of the bride enters, and the Prince, giving one look to satisfy himself of the fact of the arrival, keeps his eyes fixed upon the Queen, and never turns his head again till his affianced stands beside him.

The hush was now so deep and breathless that even the restless glitter of the jewels that twinkled every where seemed almost to break it, and, despite the stately etiquette which had hitherto regulated every word and gesture, all now bent far and eagerly forward, as the hum and rustle in the nave beyond showed the young bride to be drawing near. In another minute she had entered, and stood,

> "In gloss of satin and glimmer of pearls, > Queen lily and rose in one,"

the fairest and almost the youngest of all her lovely train that bloomed in fair array behind her. Though not agitated, she appeared nervous, and the soft, delicate bloom of color, which ordinarily imparts a look of joyous happiness to her expressive features, had all but disappeared, as, with head bent down, but glancing her eyes occasionally from side to side, she moved slowly up toward the altar. The programme tells us that she was supported on the right by her royal father, Prince Christian, of Denmark, and on her left by the Duke of Cambridge; and the same dry but most authentic document leads us to believe that both were in full uniform, and wore the collars and badges of their respective orders of knighthood. But without wishing at all to derogate from the importance of these illustrious personages, we may say that any one else might have safely borne their part, so deep, so all-absorbing was the interest with which the bride, and bride alone, was watched. From the way her features are now shaded by the veil and her looks bent forward, it is difficult to see her features more fully; but as she nears the altar she drops her arm, and for the first time appears beneath the folds of her veil a large bouquet of orange flowers, carried in a princely gift from the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh.

On these occasions, we believe, the dress of the bride ranks, in general estimation, as only second in importance to the celebration of the ceremony itself, which is to be regretted, for a lady's dress, like a lady's beauty, can only be described by its effect. It is embroidered white silk, trimmed with silver, which can just be discerned in rich designs glittering between the snowy folds. The traditional white is not, however, departed from, though over all she wears a slight bodice with open sleeves of white silk, embroidered with silver, and which, falling tight, sets off her tapering waist and faultless symmetry of form to absolute perfection.

Her gorgeous train of white and silver is borne by eight young ladies, between the ages of fifteen and twenty, the very choice and flower of the fair scions of our most ancient houses. The young ladies thus honored with so fair a post in the long programme of this happy day are all the daughters of Dukes, Marquises, or Earls whose titles are almost as familiar as the names of our Kings of old.

THE QUEEN OVERCOME.

Handel's march from "Joseph" had been played at entering, but all music had ceased as the party stood around the altar, till its strains broke out with the solemn words of the chorale:

> "This day, with joyful heart and voice,
> To Heav'n be raised a nation's pray'r;
> Almighty Father, deign to grant
> Thy blessing to the wedded pair.
> "So shall no clouds of sorrow dim
> The sunshine of their early days;
> But happiness in endless round
> Shall still encompass all their ways."

The exquisitely soft music of this chant, at once solemn and sorrowful, was composed by the late Prince Consort. It may have been this, or the associations and life-long memories called up by the scene beneath her; but certain it is that as the hymn commenced Her Majesty drew back from the window of the pew, and, after an effort to conceal her emotion, gave way to her tears, and almost sobbed; nor did she throughout the rest of the ceremony entirely recover her composure.

THE CEREMONY.

As the solemn chant ended the Prelates advanced to the communion rails, and the Primate, in a rich, clear voice, which was heard throughout every part of the building, choir or nave, commenced the service with the usual formulary, "Dearly beloved, we are gathered here, in the sight of God and in the face of this congregation, to join together this man and this woman in holy matrimony." There is a solemn pause after that dreadful adjuration, in which they are charged to answer if there was any impediment to their marriage; and then, after a moment, the Primate passed on to, "Wilt thou, ALBERT EDWARD, have this woman to thy wedded wife, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of matrimony? Wilt thou love her, comfort her, honor and keep her in sickness and in health; and, forsaking all other, keep thee only unto her, so long as ye both shall live?"

To this the Prince rather bowed than responded, his utterance was so indistinct. To the same question, "Wilt thou, ALEXANDRA CAROLINE MARIA, have this man to thy wedded husband?" the reply was just audible, but nothing more, though, as usual, every ear was strained to catch it.

But to the words, "I take thee, ALEXANDRA, to my wedded wife, to have and to hold from this day forward, for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish, till death us do part, according to God's holy ordinance; and thereto I plight thee my troth," the Prince repeated clearly, word for word, after his Grace; though now again, when it was the turn of the young bride, she could be heard only to answer almost inaudibly, and her cheeks were suffused with a crimson flush, and she seemed very nervous.

To the question, "Who giveth this woman to be married to this man?" the royal father of the bride only bowed and moved toward the Princess, who was removing her glove hurriedly. Then the Primate joined their hands, and in a clear, soft voice, firmly and deliberately repeated the words:

"With this ring I thee wed, with my body I thee worship, and with all my worldly goods I thee endow: in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen."

All then knelt down while the prayer commencing, "O Eternal God, Creator and Preserver of all mankind, Giver of all spiritual grace, the Author of everlasting life; send Thy blessing upon these Thy servants, this man and this woman, whom we bless in Thy name," was solemnly repeated, and then they rose, while the Primate joined their hands, and said the final words, "Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder."

With these words, which in law completed the marriage ceremony, the service was continued to the 67th Psalm, the solemn strains of which came like a relief to what seemed almost the overwrought feeling of all within the choir as the words went pealing softly through both nave and aisle.

The happy couple have gone to spend the honeymoon at Osborne, in the Isle of Wight.

The pleasure of the wedding was somewhat marred by the bad arrangements of the police. Seven women were crushed to death in the throng, and one hundred wounded. If such a thing occurred here, how our "mobocracy" would be abused!

A DARK NIGHT'S WORK.

By the Author of "Mary Barton," etc.

CHAPTER XVII.—(Continued.)

ELLINOR walked as nearly round the castle as ever she could, looking up at the few high-barred windows she could see, and wondering in what part of the building Dixon was confined. Then she went into the adjoining church-yard, and sitting down upon a tomb-stone, she gazed idly at the view spread below her—a view which was considered as the lion of the place, to be shown to all strangers by the inhabitants of Hellingford. Ellinor did not see it, however. She only saw the blackness of that fatal night. The hurried work—the lanterns glancing to and fro. She only heard the hard breathing of those who are engaged upon unwonted labor; the few hoarse muttered words; the swaying of the branches to and fro. All at once the church-clock above her struck eight, and then pealed out for distant laborers to cease their work for a time; such was the old custom of the place. Ellinor rose up, and made her way back to Mr. Johnson's house in High Street. The room felt close and confined in which she awaited her interview with Mr. Johnson, who had sent down an apology for having overslept himself, and at last made his appearance in a hurried, half-awakened state, in consequence of his late hospitality of the night before.

"I am so sorry I gave you all so much trouble last night," said Ellinor, apologetically. "I was overtired, and so much shocked by the news I heard."

"No trouble, no trouble, I am sure. Neither Mrs. Johnson nor I felt it in the least a trouble. Many ladies, I know, feel such things very trying, though there are others that can stand a judge's putting on the black cap better than most men. I'm sure I saw some as composed as could be under Judge Corbet's speech."

"But about Dixon? He must not die, Mr. Johnson."

"Well, I don't know that he will," said Mr. Johnson, in something of the tone of voice he would have used in soothing a child. "Judge Corbet said something about the possibility of a pardon. The jury did not recommend him to mercy; you see, his looks went so much against him, and all the evidence was so strong, and no defense, so to speak, for he would not furnish any information on which we could base defense. But the judge did give some hope, to my mind, though there are others that think differently."

"I tell you, Mr. Johnson, he must not die, and he shall not. To whom must I go?"

"Whew! Have you got additional evidence?" with a sudden sharp glance of professional inquiry.

"Never mind," Ellinor answered. "I beg your pardon.........only tell me into whose hands the power of life and death have passed."

"Into the Home Secretary's — Sir Philip Homes; but you can not get access to him on such an errand. It is the judge who tried the case that must urge a reprieve—Judge Corbet."

"Judge Corbet?"

"Yes; and he was rather inclined to take a merciful view of the whole case. I saw it in his charge. He'll be the person for you to see. I suppose you don't like to give me your confidence, or else I could arrange and draw up what will have to be said?"

"No. What I have to say must be spoken to the arbiter—to no one else. I am afraid I answered you impatiently just now. You must forgive me; if you knew all, I am sure you would."

"Say no more, my dear lady. We will suppose you have some evidence not adduced at the trial. Well, you must go up and see the judge, since you don't choose to impart it to any one, and lay it before him. He will, doubtless, compare it with his notes of the trial, and see how far it agrees with them. Of course you must be prepared with some kind of proof of what you say, for Judge Corbet will have to test your evidence."

"It seems strange to think of him as the judge," said Ellinor, almost to herself.

"Why, yes. He's but a young judge. You knew him at Hamley, I suppose? I remember his reading there with Mr. Ness."

"Yes. But do not let us talk more about that time. Tell me, when can I see Dixon? I have been to the castle already, but they said I must have a sheriff's order."

"To be sure. I desired Mrs. Johnson to tell you so last night. Old Ormerod was dining here; he is clerk to the magistrates, and I told him of your wish. He said he would see Sir Henry Croper, and have the order here before ten. But all this time Mrs. Johnson is waiting breakfast for us. Let me take you into the dining-room."

It was very hard work for Ellinor to do her duty as a guest, and to allow herself to be interested and talked to on local affairs by her host and hostess. But she felt as if she had spoken shortly and abruptly to Mr. Johnson in their previous conversation, and that she must try and make amends for it; so she attended to all the details about the restoration of the church, and the difficulty of getting a good music-master for the three little Miss Johnsons, with all her usual gentle good-breeding and patience, though no one can tell how her heart and imagination were full of the coming interview with poor old Dixon.

By-and-by Mr. Johnson was called out of the room to see Mr. Ormerod, and receive the order of admission from him. Ellinor clasped her hands tight together as she listened with apparent composure to Mrs. Johnson's never-ending praise of the Tonic Sol-fa system. But when Mr. Johnson returned she could not help interrupting her eulogy, and saying,

"Then I may go now?"

"Yes; the order was there—she might go, and Mr. Johnson would accompany her, to see that she met with no difficulty or obstacle.

As they walked thither he told her that some one—a turnkey, or some one—would have to be present at the interview; that such was always the rule in the case of condemned prisoners; but that if this third person was "obliging" he would keep out of ear-shot. Mr. Johnson quietly took care to see that the turnkey who accompanied Ellinor was "obliging."

The man took her across high-walled courts, and along stone corridors, and through many locked doors before they came to the "condemned cells."

"I've had three at a time in here," said he, unlocking the final door, "after Judge Morton had been here. We always called him the 'Hanging Judge.' But it's five years since he died, and since then there's been never more than one in at a time—though once it was a woman for poisoning her husband. Mary Jones was her name."

The stone passage out of which the cells opened was light, and bare, and scrupulously clean. Over each door was a small barred window, and an outer window of the same description was placed high up in the cell which the turnkey now opened.

Old Abraham Dixon was sitting on the side of his bed, doing nothing. His head was bent, his frame sunk, and he did not seem to care to turn round and see who it was that entered.

Ellinor tried to keep down her sobs while the man went up to him, and laying his hand on his shoulder, and lightly shaking him, he said:

"Here's a friend come to see you, Dixon." Then, turning to Ellinor, he added, "There's some as takes it in this kind o' stunned way, while others are as restless as a wild beast in a cage after they're sentenced." And then he withdrew into the passage, leaving the door open, so that he could see all that passed if he chose to look, but ostentatiously keeping his eyes averted, and whistling to himself, so that he could not hear what they said to each other.

Dixon looked up at Ellinor, but then let his eyes fall on the ground again; the increased trembling of his shrunk frame was the only sign he gave that he had recognized her.

She sat down by him, and took his large horny hand in hers. She wanted to overcome her inclination to sob hysterically before she spoke. She stroked the bony, shriveled fingers on which her hot, scalding tears kept dropping.

"Dunnot do that," said he, at length, in a hollow voice. "Dunnot take on about it; it's best as it is, missy."

"No! Dixon, it is not best. It shall not be. You know it shall not—can not be."

"I'm rather tired of living. It's been a great strain and labor for me. I think I'd as lief be with God as with men. And you see I were fond on him ever sin' he were a little lad, and told me what hard times he had at school, he did, just as if I were his brother! I loved him next to Molly Greaves. Dear! and I shall see her again, I reckon, come next Saturday week! They'll think well on me up there, I'll be bound; though I can not say as I've done all as I should do here below."

"But, Dixon," said Ellinor, "you know who did this—this—"

"Guilty o' murder," said he. "That's what they called it. Murder! And that it never were, choose who did it."

"My poor, poor father did it. I am going up to London this afternoon—I am going to see the judge, and tell him all."

"Don't you demean yourself to that fellow, missy. It's him as left you in the lurch as soon as sorrow and shame came nigh you."

He looked up at her now for the first time; but she went on as if she had not noticed those wist, weary eyes.

"Yes; I shall go to him. I know who it is, and I am resolved. After all he may be better than a stranger for real help; and I shall never remember any—any thing else when I think of you, good, faithful friend."

"He looks but a wizened old fellow in his gray wig. I should hardly ha' known him. I gave him a look as much as to say, 'I could tell tales o' you, my lord judge, if I chose.' I don't know if he heeded me though. I suppose it were for a sign of old acquaintance that he said he'd recommend me to mercy. But I'd sooner have death nor mercy, by long odds. Yon man out there says mercy means Botany Bay. It would be like killing me by inches, that would. It would. I'd liefer go straight to Heaven than live on among the black folk."

He began to shake again; this idea of transportation, from its very mysteriousness, was more terrifying to him than death. He kept on saying, plaintively, "Missy, you'll never let them send me to Botany Bay — I could not stand that."

"No, no!" said she. "You shall come out of this prison, and go home with me to East Chester—I promise you, you shall. I promise you. I don't yet quite know how, but trust in my promise. Don't fret about Botany Bay. If you go there, I go too—I am so sure you will not go. And you know if you have done any thing against the law in concealing that fatal night's work, I did too; and if you are to be punished, I will be punished too. But I feel sure it will be right—I mean as right as any thing can be, with the recollection of that time present to us, as it must always be." She almost spoke these last words to herself. They sat on, hand in hand, for a few minutes more in silence.

"I thought you'd come to me. I knowed you were far away in foreign parts. But I used to pray to God. 'Dear Lord God!' I used to say, 'let me see her again.' I told the chaplain as I'd begin to pray for repentance—at after I'd done praying that I might see you once again; for it just seemed to take all my strength to say those words as I have named. And I thought as how God knew what was in my heart better than I could tell Him. How I was main and sorry for all as I'd ever done wrong; I allays were, at after it was done; but I thought as no one could know how bitter-keen I wanted to see you."

Again they sank into silence. Ellinor felt as if she would fain be away and active in procuring his release; but she also perceived how precious her presence was to him, and she did not like to leave him a moment before the time allowed for. His voice had changed to a weak piping old man's quaver, and between the times of his talking he seemed to relapse into a dreamy state; but through it all he held her hand tight, as though afraid that she would leave him.

So the hour elapsed, with no more spoken words than those above. From time to time

Ellinor's tears dropped down upon her lap; she could not restrain them, though she scarce knew why she cried just then.

At length the turnkey said that the time allowed for the interview was ended. Ellinor spoke no word, but rose and bent down and kissed the old man's forehead, saying,

"I shall come back to-morrow. God keep and comfort you."

So, almost without an articulate word from him in reply (he rose up and stood on his shaking legs as she bade him farewell, putting his hand to his head with the old habitual mark of respect), she went her way swiftly out of the prison, swiftly back with Mr. Johnson to his house, scarcely patient or strong enough in her hurry to explain to him fully all that she meant to do. She only asked him a few absolutely requisite questions, and informed him of her intention to go straight to London to see Judge Corbet.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Just before the railway-carriage in which Ellinor was seated started on the journey she bent forward and put out her hand once more to Mr. Johnson. "To-morrow I will thank you for all," she said. "I can not now."

It was about the same time that she had reached Hellingford on the previous night that she arrived at the Great Western Station on this evening—past eight o'clock. On the way she had remembered and arranged many things: one important question she had omitted to ask Mr. Johnson; but that was easily remedied. She had not inquired where she could find Judge Corbet; if she had, Mr. Johnson could probably have given her his professional address. As it was she asked for a Post-office Directory at the hotel, and looked out for his private dwelling—128 Hyde Park Gardens.

She rang for a waiter.

"Can I send a messenger to Hyde Park Gardens?" she said, hurrying on to her business, tired and worn-out as she was. "It is only to ask if Judge Corbet is at home this evening. If he is, I must go and see him."

The waiter was a little surprised, and would gladly have had her name to authorize the inquiry; but she could not bear to send it; it would be bad enough, that first meeting, without the feeling that he too had had time to recall all the past days. Better to go in upon him unprepared, and plunge into the subject.

The waiter returned with the answer while she yet was pacing up and down the room restlessly, nerving herself for the interview.

"The messenger has been to Hyde Park Gardens, ma'am. The Judge and Lady Corbet are gone out to dinner."

Lady Corbet! Of course Ellinor knew that he was married. Had she not been present at the wedding in East Chester Cathedral? But somehow these recent events had so carried her back to old times that the intimate association of the names, "the Judge and Lady Corbet," seemed to awaken her out of some dream.

"Oh, very well," she said, just as if these thoughts were not passing rapidly through her mind. "Let me be called at seven to-morrow morning, and let me have a cab at the door to Hyde Park Gardens at eight."

And so she went to bed, but scarcely to sleep. All night long she had the scenes of those old times, the happy, happy days of her youth, the one terrible night that cut all happiness short, present before her. She could almost have fancied that she heard the long-silent sounds of her father's step, her father's way of breathing, the rustle of his newspaper as he hastily turned it over, coming through the lapse of years, the silence of the night. She knew that she had the little writing-case of her girlhood with her in her box. The treasures of the dead that it contained, the morsel of dainty sewing, the little sister's golden curl, the half-finished letter to Mr. Corbet, were all there. She took them out and looked at each separately; looked at them long—long and wistfully. "Will it be of any use to me?" she questioned of herself as she was about to put her father's letter back into its receptacle. She read the last words over again once more: "From my death-bed I adjure you to stand her friend; I will beg pardon on my knees for any thing."

"I will take it," thought she. "I need not bring it out; most likely there will be no need for it, after what I shall have to say. All is so altered, so changed between us, as utterly as if it never had been, that I think I shall have no shame in showing it him for my own part of it. While if he sees poor papa's, dear, dear papa's suffering humility, it may make him think more gently of one who loved him once, though they parted in wrath with each other, I'm afraid."

So she took the letter with her when she drove to Hyde Park Gardens.

Every nerve in her body was in such a high state of tension that she could have screamed out at the cabman's boisterous knock at the door. She got out hastily, before any one was ready or willing to answer such an untimely summons, paid the man double what he ought to have had, and stood there sick, trembling, and humble.

"Is Judge Corbet at home? Can I see him?" she asked of the footman, who at length answered the door.

He looked at her curiously, and a little familiarly, before he replied.

"Why, yes! He's pretty sure to be at home at this time of day; but whether he'll see you is quite another thing."

"Would you be so good as to ask him? It is on very particular business."

"Can you give me a card? your name, perhaps, will do, if you have not a card. I say, Simmons" (to a lady's-maid crossing the hall), "is the judge up yet?"

"Oh yes! he's in his dressing-room this half hour. My lady is coming down directly. It is just breakfast-time."

"Can't you put it off, and come again a little later?" said he, turning once more to Ellinor—white Ellinor! trembling Ellinor!

"No! please let me come in. I will wait. I am sure Judge Corbet will see me if you will tell him I am here. Miss Wilkins. He will know the name."

"Well, then, will you wait here till I have got breakfast in?" said the man, letting her into the hall, and pointing to the bench there. He took her, from her dress, to be a lady's-maid or governess, or at most a tradesman's daughter; and besides he was behindhand with all his preparations. She came in and sat down.

"You will tell him I am here," said she, faintly.

"Oh yes; never fear; I'll send up word, though I don't believe he'll come to you before breakfast."

He told a page, who ran up stairs, and, knocking at the judge's door, told him a Miss Jenkins wanted to speak to him.

"Who?" asked the judge from the inside.

"Miss Jenkins; she said you would know the name, Sir."

"Not I. Tell her to wait."

So Ellinor waited. Presently down the stairs, with slow deliberate dignity, came the handsome Lady Corbet, in her rustling silks and ample petticoats, carrying her fine boy, and followed by her majestic nurse. She was ill-pleased that any one should come and take up her husband's time when he was at home and supposed to be enjoying domestic leisure; and her imperious, inconsiderate nature did not prompt her to any civility toward the gentle creature sitting down weary and heart-sick in her house. On the contrary, she looked her over as she slowly descended, till Ellinor shrank abashed from the steady gaze of the large black eyes. Then she, her baby, and nurse disappeared into the large dining-room, into which all the preparations for breakfast had been carried.

The next person to come down would be the judge. Ellinor instinctively put down her veil. She heard his quick, decided step; she had known it well of old.

He gave one of his quick, shrewd glances at the person sitting in the hall and waiting to speak to him, and his practiced eye recognized the lady at once, in spite of her travel-worn dress.

"Will you just come into this room?" said he, opening the door of his study, to the front of the house—the dining-room was to the back; they communicated by folding-doors.

The astute lawyer placed himself with his back to the window; it was the natural position of the master of the apartment; but it also gave him the advantage of seeing his companion's face in full light. Ellinor lifted her veil; it had only been a dislike to a recognition in the hall which had made her put it down.

Judge Corbet's countenance changed more than hers. She had been prepared for the interview; he was not. But he usually had the full command of the expression on his face.

"Ellinor! Miss Wilkins! is it you?" And he went forward holding out his hand with cordial greeting, under which the embarrassment, if he felt any, was carefully concealed. She could not speak all at once in the way she wished.

"That stupid Henry told me Jenkins! I beg your pardon. How could they put you down to sit in the hall? You must come in and have some breakfast with us; Lady Corbet will be delighted, I'm sure." His sense of the awkwardness of the meeting with the woman who was once to have been his wife, and of the probable introduction which was to follow to the woman who was his actual wife, grew upon him, and made him speak a little hurriedly. Ellinor's next words were a wonderful relief; and her soft, gentle way of speaking was like the touch of a cooling balsam.

"Thank you, you must excuse me. I am come strictly on business, otherwise I should never have thought of calling on you at such an hour. It is about poor Dixon."

"Ah! I thought as much!" said the judge, handing her a chair, and sitting down himself. He tried to compose his mind to business, but in spite of his strength of character and his present efforts the remembrance of old times would come back at the sound of her voice. He wondered if he was as much changed in appearance as she struck him as being in that first look of recognition. After that first glance he rather avoided meeting her eyes.

"I knew how much you would feel it. Some one at Hellingford told me you were abroad—in Rome, I think. But you must not distress yourself unnecessarily; the sentence is sure to be commuted to transportation or something equivalent. I was talking to the Home Secretary about it only last night. Lapse of time and subsequent good character quite preclude any idea of capital punishment." All the time that he said this he had other thoughts at the back of his mind—some curiosity, a little regret, a touch of remorse, a wonder how the meeting (which of course would have to be sometime) between Lady Corbet and Ellinor would go off; but he spoke clearly enough on the subject in hand, and no outward mark of distraction from it appeared.

Ellinor answered: "I came to tell you, what I suppose may be told to any judge in confidence and full reliance on his secrecy, that Abraham Dixon was not the murderer." She stopped short, and choked a little.

The judge looked sharply at her.

"Then you know who was?" said he.

"Yes," she replied, with a low, steady voice, looking him full in the face with sad, solemn eyes.

LOVE'S INCONSISTENCIES.

Because my Lady's eyes are tender blue,
And her sweet face is framed in golden hair,
I straightway vow, and ready am to swear,
No woman can be lovely if not fair!
Yet if my Love were dark, I should declare
Beauty was dark—and I should mean it too;

Protesting that I only loved brown eyes,
Doted on hair black as the raven's wing;
And I should make me sonnets, and should sing
In sweetest tones, my Lady hearkening,
Praise, oft-repeated, of the self-same thing:
In truth, Love does not make us overwise.

Yes, if my Lady bent her brows to frown,
I should maintain her loveliness too rare,
Too perfect, for so slight a thing to mar;
And I should say her frown was sweeter far
Than all the smiles of other women are,
And more became her than a golden crown.

But since my Love is gentle, meek, and fair,
And smiles on me, her lover, graciously;
And when I come, receives me lovingly;
And when I go, parts from me tenderly,
Saying, "When wilt thou come again to me?"
It needs must be that I praise golden hair,

And for her sake praise blue eyes, and fair brows,
As sweetest, purest, loveliest, and best;
Most womanly, most winning; prettiest,
And dearest every way; and for the rest—
The other eyes and hair, nor blue, nor fair—
Despise them all! And so I end my vows.

"KILLED IN ACTION."

It was the day of Cedar Mountain. Crawford had such scanty numbers that the cavalry was formed as a first line of battle, supporting the advance batteries. The audacity of the movement seemed to puzzle the enemy; for, instead of pushing us hard and driving back our feeble force, the whole morning was spent in slowly feeling their way into position, only now and then pitching a few harmless shell in our direction. Besides, they had about as good ground to fight on where they were as they could find further on; and they were probably ignorant what forces we might have upon their flanks. From sunrise until half past three in the afternoon we stood there wearily, only moving by squadrons to water and detaching carbineers as skirmishers. Across the fields, which rose in graceful undulations, we could faintly discern the columns of rebel cavalry and infantry moving from wood to wood, in the direction of our left. We were so placed that we could see nothing but the rebels, the Rhode Island cavalry formed near us, and one battery in sections on the rise of the hill behind us. At three o'clock we had gathered some oats and wheat harvested in the adjoining field, and were feeding them to our horses in addition to the corn-blades among which we stood, when the rebel batteries were moved by hand over the brow of the hill in front, and opened upon us with great rapidity of fire and accuracy of aim. Our skirmishers in the mean time were sharply engaged with theirs; and, notwithstanding their disadvantage in being mounted and having merely the short carbine, did considerable execution, losing only one horse. They kept their enemy nervously making little rushes forward as they fired, and falling back to load, so that the rebels began to fire wilder and wilder. At last there was an advance in force, and they opened with grape upon this scattered line. Our men came back like a whirlwind, completely obscured by dust, and fell into their places in the ranks. Now the battery which our regiment was supporting began to show its brilliant qualities. I think that it was L Battery, First New York Artillery, but am not positive. Its sections, one above the other, either concentrated their fire or distributed it as circumstances required; and from the first shot to the last almost every missile did its duty. An officer of ours, who was out with skirmishers on our right, was so placed that he could see the effects of the fire on a brigade who were lying behind a hill waiting to charge upon the battery. For a few seconds they lay under the fire. Those few seconds cost them thirty men; and as they sprang up to run away they were swept even more fearfully. The force broke, and was not, I believe, re-formed during the engagement. While the battery was doing its work we were doing ours—the unpleasantest duty that can be imposed. We had to sit in our saddles, motionless and helpless, exposed to a tremendous fire, and unable to return a shot. Out of the woods in our front the sharp-shooters of the rebel brigade had been sent to "disperse that cavalry." Fortunately for us our Lieutenant-Colonel was an old soldier, and had chosen our place as none but an old soldier would. The corn-field was, as I have said, full of little undulations. Just in front of us was a hollow, and beyond it a rising ground. If we had been in the hollow, though covered from the sharp-shooters, we should have been raked by the artillery; and the hill-top was of course bad. So we stood to the rear of the hollow, on the rise of the hill; so that those in front, unconscious of this wide depression, must have thought us so much nearer to them, and have regulated their aim accordingly. This I imagine to have been the case, for a perfect storm of bullets swept across that brow of the hill, and struck up the dust at our horses' feet. Simultaneously balls came whirring through the air just above our heads, causing a shock to the nerves similar to that occasioned by a covey of quail starting from beneath our feet, and causing a good many of the men to dodge and twist a little in their saddles. I was remarking this fact indignantly to the Major, when, "Nonsense!" was his reply. "Why, I dodge myself!" of which he immediately gave an illustration. I looked around, and there were General Banks and his staff also bending gracefully to and fro. I therefore concluded that the fire was regarded as hot and heavy. "Steady, in the first squadron! Steady there, I say! What are you about?" sang out the Major's clear, stern voice. As he moved to check an apparent confusion, a man made his way out of the ranks—a little pale, perhaps, but otherwise as usual. "What are you doing leaving the ranks, Sir?" The man saluted quietly, and answered, "Hit, Sir." He had a "pretty" sharp clip from a rifle-ball. "Go to the rear and get dressed," said the Major. The line was dressed again without need of commands, and there we stood as calmly as ever under fire. But now the men began to suffer, and the horses especially had been struck several times. The battery had dismounted a gun which had been run up to the sharp-shooters, to open on us with canister, but the rifle-balls and the shell were becoming more and more accurate in their aim. Bayard turned and spoke to Banks. We heard the Major-General answer, "They stand it like veterans. I shall myself show these their new position when I move them." Presently the order came, "Platoons, right about wheel!" and at a walk, without breaking a rank, we steadily moved back, crossing the exposed hill-top and descending on the other side, where we again formed. But now our whole first line was falling back upon Banks's Corps, which had been formed as it had come up behind us; and the enemy had succeeded in planting a battery upon Cedar Mountain, which completely enfiladed our position. Over the brow of the hill, and from the left flank, the shriek of the shell thrilled our ears, and all along the line they burst with a sound that, once heard, can never be forgotten. The battery—one piece dismounted and half the horses killed—limbered up and moved off. Taking down the fence in our rear and that into the road at the right, the regiment again made an about, and retired a second time in line. That was the most trying time of all that day. The enemy's range was perfect, and with every discharge each man wondered how he had escaped. The apprehension of immediate death was strong in every soul, and yet the line moved over that uneven ground better than it could have done on drill. Not an attempt was made to break ranks or to straggle, even when comrades went down on either hand. Oh! how proud we were of the men, and how cheerfully and confidently all the officers ever after gave their orders, certain that they would be obeyed!

As the Chaplain, who had occasionally been riding along the ranks endeavoring to cheer the men while his services were not yet required in the hospital, turned from helping to clear away the fence, a man from the left came by, leading two or three horses.

"Where are you going from the field?"

"It's the Lieutenant, Sir. A shell has struck him, and the boys are carrying him, while I take the horses."

"Who? Not A——?" ejaculated the Chaplain, anxiously.

"Yes, Sir. Here he comes."

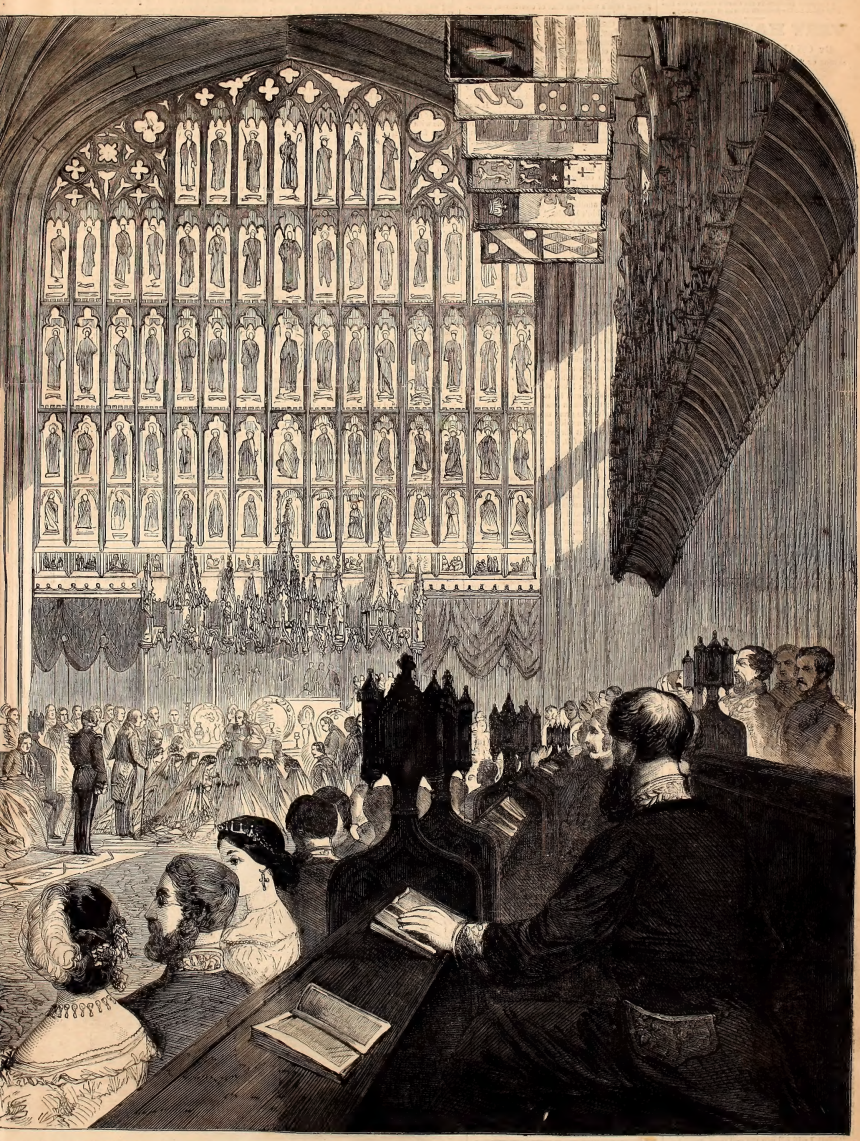
And there lay the poor boy, almost a child in look, and a sort of pet among officers and men, pale and stunned, in the arms of some of his platoon, his right leg nearly severed from his body. The crushed and torn muscles showed among them the broken bone, and the blood dropped slowly to the ground, mingling with the dust. To get him into an ambulance and drive back to the hospital seemed fearfully long for all; and I think that the men felt every jolt almost as sharply as did he. Behind a wood was spread out the ghastly apparatus of military surgery, and the poor boy was removed as quickly as circumstances would permit to the neighborhood of the table. As he lay in the Chaplain's arms he seemed to recognize the voice that spoke to him, and with the faint gaspings of a dying man he whispered,

"Oh, Chaplain, if I could only pray!"

"Shall I pray for you?"

"Yes."

And the Chaplain put up those exquisite petitions in the service for the visitation of the sick:



"O Father of mercies and God of all comfort, our only help in time of need, we fly unto Thee for succor in behalf of this Thy servant, here lying under Thy hand in great weakness of body. Look graciously upon him, O Lord; and the more the outward man decayeth, strengthen him, we beseech Thee, so much the more continually with Thy grace and Holy Spirit in the inner man. Give him unfeigned repentance for all the errors of his life past, and steadfast faith in Thy Son Jesus; that his sins may be done away by Thy mercy, and his pardon sealed in heaven before he go hence and be no more seen......

"O Almighty God, with whom do live the spirits of just men made perfect, after they are delivered from their earthly prisons, we humbly commend the soul of this Thy servant, our dear brother, into Thy hands, as into the hands of a faithful Creator and most merciful Saviour, most humbly beseeching Thee that it may be precious in Thy sight. Wash it, we pray Thee, in the blood of that immaculate Lamb, that was slain to take away the sins of the world; that whatsoever defilements it may have contracted in the midst of this miserable and naughty world, through the [illegible] of the flesh or the wiles of Satan, being purged and done away, it may be presented pure and without spot before Thee. And forasmuch as in all appearance the time of his dissolution draweth very near, so fit and prepare him now for the hour of death, that, after his departure hence in peace and in Thy favor, his soul may be received into Thine everlasting kingdom; through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, Thy only Son, our Lord and Saviour."

A——'s lips moved as if he were following the words of the petition to the very end. Then he was lifted on the table, the sponge of chloroform applied, and the ghastly work of amputation performed. He never recovered from the shock. His mind wandered again to the action, and he uttered words of command to his men. At last, with a feeble motion of his hand, he made an effort to ejaculate "Star-spangled banner!" These were his last words. The shells of the enemy came plunging through the wood, and struck against the fence behind which our hospital was established. A—— was placed in an ambulance, beside B——, who had been hit almost at the same moment; and the whole establishment moved back to a house in the rear. Scarcely had he been removed from the vehicle when he quietly breathed his last. He lies buried in Culpepper, in the southwest corner of our military grave-yard, while his cousin H—— sleeps at Harrisonburg, awaiting the same general Resurrection.

CHAPTER II.

A YOUTH, adorned with a blue and yellow rosette, cried out, in the hearing of Mrs. Dodd, "I say, they are properly pumped, both crews are:" then, jumping on to a spoke of her carriage-wheel, with a slight apology, he announced that lag or three were shut up in the Exeter.

The next meaning of these two verbs passive was not clear to Mrs. Dodd: but their intensity was; she fluttered, and wanted to go to her boy and nurse him, and turned two most imploring eyes on Julia, and Julia straightway kissed her with gentle vehemence, and offered to run and see.

"What, among all these young gentlemen, love? I fear that would not be proper. See, all the ladies remain apart." So they kept quiet and mused, after the manner of females.

Meantime the Cantab's quick eye had not deceived him; in each racing boat were two young gentlemen leaning collapsed over their oars; and two more, who were in a cloud, and not at all clear whether they were in this world still, or in their seat had pulled into a better. But their malady was not a rare one in racing boats, and the remedy always at hand. It combined the rival systems. Thames was sprinkled in large faces—Homœopathy: and brandy in a tea-spoon trickled down their throats—Allopathy: youth and spirits soon did the rest; and, the moment their eyes opened, their mouths opened; and, the moment their mouths opened, they fell a chaffing.

Mrs. Dodd's anxiety and Julia's were relieved by the appearance of Mr. Edward, in a towed shooting-jacket, sauntering down to them, hands in his pocket, and a cigar in his mouth, placidly unconscious of their solicitude on his account. He was received with a little guttural cry of delight: his misery they had been in about him was duly concealed from him by both, and Julia asked him warmly who had won.

"Oh, Cambridge."

"Cambridge! Why, then, you are beaten?"

"Rather." (Puff.)

"And you can come here with that horrible calm, and cigar, owning defeat, and puffing tranquillity, with the same mouth. Mamma, we are beaten. Beaten! actually."

"Never mind," said Edward, kindly; "you have seen a capital race, the closest ever known on this river; and one of the other must lose."

"And if they did not quite win, they very nearly did," observed Mrs. Dodd, composedly; then, with heartfelt pathos, "he is not hurt, and that is the main thing."

"Well, my Lady Placid, and Mr. Imperturbable, I am glad neither of your equanimities is disturbed; but defeat is a Bitter Pill to me."

Julia said this in her earnest voice, and dreary lip her scarf suddenly round her, so as almost to make it speak, digested her Bitter Pill in silence. During which process several Exeter men came in sight of Edward, and came round him, and an animated discussion took place. They began with asking him how it had happened, and, as he never spoke in a hurry, supplied him with the answers. A stretcher had broken in the Exeter. No, but the Cambridge was a much better-built boat, and her bottom cleaner. The bow oar of the Exeter was ill, and not fit for work. Each of these solutions was advanced and combated in turn, and then all together. At last the Babel lulled, and Edward was once more appealed to.

"Well, I will tell you the real truth," said he, "how it happened." (Puff.)

There was a pause of expectation, for the young man's tone was that of conviction, knowledge, and authority.

"The Cambridge men pulled faster than we did." (Puff.)

The hearers stared and then laughed.

"Come, old fellow," said Edward, "never win a boat-race on dry land! That is such a plain thing to do: gives the other side the laugh as well as the race. I have heard a stretcher so two told, but I saw none broken. (Puff.) Their boat is the oldest I ever saw, it leaks every stroke. (Puff.) Their strength lies in the crew. It was a good race and a fair one. Cambridge got a lead and kept it. (Puff.) They beat us a yard or two at rowing; but hang it all, don't let them beat us at telling the truth, not by an inch." (Puff.)

"All right, old fellow!" was now the cry. One observed, however, that Stroke did not take the matter as coolly as Six, for he had shed a tear getting out of the boat.

"Shed a fiddle-stick!" squealed a little skeptic.

"No," said another, "he didn't quite shed it; his pride wouldn't let him."

"So he deserted it, and put it by for supper," suggested Edward, and puffed.

"None of your chaff, Six. He had a gulp or two, and swallowed the rest by main force."

"Don't you talk: you can swallow any thing, it seems." (Puff.)

"Well, I believe it," said one of Hardie's own set. "Dodd doesn't know him as we do. Taff Hardie can't bear to be beat."

"When Hardie" — gone, Mrs. Dodd observed, "Dear me! what if the young gentleman did cry a little, it was very excusable; after such great exertions it was disappointing, mortifying. I pity him for one, and wish he had his mother alive and here, to dry them."

"Mamma, it is you for reading us," cried Edward, slapping his thigh. "Well, then, since you can feel for a fellow, Hardie was a good sort and an ass. You know the waiter's way in a manner beaten, and he took the blame. He never cried: that was a crucial test of the fellows. But he did give one great sob, that was all, and hung his head on one side a moment. But then he fought and lost it directly, like a man, and there was an end of it, or ought to have been. Hang chatter-boxes!"

"And will you say to cousin Edward?" inquired Julia, warmly.

"What me? Console my senior, and my Senior? Rap out."

At this thunder-bolt of etiquette both ladies kept their countenances—this was their musculine best day—and Edward, finding no sympathy came on: six competitors—two Cambridge, three Oxford, one London. The three heats furnished one good race, that of the contest between a Cambridge man and Hardie, ending in favor of the latter; the Londoner walked away from his opponents. Sir Fopling a competitor more impetuous, and ran into him in the first hundred yards. Sir F. consuming calm. The umpire, appealed to on the spot, decided that this was foul, Mr. Dodd being in his own water. He talked over the name, and appointed Mr. Edward to his sister, who delivered her mind thus:

"Oh! if races are to be won by going slower than the other, we may shine yet; only, I call it Cheating, not Racing."

He smiled unmoved; she gave her scarf the upper hand, and they all went to dinner. The business recommenced with a race between a London boat and the winner of yesterday's heat, Cambridge. Edward, in the Exeter, said to a mark appeared. The Cambridge boat was too light for the men, and kept burying her nose; Sir Fopling's crab under water, they floated like a cork. The Londoners soon found out their advantage, and, overrating it, steered into their opponents' water prematurely, in spite of a warning voice from the bank. Cambridge saw, and crunched on for a foul; and for about a minute it was any body's race. But the Londoners pulled gallantly, and just scraped clear of Cambridge. They recovered, they kept their back straight and a clear lead to the finish; Cambridge followed a few feet in their wake, pulling wonderfully fast to the end, but a trifle out of form, and much distressed.

At this both universities looked blue, their hostile aggrandizing being, for once, lost in the external world, and then tackle each other for the prize.

Just before Edward left his friends for "the sculls," the final heat, a note was brought to him. He ran his eye over it, and threw it open into his sister's lap. The ladies read it. In writing had won a prize poem, and so now is our time to get a hint for composition:

DEAR SIR.—Oxford must win something. Suppose we go in for three sculls. You are a horse that can stay; I am a jockey fast for the load at starting. You are used to work him out of wind; then you can wait on us, and pick up the race. My boat is not well enough hedge to win, but I am good to pump the Cockney; he is quick, but a little stale. Yours truly,

ALFRED HARDIE.

Mrs. Dodd remarked that the language was sadly figurative; but she feared Mr. Edward might be successful in spite of his correspondent's style.

Julia said she did not dare hope it. "The race is not always to the swift and the battle to the strong." This was in allusion to yesterday's "foul."

The skiffs started down at the island, and, as they were longer coming up than the Exeter gig, she was in a fever for nearly ten minutes; at last, near the opposite bank, up came the two leading skiffs straggling, both men visibly exhausted; Silcock ahead, but his rudder overlapped by Hardie's bow; each in his own water.

"We are third," sighed Julia, and turned her head away from the river so resolutely, but only for a moment, for she felt Mrs. Dodd start and press her arm; and lo! Edward's skiff was shooting swiftly across from their side of the river. He was pulling just within himself, in beautiful form, and with far more elasticity than the other two had got left. As he passed his mother and sister, his eye seemed to strike fire, and he laid out all his powers, and went at the leading skiff hand over hand. There was a yell of astonishment and delight from both sides of the Thames. He passed Hardie, who upon that relaxed his speed. In thirty seconds more he was even with Silcock: then came a dead struggle: but the newcomer was "the horse that could stay:" he drew steadily ahead, and the stem of his boat was in a line with Silcock's person, when the gun fired, and a fearful roar from the bridge, the river, and the banks, announced that the favorite university had picked up the sculls in the person of Dodd of Exeter.

In due course, he brought the little silver sculls, and pinned them on his mother.

While she and Julia were telling him how proud they were and how happy they should be, but for their fears that he would hurt himself, beating gentlemen ever so much older than himself, came two Exeter men with wild looks hunting for him; "Oh, Dodd! Hardie wants you directly."

"Don't you go, Edward," whispered Julia.

"Why should you be at Mr. Hardie's beck and call? I never heard of such a thing. That youth will make me hate him."

"Oh I think I had better just go and see what it is about," replied Edward: "I shall be back directly." And on this understanding he went off with the men.

Half an hour passed; an hour: two hours; and he did not return. Mrs. Dodd and Julia sat wondering what had become of him, and were looking all around, and getting uneasy; when at last they did hear something about him, but indirectly, and from an unexpected quarter. A tall young man in a jersey and flannel trowsers, and a little straw-hat, with a purple rosette, came away from the bustle to the more secluded part where they sat, and made eagerly for the Thames as if he was a duck, and going in. But at the brink he flung himself into a sitting posture, and dipped his white handkerchief into the stream, then tied it victoriously round his brow, doubled himself up with his head in his hands, and rocked himself like an old woman—minus the patience, of course.

Mrs. Dodd and Julia, sitting but a few paces behind him, exchanged a look of intelligence. The young gentleman was a stranger: but they had recognized a faithful old acquaintance at the bottom of his pantomime. They discovered, too, that the afflicted one was a personage: for he had not sat there long when quite a little band of men came after him. Observing his semicircularity and general condition, they hesitated a moment: and then one of them remonstrated eagerly. "For Heaven's sake come back to the boat! there is a crowd of all the colleges come round us; and they all say Oxford is being sold; we had a chance for the four-oared race, and you are throwing it away."

"What do I care what they all say?" was the answer, delivered with a kind of plaintive snarl.

"But we care."

"Care then! I pity you." And he turned his back fiercely on them; and then groaned by way of half apology. Another tried him, "Come give us a civil answer, please."

"People that intrude upon a man's privacy, racked with pain, have no right to demand civility," replied the sufferer more gently, but sullenly enough.

"Do you call this privacy?"

"It was, a minute ago. Do you think I left the boat, and came here, among the natives, for company? and noise? With my head splitting."

Here Julia gave Mrs. Dodd a soft pinch, to which Mrs. Dodd replied by a smile. And so they settled who this petulant young invalid must be.

"There, it is no use," observed one, sotto voce, "the bloke really has awful headaches, like a girl, and then he always shuts up this way. You will only rile him, and get the rough side of his tongue."

Here, then, the conference drew toward a close. But a Wadham man, who was one of the embassadors, interposed. "Stop a minute," said he, "Mr. Hardie, I have not the honor to be acquainted with you, and I am sure here to annoy you, nor to be affronted by you. But the University has a stake in this race, and the University expects me through us; through me if you like."

"Who have I the honor," inquired Hardie, assuming politeness sudden and vast.

"Badham, of Wadham."

"Badham o' Wadham? Hear that, ye tuneful nine! Well Badham o' Wadham, you are no acquaintance of mine; so you may possibly not be a fool. Let us assume by way of hypothesis that you are a man of sense, a man of reason as well as of rhyme. Then follow my logic.

"Hardie of Exeter is a good man in a boat when he has not got a headache.

"When he has got a headache, Hardie of Exeter is not worth a straw in a boat.

"Hardie of Exeter has a headache now.

"Ergo, the university would put the said Hardie into a race, headache and all, and reduce defeat to a certainty.

"And, ergo, on the same premises, I, not being an egotist, nor an ass, have taken Hardie of Exeter and his headache out of the boat, as I should have done any other cripple.

"Secondly, I have put the best man on the river into this cripple's place.

"Total, I have given the university the benefit of my brains; and the university, not having brains enough to see what is going by the sea change, turns again and rends me, like an animal frequently mentioned in Scripture; but, nota bene, never once with approbation."

And the afflicted Rhetorician attempted a diabolical grin, but failed signally; and groaned instead.

"Is this your answer to the university, Sir?"

At this query, delivered in a somewhat threatening tone, the invalid sat up all in a moment, like a poked lion.

"Oh, if Badham o' Wadham thinks to create auctoritate sua et totius universitatis, Badham o' Wadham may just tell the whole university to go and be d—d, and be hanged down to the junior cock at Skimmery Hall, with my compliments."

"Ill conditioned brute!" muttered Badham of Wadham. "Serve you right if the university were to check you into the Thames." And with this comment they left him to his ill-temper. One remained; sat quietly down a little way off, struck a sweetly aromatic lucifer, and blew a tobacco cloud; but the only one which betokens calm.

As for Hardie he held his aching head over his knees, absorbed in pain, and quite unconscious that sacred pity was poisoning the air beside him, and two pair of dove-like eyes resting on him with womanly concern.

Mrs. Dodd and Julia had heard the greatest part of this colloquy. They had terribly quick ears; and nothing better to do with their just then. Indeed their interest was excited.

Julia went as far as to put her salts into Mrs. Dodd's hand with a little earnest look. But Mrs. Dodd did not act upon the hint; she had learned who the young man was; but the very name been strange to her, she would have been more at her ease with him. Moreover his rudeness to the other m n repelled her a little; above

"THEY ARE OFF!"

* Oh where, and oh where, was her Lindley Murray gone?

all he had uttered a monosyllable; and a stinger; a thorn of speech not in her vocabulary, nor even in society's. Those might be his manners, even when not aching. Still, it seems, a feather would have turned the scale in his favor, for she whispered, "I have a great mind; if I could but catch his eye."

While feminine pity and social reserve were holding the balance so nicely, and nonsensically, about half a split straw, one of the racing four oars went down close under the Berkshire bank.

"London!" cried Hardie's adherent.

"What can you mean, old fellow?" murmured Hardie, in a faint voice. "Now, that is like a friend, a real friend, to sit by me, and not make a row. Thank you, thank you!"

Presently the Cambridge four-oar passed: it was specially followed by the Oxford; the last came down with a rush, and Hardie eyed it keenly as it passed.

"There," he cried, "was I wrong? There is a swing for you; there is a stroke. I do not know what a treasure I had got sitting behind me."

The ladies looked, and lo! the lauded Stroke of the four-oar was left behind.

"Sing out and tell him it is not like a sculls. He must fight for the head, or starting, and hold it with his eyelids when he has got it."

This adherent bawled this at Edward, and Edward—who enjoyed rough boat-work in a sleepy cheerful voice, "We mean to try all we know."

"What is the odds?" inquired the invalid, faintly.

"Even on London; two to one against Cambridge; three to one against us."

"Take all you can and lay it on," sighed the sufferer.

"Fork it out, then. Hallo! eighteen pounds? Fancy having eighteen pounds at the end of term! I'll get the odds up at the bridge directly. Here's a lady offering you her smelling-bottle."

Hardie rose and turned round, and sure enough there were two ladies seated in their carriage at some distance; one of whom was holding him out three pretty little things enough—a little smile, a little blush, and a little gaiety bottle with a gold cork. The last panegyric on Edward had turned the scale.

Hardie rose slowly up to the side of the carriage, and took off his hat to them with a half-bewildered air. Now that he was so near, his face showed very pale: it was more so than his neck was a good deal tanned; his eyelids were rather swollen, and his young eyes troubled and almost filmy with the pain. The ladies saw, and their gentle bosoms were touched: they had heard of him as a victorious combatant, triumphing on all difficulties of mind and body; and they saw him wan, and worn, with feminine suffering the contrast to him doubly interesting.

Arrived at the side of the carriage he almost started at Julia's beauty. It was sun-like, and so were her eyes; not nothing by halves.

He looked at her and her mother, and blushed, and stood irresolute, avoiding their commands. This sudden shyness in a young person with his own sex paved the way. "You have a sad headache, Sir," said Mrs. Dodd; "oblige me by trying my salts."

He thanked her in a low voice.

"And smell, too," inquired Julia, "ought he to sit in the sun?"

"Certainly not. You had better sit there, Sir, and profit by the shade and our passing."

"Yes, mamma, but you know the real place where he ought to be, is Bed."

"Oh, pray don't say that," implored the patient.

But Julia continued, with unabated severity, "And that is the place he would go this minute, if I was his mamma."

"Instead of his junior, and a stranger," said Mrs. Dodd, somewhat coldly, dwelling with a very slight monitory emphasis on the "stranger."

Julia said nothing, but drew in perceptibly, and was dead silent.

"Oh, madam!" said Hardie, eagerly, "I do not dispute her authority; nor yours. You have a right to send me where you please, after your kindness in noticing my infernal head, and doing me the honor to speak to me, and bidding me this. But if I go to bed, my head will be my master. Besides, I shall throw away what little chance I have of making your acquaintance; and the race just coming off!"

"We will not usurp authority, Sir," said Mrs. Dodd, quietly: "but we know what a severe headache is, and should be glad to see you sit still in the shade, and excite yourself as little as possible."

"Yes, madam," said the youth, humbly, and sat down like a lamb. He glanced now and then at the island, and now and then peered up at the radiant young mute beside him.

The silence was still all it was broken by a fish out of water.

An under-graduate in spectacles came mooning along, all out of his element. It was Mr. Kennet, who used to rise at four every morning to his Plato, and to sip Shoreditch Hill every afternoon, wet or dry, to cool his head for his evening work. With what view he deviated to Henley, has not yet been ascertained; he was blind as a bat, and did not care a button about any earthly boat-race, except the one in the Zeneid, even if he could have seen one. However, nearly all the men of his college went to Henley, and perhaps some branch, hitherto unexplored, of animal magnetism, drew him after. At any rate, there was his body; and his mind at Oxford and Athens, and other vendable but irrelevant cities. He brightened at sight of his dodge, and poked him warmly if he had heard the news.

"No; what? Nothing wrong, I hope?"

"Why, two of our men are gone; that is all," said Kennet, affecting with withering irony to undervalue his intelligence.

Confound it, Kennet, how you frightened me! I was afraid there was some screw loose with the crew."

At this very instant, the smoke of the pistol was seen to puff out from the island, and Hardie rose to his feet. "They are off!" cried he to the ladies, and, after first looking his apology together with a hypocritical look of apology, he laid one hand on a tree, and one foot on the sedgy bank, and sprang like a mountain goat on to the bow, lighting on the very gunwale. The position was not tenable for an instant, but he extended one foot very nimbly and boldly, and planted it on the other gunwale; and there he was in a moment, bareheaded and all, in an attitude as large and inspired, as the boldest gesture antiquity has committed to marble; he had even the advantage over the ancient gods of the sculptured forms of Greece. But a double opera-glass at his eye "spoiled the lot," as Mr. Punch says.

I am not to be; for this incidents of a distant race coming nearer and nearer. The main features are always the same, only this time it was more exciting to our kind friends, on account of Edward's high stake in it. And then their grateful though refractory patient, an authority in their eyes, and a hero, all but a river-god, stood poised in air, and in excited whispers interpreted each distant and unintelligible feature down to them:

"Cambridge was off quickest."

"But not much."

"Any body's race at present, madam."

"If this lasts long we may win. None of them can stay like us."

"Come, the favorite is not so very dangerous."

"Cambridge looks best."

"I wouldn't change with either, so far."

"Now, in forty seconds more, I shall be able to pick out the winner."

Julia went up his ladder of thrills to a high state of excitement; and, indeed, they were all so tossed to racing pitch, that some metal nerve or other seemed in jar inside all three, when the piercing, grating voice of Kennet broke in suddenly with,

"How do you construe γιγνωσκουσι?"

The wretch had burrowed in the intellectual ruins of Greece the moment the pistol went off, and coolly set to work, with the double opera-glass, and his great impulse was to brain the judicious Kennet, gaping up to him for an answer, with open mouth, and like supernatural eyes of dead sophists in the sun.

"How do you construe 'Hoc ego?' you incongruous dog! Hold your tongue, and mind the race!"

"There, I thought so! Where's your three to one now? The Cockneys are out of this event, my way. Go on, Universities, and order their suppers!"

"But, which is first, Sir?" asked Julia, imploringly. "Or, which is first of all?"

"Neither. Never mind; it looks well. London is pumped, and if Cambridge can't lend him a dozen stiff ones on the post, Oxford will be ours. Now, look out! By Jove, we are ahead!"

The leading boats came on, Oxford pulling a long, lofty, swinging stroke, as though as if it never could compete with the quick action of its competitor. Yet it was undeniably ahead, and gaining, at every swing.

Young Hardie writhed on his perch. He screeched at them across the Thames: "Now pulled Stroke! Now pulled all! Splendidly pulled, Dodd! You are walking away from them altogether! Oxford for ever! Oxford for-ever-r-r-r hurrah!" The gun went off over the heads of the Oxford crew in advance, and even Mrs. Dodd and Julia could see by their narrow vanishing that they had won.

"We have won at last!" cried Julia, all on fire, "and fairly; only think of that!"

Hardie turned round, glowing in beauty for sliding with his university. "Yes, and the fools may thank me; or rather my man, Dodd. Dodd forever! Hurrah!"

At this climax even Mrs. Dodd took a gentle share in the youthful enthusiasm that was boiling around her, and her soft eyes sparkled, and she returned the fervid pressure of her daughter's hand; and both their faces were flushed with gratified pride and delight.

"Dodd!" broke in the incongruous dog," with a voice just like a sow's. "Dodd! Ah, that's the man who is just plowed for smalls."

Ice has its thunder-bolts.

ADMIRAL PORTER'S DUMMY.

We publish on page 236 an illustration of "ADMIRAL PORTER'S SECOND DUMMY," from a photograph made from a model. Several readers and others who was best fitted to illustrate the craft. We need hardly explain that this second Dummy, like the first, was merely an imitation. Monitor, made of a few planks and some tar barrels, and intended to frighten the Vicksburg rebels. We are permitted by a distinguished officer of the navy to copy the following extracts from a letter recently received by him from the gallant Admiral:

"YAZOO RIVER, March 15, 1863.

"I have not sent you a sketch for some time, because up to it by the one inclosed.

"Much as we have come to mourn over the loss of the Indianola, I don't suppose that a more ridiculous thing ever occurred than the blowing up of this gun-boat after the rebels had her so securely in their possession; and it will hardly be believed when the history of this war is written that a wooden dummy could have achieved so remarkable a victory.

"I must confess, however, that the dummy was a much more formidable looking vessel than the Indianola in every respect—especially her wooden gun, which was a monster.

"After passing the batteries at night, and defying all the rebel rams, including the lay a wake day opposite the canal—the rebels trying in vain to get her, and one of them a moment discovering their error—when she got in the current again, she 'sailed in' on the Queen of the West (which vessel had just arrived at Warrenton, when it was amusing to see that rebel rammer clap on steam and vamoose the ranche. Indeed, she never stopped until she came to Yazoo City; but finding that the grim monster was after her, they applied the torch, and blew her and every thing in her to atoms. It was a great sight to see her burn, for we could imagine the damage the Indianola could have effected on the river in case she had been saved. But it was not to be; for this all the Confederate iron-clads she went up the spout or down below to 'Davy' to confabb with her friends. Night before last I read another terrific monster—a perfect imitation of our Lafayette, which latter vessel dropped down and passed the river in the afternoon, and shelled the fortifications with a few 100-pounders. At 11 o'clock at night her dummy immediately commenced operations before the batteries, belching out huge volumes of smoke through her keel-barrel chimneys, and the way the rebels prepared her was a caution to all dummies. But undrifted by unscathed, stood the fire of the Warrenton batteries, and went on her mission own the stream as calm as a May morning, until the Carthage batteries, twenty miles below, pitched into her, and she still, like old Brown's soul, kept moving on. This little military sport must have cost the rebels a thousand charges of powder and the bursting and dismounting of five or six guns.

"The next time we try this game they will find something better than 'dummies' to practice at."

IN THE BAYOUS

Our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis, has sent us sketches of the work of CUTTING THROUGH THE SOUTHWESTERN BAYOUS, which we reproduce on page 236. With the sketches we receive the following correspondence, which is interesting:

"ARMY OF THE TENNESSEE, NEAR YOUNG'S POINT, TUESDAY Night, March 17, 1863.

"The present stage of water in the Mississippi has, as you are aware, partially overflowed the Louisiana shore opposite Vicksburg; has encroached upon the encampments of our troops compelling one of the corps of the army to remove to Milliken's Bend and has even threatened the sacred precincts of the dead. One of the many plans which have been here, where the defenders of the republic who fell in battle last December, and who have since perished of disease, are now lying in peaceful rest, but with glorious suggestiveness, has been inundated by the flood, and the graves are but partially visible above the surface of the turbid overflowing waters.

"Melancholy, touchingly sad, looks the rough, heroic cemetery when the sky is clouded and the moon leaves us more and more, as if in pity, upon the buried heroes whom Fortune has not spared and the elements will not respect. It would seem, in a poetic mood, as if the pale priestess of heaven were offering up a prayer in her nightly vigils for the gallant dead, whom a grateful nation's memory should embalm, as they lie in their narrow tombs so far away from their native homes, with no requiem save the mournful Mississippi chants, and no audible lament but that the soft Southern breezes waft over this dull and dreary shore.

"ARMY OF THE TENNESSEE, GENERAL STUART'S DIVISION, NEAR YOUNG'S POINT, LOUISIANA, Thursday Evening, March 19, 1863.

"Near this point, on Muddy Bayou, it is proposed to effect an entrance into Steele's Bayou, and thence into Yazoo River, some miles above Haines's Bluff, which is the right of the rebel army at Vicksburg, and one of the strongest of the enemy's positions. Our troops have been in Steele's Bayou reconnoitring for two or three days, and an engagement, supported by infantry, is soon expected at Haines's Bluff, which is strongly fortified. The country hereabout is, as you know, very flat and swampy, and the level of the Yazoo at the present stage of water is lower than the Mississippi; but the water in Muddy Bayou flows to and from the great parent stream.

"To reach Steele's Bayou it is necessary to construct corduroy roads and bridges, and these are being rapidly built; Stuart's division having already done so much, and begun their march into the interior. The distance to Steele's Bayou is not much over a mile, and our troops are now speedily be encamped upon the banks of the Yazoo. The road thither is naturally very difficult, as I myself experienced, as you will observe by the sketches I inclose. One is necessitated to wade, to cross logs, to build rafts, in short to convert himself into an amphibious animal.

"Two of the Union transports of small size, the Eagle and Silver Wave, have already gotten into Steele's Bayou, and into the Yazoo, but not without serious damage to their upper works from the thick boughs and trunks of the impelling gum, cottonwood, and cypress trees. The exertion one is compelled to make in bayou navigation down here at this season, the thermometer ranging at 90° and upward, causes a copiousness of perspiration equal to that supposed, in the popular apologue of the day, to proceed from an African endeavoring to assist at an American election. The season here is quite far advanced. The trees are green; the fruit trees and blackberry bushes all in bloom; the birds singing as merrily as if such a thing as secession had never been.

"Stuart's Division are working hard, and the General himself has doffed his coat and toils like a Trojan with his men; believing very justly that a commander's example is necessary to animate and encourage his soldiers. Stuart is emphatically, as I have styled him, a 'working general,' is energetic, patriotic, determined, and has already distinguished himself for his ability and gallantry on several hard-fought fields."

THE FIGHT AT NEWBERN.

We illustrate on page 237 the unsuccessful attempt of the rebels to take Newbern, North Carolina, on 14th ult., from a sketch by Mr. E. Forbes. The article given the following account of the affair:

"NEWBERN, NORTH CAROLINA, March 14, 1863.

"The quiet of this department was disturbed today at 9 o'clock P.M., while at dress parade, by the arrival of a courier from Deep Gully, stating that our outposts were driven in by the rebels, who were in force in the direction of Kinston. In an instant all was in commotion, and at half past 8 the Forty-sixth, the Fifth, and Twenty-fifth Regiments of Infantry, with Belger's Battery of 6 guns, of Illinois, were en route on the march to the scene of conflict. Our route lay up the Trent road (if road it might be called), through a dense forest of timber, while at every step the men would sink to their knees in mud and water; yet with all these obstacles they pushed on until the 12 o'clock had reached the outermost picket post, where it was thought best by General Palmer to halt, as the main force, with Companies E, B, G, and F, of the 46th, under the charge of Lieutenant-Colonel Walkley, took the road at the right and marched directly down to the Red House station, and there formed in line of battle. At daylight on the morning of the 13th the cavalry of that station traversed the adjoining woods and finding no enemy returned. At this moment we heard heavy firing in the direction of Newbern, and shortly after a courier arrived with a dispatch ordering our immediate return, as Newbern was attacked by a large force from the other side of the River Neuse. The troops, much fatigued from the previous evening's march and loss of sleep, with three hearty cheers took 'double-quick' on the return march. When within four miles of Newbern we could see the smoke of exploding shells as they dropped in the woods occupied by the rebels; these came from our gun-boats, which were constantly plying up and down the river. Hardly had our troops formed in line of battle on the River Neuse to protect several regiments of troops which were ordered over the river to check the advance of the rebels, when another courier arrived from the outposts that we had just left, bringing information that the rebels were driving in our pickets and rapidly advancing on the city. At this juncture of affairs the brigade of General Lee, composed of the Forty-sixth, Twenty-fifth, and Fifth Massachusetts, were again ordered back to check their further march. A third time in the short space of twenty-four hours we had taken the double-quick, without rest and with but little food to eat. During this time an incessant firing was kept up by our gun-boats, which had the effect of silencing the batteries of the enemy on the river. I herewith send you a sketch of the scene, as presented during a part of the day, 13th inst. We are on an island with our troops, batteries, and all the paraphernalia of war brought into requisition in better order than on this occasion. The view is taken on the grand scene. For miles above and below the banks were lined with troops and citizens, while the rattle of troops, the fire of cannon, the roar of cannon, the bursting shells, all gave evidence of the horrors as well as the grandeur of war. The rebels had arrived to occupy Newbern on this day, it being the anniversary of the day on which they lost the city by the valor of our brave troops. The last three days have been eventful ones to our arms, as they have shown that our new regiments are firm, and can be relied on whenever called to act as experienced veterans and under trying circumstances. Lee's Brigade is now in pursuit of the rebels on the Trent, and as the mail closes directly I must close without giving the sequel of their proceedings. The city is safe and order is being restored."

THE WANDERER.

SAD Autumn's tears were falling
Mournfully;
Stern Winter's voice was calling
Scornfully;
Pining for Spring, the withered leaves decayed,
Or wildly flew to find the missing maid.

I knelt there in my sorrow
Tearfully:
I thought upon the morrow
Fearfully:
Despised, forgotten, friendless, and alone,
I knelt and wept upon that cold, cold stone.

Why did she die—the last, the Nearest one?
Oh, for her gentle love and Dearest one!
Why will he not return to my lone heart?
Forget, forgive, and love me, ne'er to part?

Sister, my heart is breaking!
'Twas so true!
Can you not hear its aching
Call for you?
Tell him I'm dying—dying here alone—
Dying for grief—for you, for him, my own!

The dead leaves rustle 'neath a
Manly tread:
A whisper—in his shoulder
Rests her head.
She is forgiven—by the cold white stone.
She often kneels there now, but not alone.

THE BATTLE AT NEWBERN—REPULSE OF THE REBELS, MARCH 14, 1863.—[See Page 235.]

THE LITTLE RED SLIPPER.

The baby lay in a golden cradle, with a purple satin coverlet over it, but if it had had a dirty face and been kicking on the mud floor of a cabin, it couldn't have been more obstreperous. It hadn't the first idea of etiquette. There it lay kicking up its fat legs, its great blue eyes staring at every thing, just as wide awake and mutinous a baby as you ever saw in your life.

The doctors pronounced it a case of activity on the brain, and declared that it should be kept perfectly quiet—all but one, who hinted at a spanking, and was sent out to be executed at once, as if any thing could be kept quiet that was jerking, and jumping, and twitching in every finger and toe, and that would be full, and sniffed disdainfully at Madame Squazzalog, the court prima donna, who was quite hoarse and red in the face with singing lullabies.

The queen-mother went into hysterics, the king flew into a rage, and the courtiers, who couldn't get a wink of sleep, were quite in despair, when at this juncture was heard a rustling in the chimney, and with a great pounding of grandpapa stockings and a treasonable thumping of a mouse-skin cloak, down came baby's fairy godmother, and casting a look of immense contempt on all about her—for all the magic words, "Once upon a time," Baby hushed on the instant. Once upon a time, repeated the fairy, there was a palace called the palace of Crepuscule, where the wind, and rain, and snow came in through great holes in the roof and walls, and the courtiers caught cold in their nobles, and stood up to their knees in drifts, and pretended to know nothing about it, because it was treason or almost that to find fault in any thing about it could possibly be bettered; and in this palace six hundred cooks, four hundred grooms, seven hundred footmen, and one poet, were busy night and day, for Prince Progressita, the king's only son, was about to be married to a princess who had a hump, thin red hair, and an outrageous squint.

The courtiers, led off by the poet, declared that her hump stood highness was an beautiful as the morning; but the prince, who insisted on having ideas of his own, was not a little sulky over his approaching bargain, and the first one fine morning, as the Principal Nomskull came to draw his curtains, as a Principal Nomskull had done for the last four hundred years, kicked off his wig into the very face of the Lord High Fiddlestick standing just behind him, called them all a set of humbugs, and drove them out of the room. The Lord High Fiddlestick ran down the palace stairs, three steps at a jump, his pink velvet slippers falling off, and his green suits dreadfully ornamented with gilt lace behind him. The Duke of Fussification ran to tell it to the Lord of the Bedchamber, who was frustrated by the news to such an extent that he spilled all the powder that he was weighing out for the princess. The Principal Nomskull rushed to the queen, who dropped her crown into the pan in which she was frying dough-nuts, while the king sent post haste for the court philosopher, Dr. Dilloxs, A.K.L.S.T.C.M.Q.X.

Meanwhile Prince Progressita mounted here and rode off into the country, the place where yeomen of his time always went to seek their fortune, and the road went at first through a great forest that began to quiver, and get into as small commotion, crying out from every leaf and vine as the Prince rode on, "Go back, you fool, go back!" whispering and gibbering round him, while the thin ugly faces peering out from every crevice, and startling his horse with airy things swinging right across his way. When the sun had all done its antics things seemed trying in their way to stop him. Gnarled roots writhed across the path and tripped him; the brambles caught and tore his velvet doublet, till he looked like a piece of tatterdemalion; the sunlight, that had stolen along quietly enough under cover of the bushes, now flashed out broad and foaming across the road at every turn, forcing him to wade it again and again. The air was full of malicious chatter and hustle, swarming about him, besetting and delaying him on every side, but he would not relinquish his task when the sunlight faded away. The forest fell into twilight sadness and gloom, and stumbling on a bank, the Prince soon broke his neck, for Prince Progressita, chilled, hungry, and weary, to make his way on foot as well as he could through the brambles and shadowy undergrowth of the forest.

A nice position for a Prince whose satin curtains were drawn every morning by the Principal Nomskull! not half so bad, however, as a humpbacked bride, thought he, and pushing boldly on he came to a bat whose wing he was hurriedly going to clear hearth, and an old woman sitting by it spinning, who gave the Prince a crust of bread, and a bed in the corner of the hut, without speaking or stopping in her work. The last thing that the Prince heard as he fell asleep was the hum, hum, hum, buz of the wheel.

Early in the morning she was at him, shaking him.

"What is your name?" she asked, with a shake.

"Prince Progressita, of Crepuscule," answered the Prince, opening her method with that of the Principal Nomskull.

But the old woman turned up her nose.

"I know better than that. I have seen Prince Progressita at Court. He is no more like you than he is like me. The Prince is a well-looking fellow enough, but you are a genuine vagabond as ever I set eyes upon. There is not a bit of the Prince about you. However, I have some trees that need cutting. If you are willing to earn your victuals well —if not, you can pack."

"Sir, it was my purple velvet doublet that made the Prince," thought Progressita, a little vexed, but, putting an axe over his shoulder, he started for the wood. "I'm rags I am like any other vagabond; but, at any rate, I had rather cut down trees than set breakfast with my Lord High Fiddlestick and those other ceremonious humbugs." But if there had been whispering and giggling in the forest yesterday it was ten times worse to-day. The leaves shook with laughter; the brook that had so splashed him yesterday was chuckling, at his very elbow. Every where little voices were calling:

"Fee-setter, come as fast as you can.
For Prince Progressita is your man;"

and as he hacked and hewed away at the stout old trees, it seemed as if the spiteful elves couldn't contain themselves for fun—why he found out, as each down, when he discovered that the wood had grown as fast as he could cut it, and that there wasn't so much as a bit of dry bone for the fame, who was waiting for him in the cottage-door.

"A pretty Prince you are," she said, gruffly, "that couldn't bring home a stick of dry wood little finger;" but she gave him, notwithstanding, an excellent dinner, and a bed soft as his own at Crepuscule, and the next morning he went to work down, when he discovered that the wood had grown as fast as he could cut it, and that there wasn't so much as a bit of dry bone for the dame, who was waiting for him in the cottage-door.

"A pretty Prince you are," she said, gruffly, "that couldn't bring home a stick of dry wood little finger;" but she gave him, notwithstanding, an excellent dinner, and a bed soft as his own at Crepuscule, and the next morning he went to work.

"Since you have no luck with the axe, perhaps you can catch me some fish; there are royal trout in the brook."

But it was even worse than it had been before. The trout dashed up every time, and went into from top to toe; the water, that seemed all alive with mischief, wound his line about stumps and stones, or carried off altogether. The fish landed at his bait, and, swimming off, popped up their heads at him in derision; and the very frogs sitting on the bank croaked at him till they were hoarse with their scorn, as he went home, with a basket as empty as his stomach, to the old woman, who was waiting for him at the cottage-door.

But she was even kinder than before. She gave him a better dinner still, and softer bed, and said to him in the morning:

"You are an awkward lout, since you can neither cut wood nor catch fish; but you have patience and perseverance, and perhaps they can use your eyes better than your hands. Go out now and see what you can find in the fields."

So he went out, and this time there was neither laughing nor whispering, but all the forest was in a quiver and shake with fear and affright, and hundreds of voices were calling to him.

"This way, this way; look here."

But all the noise came from above; and Prince Progressita, being a man, was, as all men are, Baby, perverse; and, out of his natural perversity, looking carefully about every where, but where his on the ground, a tiny red slipper with a golden heel, a diamond buckle, and a pair of little violet strings, that fluttered from the top of each shoe in his bosom.

The moment that this was done the forest grew suddenly still, and looking up he saw the old woman whom he had left in the cottage, and who, as he now must have guessed long ago, Baby, was his fairy godmother.

"He does well who finds the slipper, but he does better who keeps it," she said to him. "As you love your life, beware how you let it out of your bosom; verbum sap;" which meant, Baby, that he was to go about his business with his eyes shut accordingly, and journeyed on till he came to a castle over the gates of which was written:

"This is the castle of Fussification, the home of the giant Opinion, who has in ward the loveliest princess in the world for the prince who has courage to woo her."

Our Prince, who was naturally anxious to see the most beautiful damsel in the world, had no sooner read this than he walked in at the gate straight up the steps, but before he had time to knock the doors flew open wide, and the giant himself called out,

"Come in, Prince Progressita, pray come in. You are quite welcome. You are a four-and-twenty princes to make a pie, and I have only twenty-three."

At which Prince Progressita only smiled, being tolerably well used to humbug at home, and went in.

It wasn't to be denied, however, that this giant had various little peculiarities not altogether pleasant; for to say nothing of his castle, which could never be looked on as any thing else than a well closed up of itself, and of his mouth, which looked as if it could swallow all the four-and-twenty princes at once, he had a way of chewing bones and coming at you, say with a leg sticking out at you from the door, a hand grasping from the chimney-corner, two or three fingers from the top of the middle of the floor, and eyes and tongues, of which he had a hundred each, glaring and calling from all manner of places, after a fashion that sometimes chilled Progressita's blood; the general effect being heightened by a fire of lambchops always going mournfully down to the kitchens below, from whence were heard voices, crying,

"Look sharp now, and spare Prince Valentine, and spare Prince Max, and tie up Prince Jonquil, and lay them evenly, and then roll the crust, for Prince Progressita will be here before long."

The giant, however, was vastly polite.

"Pray make yourself quite easy," he said, with a grin. "I shall be charmed to have you for a ward-in-law, and there is but one condition, an easy one. The Princess Vertia lacks but one thing in the world, which you must procure. So wise and witty a prince can guess, of course, what it is, and the Lord of Crepuscule can easily devise it. You have the rest of the day before you, and so certain am I of your success, that I won't even hint at the pin probabilities awaiting you should you fail."

And showing all his teeth in a horrible smile, the giant disappeared in the great arch below.

This was worse than fish that wouldn't be caught, and forests that would giggle. What on earth could it be that Princess Vertia lacked, that would it feel to be covered with pastry and baked? He could think of nothing but the three-and-twenty princes, bound and waiting for him to make up the row; and in this mournful condition he was pacing to and fro in the great hall of the castle, when he saw spring up just before him a tree that bloomed diamonds every moment, and sent forth leaves of emeralds at every instant.

"What can a Princess lack but such a tree as this?" said a voice. "Let the Prince lay down the slipper that is in his bosom, and the tree is his."

But Progressita remembered the words of the fairy, and reducing that all in that evil castle were his enemies, turned his back on the tree; but lo! there, on the window-sill, sang a bird the poems of all the nations under the sun, and so sweetly that Progressita forgot all about the giants and the three-and-twenty princes, till a voice cried, "What can the Princess Vertia lack but such a bird as this? and where is the prince in the Prince's bosom in comparison with his life?"

Progressita hesitated, and put his hand in his bosom; but the little wings fluttered away from his hand, as if frightened; and again remembering the fairy, he turned his back and walked off as fast as possible; at which the voice said, spitefully,

"Go and be served in a pasty, then!" and was silent till evening, when the castle began to glow with a light like moonlight, and doors flying open on a sudden, showed Progressita the giant and his ward Vertia, who was so lovely that the Prince forgot every thing in looking at her.

Her eyes were blue, like those violets that hide away in the dark of evening; her long hair was bright as gold, and fell down to her feet, braided with pearls and diamonds. On her wrist a bird sang sweetly, the perch of every nation under the sun, and a spray that bloomed diamonds and emeralds every minute was in her hand, her head. There was only one blemish on her beauty—she walked as if lame.

"This is the Princess Vertia," said the giant; "and I read in your hopeful face that you have guessed and supplied the only thing that she lacks?"

Progressita bowed, in token of her role, and displayed her little snow-white feet. On one was a tiny red slipper, with a diamond buckle, a golden heel, and a little violet string; but the other was bare; and this was plainly the cause of her lameness.

Then Progressita stood confounded, and the giant, with a malicious grin, leaned forward to seize him; but, recovering himself, the Prince put his hand in his bosom, and drew out the slipper, and fitted it on Vertia's lovely foot.

The giant uttered a howl, while from the dismal dens below arose a shout of joy; and Progressita unbound the three-and-twenty princes, and married Vertia, and lived happy.

"Why, the child's asleep, as I'm a fairy," broke off Baby's godmother, pulling up the purple coverlet over her little fat arms. "You see, now, all the needed was proper management."

"Proper management! She calls that nonsense proper management!" echoed the courtiers, in dismay, as her fairyship whisked up the slumbery, mouse-skin cloak and all.

PHELAN'S
Improved Billiard Tables
AND Combination Cushions.

These Billiard Tables have received the unqualified approval of the best players, and the most competent judges, who have universally pronounced them unequalled for greater exactness and durability.

Seven distinct Patents, for Improvements in Billiard Tables, have been granted to me by the United States Patent Office, and we have lately obtained a Patent from the French Government for our Improvements in Billiard Cushions.

We employ, in the construction of our Tables, a variety of machines specially made for the purpose, by means of which we are enabled to secure a scientific and mechanical accuracy hitherto unknown in Billiard Manufactory.

Having had many years experience through almost all of the appliances of billiards, and constantly on hand a large stock of the best and most thoroughly seasoned materials, we are prepared to furnish every thing required in the Billiard Line with unprecedented dispatch.

The eminent French Billiard Player, M. Berger, has published the following opinion:

"NEW YORK, 24 August, 1861.

"On the eve of leaving the United States, I am happy to declare to all amateurs of Billiards that, after a tour of eleven months through the principal cities, I have been enabled to judge in the most perfect manner of the superiority of the Billiard Tables manufactured by Phelan & Collender. The system of manufacture is so superior, that I am happy to introduce their style of cushion into France. They have united in combining the qualities of elasticity and firmness of the French Tables, of remarkable excellence and beauty. For these reasons I can recommend them to the decoration.

"BERGER, CLAUDIUS, Prof. of Billiards, Paris."

Parties ordering from us will find our prices as low as good work can possibly be made for. We will forward articles as a fair price, and will not make an inferior article to any party.

Orders by mail carefully and promptly executed. Illustrated Catalogues and Price Lists sent free. The "BILLIARD CIRCULAR," a journal published in the interest of Billiard Players, and containing the Latest Billiard News, a record of Billiard Matches, and every thing of interest to amateurs of Billiards, sent free on application.

Duryeas' Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a Prize Medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners, the competition of all prominent manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Prepared Corn Flour" of this and other countries notwithstanding. The food and luxury of the age, without a doubt. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Maizes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without eggs, given with few or no eggs, at a cost astonishing the most economical. A child's addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening brown sauces, gravies for fish and meat, and gravy, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. A little boiled in milk will produce rich Custard for coffee, chocolate, tea, &c. Put up in 1 pound packages, under the trademark "MAIZENA," with directions. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

☞ Original Letter at 294 Canal Street, New York:

J. T. C. Cook, publisher of The State Banner, Bennington, Vt., says he was attacked with DYSPEPSIA, and suffered so severely from it, that not a particle of food could be swallowed without occasioning the most uncommonly fortable sensation in his stomach. For five years he suffered from this dreadful complaint, when he used BRANDRETH'S PILLS. The first box did not seem to benefit him much, but he persisted in their use change, and by the time he had taken six boxes, a COMPLETE CURE was effected. He says: "My dyspepsia was gone, and my expectation, of an early death vanished."

Lyon's Kathairon.
This delightful article for preserving and beautifying the human hair is now put up by the original proprietress, and is now made with the same care, skill, and attention, which first created its immediate and unprecedented sales all over our million homes and firesides. It is still sold at 25 cents per bottle. The million bottles which were easily sold in a year, is a sufficient token that this is Kathairon is not only the most delightful hair dressing in the world, but that it cleanses the scalp of scurf and dandruff, gives the hair a lively, rich luxuriant growth, and prevents it from turning gray. These are considerations worth knowing. The Kathairon has been tested for over twelve years, and is warranted as described. Any lady who values a beautiful head of hair will use the Kathairon. It is finely perfumed, cheap and valuable. It is sold by all respectable dealers throughout the world.

RUNNING THE VICKSBURG BLOCKADE.

We publish on this page a drawing from a sketch by our special artist, Mr. Theodore R. Davis, representing the unsuccessful effort of the rams Switzerland and Lancaster to run the Vicksburg batteries on the night of 25-26th March. A rebel account mentioned the attempt of the rams, and stated that both were disabled and one sunk. A Union account says:

"Last Wednesday evening the rams Lancaster and Switzerland undertook to run the batteries at Vicksburg. As soon as they came within range the rebels opened a tremendous fire. The Lancaster was struck thirty times. Her entire bow was shot away, causing her to sink immediately, turning a complete somersault as she went down. All the crew except two escaped. The Switzerland was disabled by a 64-pound ball penetrating the steam-drum. She floated down, the batteries still firing and striking her repeatedly, until finally the Atlantross ran alongside and towed her to the lower mouth of the canal. The loss of life on her is not ascertained."

Our correspondent mentions an interesting circumstance. The Lancaster had just sunk under the terrible hail of shot and shell from the rebel batteries. The Switzerland was badly injured, the smoke and steam filling her completely. At that moment Colonel Ellet remembered or perceived that the flag was not in its right place. Instantly ascending to the deck, he caught the halyards and hoisted the bunting in the face of the cheering rebels, while the shower of lead and iron whistled round him. A very gallant exploit.

Colonel Ellet, in reply to a request from our correspondent, addressed him the following note:

"HEAD-QUARTERS M. M. BRIGADE, FLAG-SHIP 'ANTONIA,' March 28, 1863.

"You ask me 'how the contrabands behaved' on board the 'Ram Lancaster' during the passage of the Vicksburg batteries, the explosion of the boilers, and the sinking of my vessel? I am happy to have the pleasure of stating to you that while the white men on board behaved with the utmost coolness and the most heroic daring, the 'contrabands' were not less brave and fearless.

"Not one of them flinched, and they obeyed every command with precision and alacrity.

"Very respectfully,

"Your obedient servant,

"JOHN A. ELLET,

"Lieut.-Colonel Commanding Ram Lancaster."

SKETCHES AT GENERAL HOOKER'S HEAD-QUARTERS.

We devote pages 244 and 245 to illustrations of the HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, from sketches by Mr. A. R. Waud. Mr. Waud writes:

"The term 'head-quarters' conveys but a vague idea to the uninitiated. Most people are aware that the general lives and has his tent there, but of the necessity and use of the large train of officers that accompany the general few out of the army have a correct idea. In the first place, the general must have his personal aids, whose duty it is to be always in attendance, to assist their commander in his plans, carry dispatches of importance, make themselves conversant with the position of the army and the roads, and in battle direct, under the general's orders, the movements of the various corps, etc., etc. The chief of staff, whose tent is always near the general's, has a very onerous position. He must keep himself accurately posted on the actual condition of the army in all its departments, the intention and results of its movements, reconnoissances, etc. Through him the general's orders are transmitted, and it is his duty to furnish the commander-in-chief and the head of the War Department tables of the strength and position of corps and posts, reports of operations, and all necessary information. Next to the commander, the chief of staff is the man of the whole army who can do the most good if he is capable, and the most harm if deficient in ability.

"The remainder of the officers of head-quarters are chiefs of the departments in which the army is divided and their aids. The Adjutant-General's department, through which orders are published, reports and returns received and disposed of, tables formed of the state and detail of the army, records made, and much more. The Engineers', whose duty it is to construct fortifications, field defenses, roads, bridges, etc., and remove obstructions. The Topographical Engineers', whose duty it is to survey and map the country in which the army is to operate, attend reconnoissances, examine routes of communication by land and water both for supplies and military movements, and lay out new roads. The Chief of Artillery, in a siege or battle, directs the position of the artillery, and is responsible for the condition of that arm of the service. The Chief of Cavalry has similar duties in the cavalry. The Chief of Ordnance has charge of and furnishes all ordnance and ordnance stores for the military service; also equipments for mounted troops. The Inspector-General's duties are to inspect and report upon stores and animals, and every thing required to keep the army in good condition. The Medical Director attends to the entire working of that department, and after a battle makes lists of the killed and wounded; and at other times regulates the management of the hospitals, the distribution of medical supplies, etc. The Chief Commissary, through whom the army is fed. The Chief Quarter-master, by whom it is clothed, provided with tents and transportation. The Provost-Marshal General, who receives prisoners, and attends to the police of the army, including the secret-service department. The Chief Signal-officer, and many minor departments or sub-departments, such as the telegraph-office, the post-office, the balloon party, and others—all tend, with their necessary complement of clerks for office-work, orderlies for out-door purposes, servants, and grooms, to swell the proportions of the camp at head-quarters, which is, in fact—under the orders of the War Department—the seat of government, the metropolis, or capital, of the community which is formed by the presence of the army."

THE PRINCESS OF WALES AND HER BRIDEMAIDS.

We illustrated the marriage of the Prince of Wales very fully in our last number. In this, on page 253, we give a picture of the PRINCESS AND HER BRIDEMAIDS as they appeared at the altar.

THE RAMS "SWITZERLAND" AND "LANCASTER" RUNNING THE BLOCKADE AT VICKSBURG.—[SKETCHED BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

Our fair readers will doubtless take pleasure in studying out the dresses. The Times reporter thus described them:

The Princess's dress is embroidered white silk, trimmed with silver, which can best be discerned in rich designs glittering between the snowy folds. The traditional white is not, however, departed from, though over all she wears a slight bodice with open sleeves of white silk, embroidered with silver, and which, falling right, sets off her tapering waist and faultless symmetry of form to singular perfection. Her gorgeous train of white and silver is borne by eight young ladies, between the ages of twelve and twenty, the very choice and flower of the fair scion of our most ancient houses.

The young ladies thus honored with so fair a post in the long procession of this happy day are all the daughters of dukes, marquises, or earls, whose titles are almost as familiar in the mouth of our kings of old. They were Lady Victoria Alexandra Montagu Douglas Scott, daughter of the Duke of Buccleuch; Lady Theodora Cavendish, daughter of the Marquis of Westminster; Lady Diana Bridgeman, daughter of the Duke of Bedford; Lady Alma Bruce, daughter of the Earl of Elgin; Lady Victoria Hare, sister of the Earl of Listowel; Lady Victoria Yorke, daughter of the Earl of Hardwicke; Lady Victoria Alexandrina Elizabeth Campbell, daughter of the Earl of Cawdor; Lady Constance Villiers, daughter of the Earl of Clarendon; Lady Ernestine Emma Horatia Mostyn Edwardes, daughter of the Earl of Mount Edgecumbe; and Lady Florence Georgina Cecilia Wellesley, daughter of Earl Cowley.

It is quite superfluous to say how they looked, as, robed in snowy white and wrapped in veils, they followed their royal mistress, with soft cowslips, though, as they were not going to be married, they seemed to think themselves relieved from the necessity of looking as the proper and glanced about and turned to one and another, and made believe to look at they did not know and kept what they commanded almost their full tribute of admiration, every behind such a help in such a scene as this. Imaginations must draw their pictures, for words would fail to paint them. Tinsel dresses of white—a wonderful mixture of silk and lace that made them seem ethereal in their lightness, and a wreath of orange blossoms with veils they pieced so splendidly as a vision which can not be forgotten or described.

Another writer says:

The Princess's wedding-dress consisted of a petticoat of pearl-white satin, trimmed with the rose, thistle, and shamrock, trimmed with four rows of silver lace round the bottom, and the top ornamented in the same way, and gathered about and turned to one and another, and made believe to look at they did not know and kept what they commanded almost their full tribute of admiration, every behind such a help in such a scene as this. Imaginations must draw their pictures, for words would fail to paint them. Tinsel dresses of white—a wonderful mixture of silk and lace that made them seem ethereal in their lightness, and a wreath of orange blossoms with veils they pieced so splendidly as a vision which can not be forgotten or described.

Another writer says:

The Princess's wedding-dress consisted of a petticoat of pearl-white satin, trimmed with the rose, thistle, and shamrock, trimmed with four rows of silver lace round the bottom, and the top ornamented in the same way, and gathered up each side with true lover's knots of silver lace. The bodice and sleeves were composed of the same costly material. The train of the bridesmaids were composed of a rich white glace silk, covered with tulle chiffe, the bottom finished with a robe of beautiful design of leaves, the whole one looped up in sprays all round with bouquets of lily-of-the-valley, and shamrocks. From the waist fell a long tulle tunique, festooned upon one side with two long wreaths of orange flowers, one, the largest of leaves trimmed to correspond with tulle and flowers. Coiffure, a wreath of heather, and shamrocks, with a long tulle veil falling from the back of the head.

The Illustrated London News says:

The Princess looked as beautiful as she did on Saturday—beautiful as we trust she will for many and many a long year to come, and evidently in the enjoyment of enormous agitation: her eyes were downcast, and it was easy to perceive the tremulous motion of the large bosom of orange-flowers she carried. Her dress, of satin, the best Spitalfields fabrication, was of white lace over white silk, richly decked with orange-blossoms, and a train of the same proof was supported by eight bridesmaids, all mingled with her soft brown hair, which was set off admirably by a tiara of de Clermont set in diamonds, but had sufficient abundance given to it to permit one of those long, graceful curls she sets so regularly to adorn her back. For all ornament she wore the superb parure of pearls and diamonds presented to her by the Queen. Her train, which was of great length, was of white silk, and was borne by eight young Mlle. demoiselle—daughters of earls—who officiated as bridesmaids.

SOLILOQUY OF THE SPANISH CLOISTER.

BY ROBERT BROWNING.

GR-R-R—there go, my heart's abhorrence!
Water your damned flower-pots, do!
If hate killed men, Brother Lawrence,
God's blood, would not mine kill you!
What? your myrtle-bush wants trimming?
Oh, that rose has prior claims—
Needs its leaden vase filled brimming?
Hell dry you up with its flames!

At the meal we sit together:
Salve tibi! I must hear
Wise talk of the kind of weather,
Sort of season, time of year:
Not a plenteous harvest guaranty,
Save we hope oat-gulls, I doubt:
What's the Latin name for "parsley"
What's the Greek name for Swine's Snout?

Whew! We'll have our platter burnished,
Laid with care on our own shelf!
With a fine-new spoon we're furnished,
And a goblet for ourself,
Rinsed like some sacrificial
Ere 'tis fit to touch our chaps—
Marked with L. for our initial!
(He, he! There his lily snaps!)

Saint, forsooth! While brown Dolores
Squats outside the Convent bank,
With Sanchicha, telling stories,
Steeping tresses in the tank,
Blue-black, lustrous, thick like horse-hairs
—Can I see his dead eye glow
Bright, as 'twere a Barbary corsair's?
(That is, if he'd let it show!)

When he finishes refection,
Knife and fork he never lays
Cross-wise, to my recollection,
As do I, in Jesu's praise.
I, the Trinity illustrate,
Drinking watered orange-pulp—
In three sips the Arian frustrate;
While he drains his at one gulp!

Oh, those melons! If he's able,
We're to have a feast; so nice!
One goes to the Abbot's table,
All of us get each a slice.
How go on your flowers? None double?
Not one fruit-sort can you spy?
Strange!—And I, too, at such trouble,
Keep 'em close-nipped on the sly!

There's a great text in Galatians,
Once you trip on it, entails
Twenty-nine distinct damnations,
One sure, if another fails.
If I trip him just a-dying,
Sure of heaven as surprised he,
Spin him round and send him flying
Off to Hell, a Manichee?

Or, my scrofulous French novel,
On gray paper with blunt type!
Simply glance at it, you grovel
Hands and feet Beelzebub's gripe!
If I double down its pages
At the woeful sixteenth print,
When he gnashes his great-gages,
Ope a sieve and slip it in't?

Or, there's Satan!—one might venture
Pledge one's soul to him, yet leave
Such a flaw in the indenture
As he'd miss till, past retrieve,
Blasted lay that rose-acacia
We're so proud of! Hy, Zy, Hine . . .
'St, there's vespers! Pleni gratiâ
Ave, Virgo! Gr-r-r—you swine!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1863.

CHARLESTON.

As we go to press the public mind is intensely anxious about Charleston. A dispatch from rebel sources mentions that our troops landed in force, on Folly Island, to the south of Stono inlet, on John's Island. Letters from our own people allude to the advance of at least one of our regiments to within nine miles of Charleston. The Rebel Government allows it to be known that Admiral Dupont expected to attack the water defenses of the place about 6th April. The landing, between which movements the public infer that Charleston has been or is being attacked, and loyal people await the result with intense anxiety. The capture of Charleston would strike a blow to the rebellion as severe as the capture of New Orleans; while, on the other hand, the repulse of Hunter and Dupont would considerably discourage the North.

From the elaborate map of Charleston and its vicinity, which we published in a recent number, it can readily be discovered that the place has been made very formidable indeed. For over a year the most skillful engineers in the South have been engaged in fortifying it. The lands, between which vessels must pass to enter the harbor, are studded with forts and batteries; and from the best information that could be obtained, the officers are of opinion that not less than 1000 guns are in position, commanding the channel, the inlets, and the various roads traversing James and Sullivan's Islands. Although the mouth of the harbor is stretched a row of piles or obstructions—which, so long as they remain there, close all access and egress—beyond with these are numerous torpedoes, and other explosive machines, the effect of which may be imagined from the fact that one of them exploding under the Merrimac lifted her out of the foot coat of water. These obstructions passed, a hostile fleet would then have to encounter Fort Sumter—which has been ironclad, and some people foolishly report, or clad with Palmetto logs, of which there are none to be had—but which has undoubtedly been strengthened very considerably, and Fort Moultrie, which is now a most formidable work, having been entirely rebuilt by General Shipley; a new and powerful work in the centre of the harbor by General Beauregard; and the rebel iron-clad fleet, including a number of transformed floating batteries, etc. Such is the prospect before Admiral Dupont and his fleet.

We know less about the land defenses than about the works on the sea-board. But it has been pretty well known that extensive and careful engineering works have been thrown up by Beauregard on every avenue leading to the city by which an army could approach, and scoured with guns of large calibre. In addition to all these works the rebels have an army the strength of which it is difficult to conjecture. As, however, every available man has been put in the army, it is probably fair to presume that at Charleston and Savannah there must be 60,000 rebels under the lead of their ablest men, all concentrated within a few hours at any point desired.

It will thus be seen that General Hunter and Admiral Dupont have no holiday task before them. We will not infringe the rules of the Department by stating what we know of the strength of our forces in that quarter, or of the ingenious devices which have been contrived for the purpose of overcoming torpedoes and obstructions, and destroying floating batteries. It may suffice to say that if the rebels are formidable, so are their antagonists. If Beauregard's troops will fight with the desperation of men contending for their homes, our gallant soldiers will, on the other hand, strain every nerve to punish the detestable city which was the cradle of the rebellion. The determination of the contending Generals it is difficult to speak. Beauregard, who was much praised at the outbreak of the rebellion, is now held very cheap by the rebel Government. General Hunter his never had an opportunity of showing what he can do, but those who know him best are confident he will give a good account of himself.

We can say no more. If the deadly struggle has begun, then GOD DEFEND THE RIGHT!

WAR AND TRADE.

BEFORE the rebellion broke out, it was a common saying at the South that the North could not fight the South because its prosperity was bound up with the free export of Southern staples. Trade tables were quoted to show that over two-thirds our exports were of Southern growth, while nine-tenths of our importations were landed at Northern ports: whence it was inferred that, in default of Southern cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar, and turpentine, the Northern States would be unable to pay for the foreign manufactures which they consumed, and would inevitably become bankrupt. This sort of reasoning was ventilated not only in Southern journals and speeches, but in Northern papers devoted to the Southern cause, and in such British pro-slavery organs all the London Times.

We have now before us the returns of the trade of the first year of war. Sumter was bombarded on 12th April, 1861, and the war actually commenced on 15th of that month. The fiscal year 1861–62 commenced on 1st July, 1861, and ended on 30th June, 1862. It was from first to last a year of war. Yet our foreign commerce during that year shows an aggregate exportation of $293,790,750, against an aggregate import of $205,819,823, thus leaving a balance in favor of the country of $23,970,457. These figures show a much larger balance than the average for the past ten years. Of Southern products—cotton, tobacco, rice, and turpentine—we were in the habit, before the war, of sending to Europe over $200,000,000 worth, and the falling in the export of these staples very largely exceeded this sum. In 1851–52 we exported barely $141,000,000 of these articles, and we probably imported an equal amount. It seems, however, that our consumption of foreign goods has declined with our exports, and that, in fact, the first year of the war left us at least as well off, so far as foreign nations are concerned, as any previous year of peace.

The great drain on compensation, which politicians and merchants so constantly neglect, and which none but thoughtful statisticians understand, left the value of our exports of gold and which made up for the decrease in our exports of cotton, and simultaneously reduced our imports by so much as the South was in the habit of consuming.

Southern sympathizers—now known as Copperheads—predicted in 1860 that in the event of war our supply of gold would be drawn from us. Notwithstanding the fact that the bulk of our foreign merchants have remitted their means in gold or its equivalent—exchange—to Europe, for the sake of safety, during the year with the single exception of the abnormal year 1860–'61, the specie export of the year 1861–'62, $36,886,966, was less than the average of the twelve 1850–'54. We received from our mines, during that year, more specie than we sent abroad. The export during the current year will be heavier, but it will not approach the figures of 1855, 1856, or 1860, and it will fall considerably short of that of the year 1857.

In estimating the foreign trade of the United States care must always be taken not to forget the movement of stocks. From 1853 to 1857 Federal, State, county, city, and railway stocks constituted a great staple export. Every steamer took out large parcels, thus swelling the balance of trade in our favor, and helping to pay for the foreign goods we consumed. After the revulsion of 1857 this foreign demand for our securities fell off, and the mismanagement of our railroads, and other works, assisted by the dishonest conduct of certain Western communities, led to a pretty general return of American securities from Europe. From 1858 to 1861 every steamer brought back European capital invested with American stocks. About the close of the year 1861 the tide changed again, though almost imperceptibly. The European markets had been denuded of American securities, and a fresh inquiry for them arose. For the past year the current has flowed eastward. It has at times been so slight as to defy observation. At other times, as latterly, it has been very active indeed. At present we are exporting considerable sums to an amount which will tell very sensibly on our foreign exchanges.

THE LOUNGER.

"THE LEAGUE OF STATES."

THIS is the title of a paper in Harper's Magazine for January, which has been reprinted in pamphlet form by Mr. C. B. Richardson. The author is the historian Benson J. Lossing, and it presents in a clear, concise, and conclusive manner the development of the instinct of nationality from which the American Confederation, and finally the American Union, sprung. No man familiar with our history, or closely observant of our life, but feels that the Union is merely the word by which we express the fact of the nation. It was the instinct of nationality that made the Constitution and the Union. It was not the nation that was made by the Union. That only gave the inevitable political form to the fact. Nationality is a sentiment; a feeling; an instinct. It can not be repressed. It can not be dissolved. If every State in the country should separate from every other . . . the reunion of the nation would instantly . . . to work, and they would all gravitate to . . . again into one.

Hence . . . utility of all effort in the war which aims at any other result than union. In the rebel States the sentiment of nationality and patriotism is doubtless greatly perverted by years of hatred and a mania upon the Slavery question. But these at those who still hold fast to the country are those from whom the future of the South must come. Those in whom the prudence for a State or love of slavery have accepted the national instinct, are those whom the war will exterminate. If we can. It is the feeling of the mass of the people which will control and decide this quarrel. If the rebellious faction could be allowed to go without danger to the nation, there would be a large party which would cry "Good riddance." But that can not now be done than a foot or a hand can be cut off from the body without maiming it.

It is in view of this fact of nationality, and of its necessity, that the concluding words of Mr. Lossing's admirable and instructive pamphlet have such meaning:

"Let us remember that we are a Nation, not a league of States. Words have deep significance in certain relations. Let us, in thinking, speaking, and writing of our Government and its concerns, habitually use the word National instead of Federal. The former expresses a great truth, and is broad and noble; the latter expresses a falsehood, and is narrow and ignoble in its comparisons. The former is calculated to inspire our children with just, expanded, and patriotic views; the latter, by its common use, will tend to perpetuate the pernicious doctrine of State sovereignty, give our children false ideas, and make them subservient to sectional bigotry. Let the Secretary of the National Congress, National Capitol, National Government, National Army and Navy, National Judiciary, etc. Let the idea of Nationality permeate our whole political system."

FROM A DIARY.

JONES, who has just come from Washington, smiles when he is asked why Butler is not employed, and answers, "Halleck." He is questioned in regard to this, and replies, "Halleck is not to be trusted with the civil power." Still more questioned, he says, and in the blandest tones, "is our old Man of the Sea. He is by no means a large man, but he has got an immense head under his knee."

"Yes," replied ——, "that may be so, but is not the President Commander-in-Chief?"

"Certainly, but he doesn't want to have any trouble with Congress. He wants things to go smoothly. The President wanted to appoint Fremont, but General Halleck objected, and he is meritorious, and he was not appointed."

"Is not Secretary of War?"

"Oh; is there a Secretary of War? When General Halleck was sent to South Carolina, he constituted himself exile. Do you ask why he was sent there to command the six or seven thousand men in that department? I answer, because [illegible]." General Halleck's opinion that General Mitchell was a better astronomer than general. He thought that Mr. Stanton's telescope sounded well when read in print, but that they were of small account. Why was Mitchell recalled? Was he sent for from Alabama to be sent to South Carolina? I think not. I think that he was dedestined for another command, and in Virginia. If you ask why I don't get it, I can only say that I am unfortunate. Halleck? If you ask why any thing military hitches, the same, as severely as you can put it, 'Halleck.' I do not speak of Fredericksburg, nor allude to pontoons. I freely admit that we do not know much, and that we hear more than truths. I know also that we are foolishly impatient, and must always have a scape-goat. Moreover, I am the last one to defend the administration of Major Hall if Patrick applies for a position. But while I try not to forget all this, I am convinced that a military management which serves a man like Butler unemployed; because, if for no other reason, it is a military management which is unpopular. And for one, I should be perfectly willing to see General Halleck and General Butler change places."

There was not a man in the room who did not agree with Jones.

There has been a good deal of fluttering and letter-writing on the part of gentlemen of Lord Lyons's diplomatic suite, announcing that some persons in New York, whom he called "Conservative" leaders, had been in correspondence with him, or had sent him word, that the sovereign of England in our war. The Herald immediately maintained several prominent persons as leaders. Upon which some of them hastened to purge themselves of suspicion. How could they henceforth appeal to Patrick against John Bull if Patrick knew they had been trying to persuade John to put his finger into our affairs? With characteristic celerity Mr. Fernando Wood was the first to purge. When —— read his letter he turned to —— and said,

"Well, Fernando disclaimed any part in the plot!"

"Indeed!"

"Yes; but your tone argues incredulity."

"Does it? Well, some birds are too old to allow any salt to be thrown upon their tails."

"What does that mean?" asked ——, with an inquiring look.

"It means only," replied ——, "that my faith in Mr. Wood's political remarks has long ago taken the benefit of the statute of limitations."

"Well, but what do you say of the Honorable Mr. Belmont's letter?"

"I didn't observe," replied ——, puffing his cigar calmly, "that he had any letter dealing exclusively with Lord Lyons."

"You know he had just returned from the Havana, don't you?"

"Yes; and I know that he had just heard from Rhode Island."

AMERICAN CITIZENS.

THE meeting of "adopted citizens" a week or two since was unanimous in its expression of enthusiastic loyalty to the Government. But why "adopted citizens"? There was but two political classes of persons in this country, those who are and those who are not citizens. If the gentlemen who express these loyal sentiments are foreigners, their hearty sympathy and interest are most grateful. But if they are American citizens why not say so? Why endeavor to emphasize the fact of foreign birth? Why create more classes and divisions than actually exist? Whoever is an American citizen can have no higher title. And obviously all judicious men will wish at this time to blend as closely as possible the great mass of loyal citizens—and to avoid classifying them by any name of party or country. For all loyal men there is now but one party, that of the Government; but one country, the United States of America. When the flag floats supreme once more over every square foot of territory in America or Germany, in Ireland or France; we may discover that we belong to some political party that marches, with all the other parties, beneath that flag. But now all our hands and hearts are needed to hold it aloft and establish it securely. While the war lasts we are not Republicans or Democrats—we are not foreigners and natives—we are only loyal American citizens, resolved to stand by our Government and the Union, and to support it always in every way that it requires our aid, knowing that when the Government falls, the world will fall, and that the end of the Union is the end of peace and prosperity in every State, in every county, and in every town of the country.

GEORGE LONG DUYCKINCK.

A QUIET, faithful, patient, and industrious life ended when George Long Duyckinck died. His almost shadowy figure flitting through the street had long been to the present generation those who knew him but slightly, like the writer of these lines, could not be surprised when they read that he was gone. Yet the notice of his death several other days in other lands, the bloom and bright expectancy of youth, when he too dreamed dreams and saw visions. Of literary tastes and culture could be led the retired, unobtrusive life of a scholar and author. And if he achieved no eminent literary fame, his biography of George Herbert would be long prized by the thoughtful, religious reader, while his name will be always associated with that of his brother Evert as the joint author of that truly noble monument of literary and historical research, the Cyclopedia of American Literature.

George Duyckinck's work ends early, but it is well done; and the purity of the impression which even the intercourse of a casual acquaintance received, his fidelity, his noiseless piety, the conscientiousness of purpose will well used, will "plead against oblivion for his name."

THE ARGUMENT OF SEPARATION.

ONE of our faithful friends in England is Goldwin Smith, Regius Professor of History at Oxford. He writes under the name of "Anglo-Saxon," in the London Daily News, with a vigor and knowledge which are remarkable. But he seems to some degree the feeling which was combated in a late "Letter to an English Friend" in these columns, and expresses the opinion that some kind of division might be both feasible and desirable.

In reference to this letter a friend writes to the Lounger: "I am surprised at the difficulty experienced by him and by others of the soundest English thinkers in recognizing the individuality of sections to a separation and division of the States. It is not easy to see what prevents them from appreciating the equally firm and unfortunately, theoretically, politically, and morally division is alike impracticable. It is only for men who hold similar opinions to those of Goldwin Smith to argue for separation. All those who believe in the righteousness of the cause which the North is sustaining, and who have confidence in the depth and honesty of conviction of the mass of the Northern people, see that to recognize the Southern Confederacy is to be untrue to the principles which underlie all our professions, and are the ground of all our hopes.

"I was writing the other day to ——, at Oxford, and citing this passage (of Goldwin Smith's). I compared with it the following sentence from his remarkable treatise on 'Irish History and Irish Character,' where, speaking of the possible relations between England and Ireland, he says: 'Independence would of course be feasible in itself, if it could only be accompanied by geographical separation; but so close a neighborhood would involve contact, and contact would bring on collision; rivalry, jealousy, hostility would spring up all the more certainly because there would be between the two countries the memory of a former union and of a recent divorce; and Ireland, menaced by the power of England, would become the ward or vassal of France or some other foreign power, which, for its own purposes, would constitute itself her protector.' This reasoning has a double force in our case; and sufficient argument as it is, is in our case accompanied by others still stronger."

WHAT IS LOYALTY?

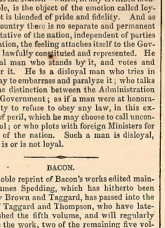
WHEN Mr. Fernando Wood and Mr. G. Tickner Curtis sneer at loyalty, as a word which has no meaning in a popular government, what do they mean? When they say or insinuate that it is an emotion known only in monarchies, they merely say what the experience of every moment contradicts. Loyalty in a purely impersonal emotion, except in the case of individuals. The general British loyalty to the monarch, for instance, is like the Romish reverence for the Pope. The Briton knows nothing and cares nothing about the woman Victoria. It is the Queen who is the object of his loyalty; just as the Holy Father may be personally a scamp or a criminal; but the Pope must be infallible.

Now an Englishman is loyal to the Queen for what reason? Simply, you answer, because she is the Queen. Just; but what is the Queen in England? She is merely the visible representative of the nation. Individually she may be worthless; but as a representative of the national power and majesty she is profoundly honored. If she were Basilicus, if she personally commanded men and swayed them by her superior genius, they would be loyal to that personal superiority. But for her subjects she is a ceremony merely; and if, in the case of Victoria, her blamelessness of life and the fact that she is a woman, create a peculiar interest, that interest has nothing to do with loyalty. Englishmen were just as loyal to that worthless pedagogue George Fourth as they are to the estimable woman who is now Queen. And in each case loyalty was the same thing. It was reverence for the King and Queen. But the King and Queen in the British system are ciphers. The reverence is for their representative quality.

Now will either of the learned political pundits who deny the possibility of loyalty as an American sentiment, deny that the American citizen (excepting always Copperhead) honors the majesty and power of his Government quite as much as a British subject?

It is the national glory and grandeur—in one word, it is the Nation—which, in any civilized modern people, is the object of the emotion called loyalty. It is blended of pride and fidelity. And as in this country there is no separate and permanent representative of the nation, independent of parties in the nation, the feeling attaches itself to the Government lawfully constituted and represented. He is a loyal man who stands by it, and votes and fights for it. He is a disloyal man who tries in every way to embarrass and paralyze it; who talks about the distinction between the Administration and the Government; as if a man were at honorable liberty to refuse to obey any law, in this extremity of peril, which he may choose to call unconstitutional; or who plots with foreign Ministers for the ruin of the nation. Such a man is disloyal, whoever is or is not loyal.

BACON.



THE noble reprint of Bacon's works edited mainly by James Spedding, which has hitherto been issued by Brown and Taggard, has passed into the hands of Taggard and Thompson, who have lately published the fifth volume, and will regularly complete the work, two of the remaining five volumes being already in press. As this is the finest edition of Bacon's writings ever published, so it is properly one of the handsomest books issued in this country. That its publication is continued despite the war, is a cheering illustration of the good faith of publishers, and of the sufficient welcome of so great a work by the American people. Yet it is a matter of pride to share with the publishers but with us all. We are sprung from the same stock with the philosopher, we have not outgrown his wisdom; and we honor ourselves in arraying him for our library shelves in a manner commensurate with his worth. It is certainly to be hoped that nothing will prevent the completion of the series. And if there be one work which no American "gentleman's library should be without," it is this fine edition of Bacon.

LOYAL SOLDIERS.

IT is pleasant to remark that the prejudice against black soldiers is steadily disappearing before the record of their bravery in the field. There is no instance of their ill-conduct. In the various expeditions upon which they have been sent, although none of them have been of the greatest importance, they have shown an obedience, an alacrity, a steadiness, and bravery which are of the best augury for the future.

Nor have the direful consequences to helpless innocence which, according to many, were to follow the summons to freedom of the black race, yet been detected. The direful consequences to helpless innocence are to be found in the story of the treatment of the blacks by the whites, not of the whites by the blacks. The remorseless and prolonged murder of the middle passage—the untold and inconceivable suffering of the subject race at the hands of brutal and irresponsible drivers—this has been the key note of the treatment of helpless innocence in the region now in rebellion. There were plenty of eloquent tears ready to flow upon the 1st of January over the fate that might befall the families of rebels. Where were the same tears for the anguish and wrong which had befallen for generations the families of the slaves of rebels?

The sympathy involved in advance of sufferings that are purely imaginary, was only a part of the Copperhead conspiracy against the Government. If it could only be embarrassed and paralyzed. If it could only be compelled to yield to the rebellion and receive the terms that rebels might choose to impose, every Copperhead would rejoice. The end would be obtained, and every falsehood is a good enough Morgan if it only last until after election.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE LAST POTATO.

'Tis my last, last potato!
Yet hold it not sad!
With the calmness of Cato,
My fate I've met hand.
Not one in the basket?
Must you also go?
(With sorrow I ask it)
Shall I grow so too?

Let's make an incision
(There's no need to peel 'em),
'Twill be in the vision,
To judge if you're mealy.
How wholesome! how tempting!
It smells through the mist
Good-by, you sound potato,
Oh, who could resist?

If in Eden of Eden
Potatoes had been
Of fruits the forbidden,
We still should have sin:
For vice in his senses
Would long be in doubt
'Twixt earth with potatoes,
Or Eden without.

THE MOHOCKS.

On the 6th June, 1712, Sir Mark Cole and three other gentlemen were tried at the old Bailey for riot, assault, and beating the watch. A paper of the day asserts that there were "Mohocks" that they had attacked the watch in Devereux Street, slit two persons' noses, cut a woman in the arm with a penknife so as to disable her for life, rolled a woman in a tub down Snow Hill, misused other women in abominable manner by setting them on their heads, and exercised several cruelties and clubs with short clubs, loaded with lead at both ends, expressly made for the purpose. In their defense the prisoners denied that they were Mohocks, alleging that they were "Scowrers," and had gone out, with a magistrate's sanction, to scour the streets, arrest Mohocks and other offenders, and deliver them up to justice. On the night in question they had attacked a notorious pimp-broker, and taken this latter men out of it. While engaging in this meritorious manner they learned that the Mohocks themselves, after the watch, it was further alleged that they, the watch, had on the same night actually groomed to arrest a gang of the realm, Lord Hitchinbroke, and had latterly adopted the practice of going their rounds by night accompanied by savage dogs. The jury, however, in spite of this defense, returned a verdict of "Guilty;" and the judge fined the culprits in the sum of three shillings and four-pence each. It is scarcely credible that, so late as the last century, a number of young men of rank and fashion, assuming the name of a savage tribe, emulated their barbarous actions by wantonly inflicting the most disgusting cruelties on the peaceable inhabitants, particularly women, of London. And after these Mohocks, as they styled themselves, had held the town in terror for two years, after a royal proclamation had offered £100 reward for the apprehension of any one of them, when these latter persons were at last brought up to justice, the amount of punishment inflicted was merely "his paltry fine of 3s. 4d.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

REPORTED MOVEMENT NEAR CHARLESTON.

The Richmond Inquirer of 31 inst. says:

"The enemy are landing in force on Seabrook's, or John's Island. Three gun-boats and several transports are lying off the latter. The plantation has already taken place between ours and the enemy's pickets. Our pickets are driven in and the enemy advancing. General Hagood has ordered all the women, children, and non-combatants removed from that section, which is twenty miles from Seabrook's Island.

REPORTED HEAD HOT AT RICHMOND.

Colonel Streight, of the Second Alabama Regiment, one of the fourteen United States officers just released by the rebels, and who has just arrived at Baltimore, makes the following statement: On Thursday last he saw from his prison window in Richmond a large crowd of men, composed of about three thousand women, who were armed with clubs and guns and stones. They broke open the Government and private stores, and took bread, clothing, and whatever else they wanted. The militia were ordered out to check the riot, but failed to do so. Jeff Davis and other high officials made speeches to the infuriated women, and told them that they should have whatever they needed. They then became calm, and order was once more restored. All the other released Union officers confirm this statement.

The story, however, looks very fishy.

FROM VICKSBURG.

The news from Vicksburg is encouraging. The movement on Haines's Bluff proved a failure, and our fleet has returned to Young's Point. The rebel fortifications of Vicksburg was pasipoed from the 9th ult. In consequence of a sperm, it is reported that Grant has placed a heavy battery of Parrott guns beyond the levee, in a position to reach the city, and it is said has already silenced a rebel battery opposite.

THE SUCCESSFUL EXPEDITION.

The Southern expedition has returned to the Mississippi River. The rebels had so obstructed the channel that no progress could be made through it. Attempts were made by the enemy to burn in the fleet by obstruction front and rear, but the latter succeeded in releasing the vessels after some skirmishing.

MORGAN WHIPPED.

The following has been received at the head-quarters of the army:

HUNTSBOROUGH, April 4, 1863.

To Major-General Halleck, General-in-Chief, Washington:

General Stanley has returned from his scout, bringing in forty-seven of Morgan's command and fifty-seven horses and mules. He drove Morgan's cavalry from the ponies, plain, whipping it in every encounter. General Granger is north of Smithville, and, but for their precipitate retreat and the difficulty of the crossing, would have reached a force in their rear and captured their artillery and ammunition.

The enemy left quite a number of their dead, and fled toward McMinnville, leaving many wagons, mules, and guns. W. S. ROSECRANS.

A REBEL CAMP ATTACKED.

We learn by private letters from Helena, dated on 7th, that General Mitchell, with three hundred and fifty cavalry, went out on the Memphis road, on the 20th ult., landing into a rebel camp, where there was a large number of contrabands, and a heavy force clergy, to which Mitchell charged, killed five, and captured all their arms, horses, and negroes.

JACKSONVILLE BURNED.

The town of Jacksonville, Florida, has been burned by the Union forces under Colonel Hunt, in return for the attack of the rebels in their midst and attack of the Union inhabitants.

BATTLE OF SOMERSET.

The official dispatches from General Burnside relative to the battle near Somerset, Kentucky, on the 30th ult., have been forwarded to the General-in-Chief at Washington. The action lasted five hours. The rebels were driven in double-quick time through the town and over six miles, and the second position was finally stormed and carried. Zollicoffer, Cooper, commanding the troops, and numbering over two thousand six hundred men, were driven in confusion to the Cumberland River with a few that "will not fall far short of five hundred men." Twelve guns, caissons and four rifled guns were taken, and "Scott's famous rebel regiment was cut all to pieces and completely destroyed." General Burnside offers the command as the reduction of Fort Pulaski last April.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

General orders have been issued for a general muster of the troops in the Potomac Army on the 19th inst., after which the regiments of the different regiments will be sent to the Adjutant-General for the use of the Provost-Marshal in drafting men to fill up the regiments and batteries to their legal complement.

ELECTIONS IN CONNECTICUT AND RHODE ISLAND.

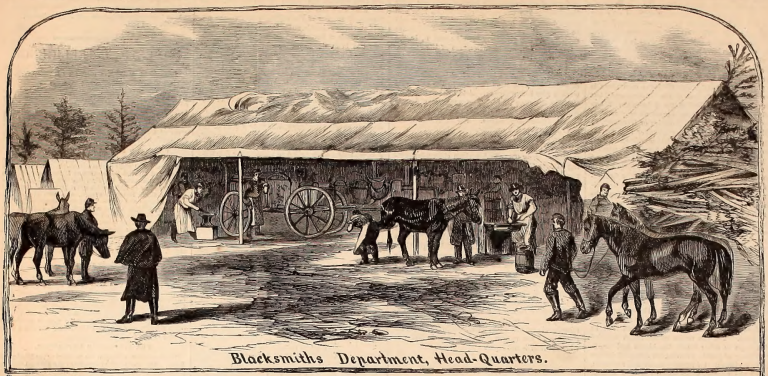
The election in Connecticut on the 6th resulted in the success of the Republican ticket for State officers, and three of the four Republican members for Congress, while both branches of the Legislature are strongly Republican. The Governor has one member of Congress. The Republican majority for Governor is estimated at about three thousand, being a Republican loss of six thousand since last year.

The Rhode Island election likewise showed a victory for the Republicans.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE REBEL LOAN.

Our European files by the Canada, dated on the 21st of March, detail the progress of the Confederate loan of a million in London, Liverpool, Paris, Frankfort, and Amsterdam. The bids amounted to fifteen millions of pounds sterling, and the premium averaged fifty four and a half all through. The options of Sir Hugh Cairns as to the legality of the loan in England is published with the advertisement of the government.



MORE SHIPS BURNED.

The ship Washington, lately captured and bonded by the rebels, arrived, landed at Savannah, and burned, after three hundred and fifty men, taken from the American vessels Golden Eagle, Olive Jane, and Parthenia, by the commander of the Alabama before he destroyed them. The masters of the three vessels detail the circumstances attending the outrages of Captain Semmes.

POLAND.

THE REVOLUTION.

The reports announce the end of the Polish insurrection, so far as operations in the field against Russia are concerned. Langiewicz was defeated in battle by the forces of the Czar, and driven, with many of his soldiers, into the Austrian territory. Here he was held for some time as a prisoner, his followers being placed under the surveillance of the police. The excitement was finally communicated to the Russian authorities, and conveyed to the former by the Austrian Government. In Paris the Czar Alexander had telegraphed to Napoleon promises of an amnesty, a liberal constitution, and the right of self-government to Poland.

CHAPTER III.

WINNING boat-races was all very fine; but a hundred such victories could not compensate Mr. Kennet's female hearers for one such defeat as he had awarded, a defeat that, to their minds, carried disgrace. Their Edward plucked! At first they were houmbed, and sat chilled, with red cheeks, bewildered between present triumph and mortification at hand. Then the color ebbed out of their faces, and they encouraged each other feebly in whispers, "might it not be a mistake?"

But unconscious Kennet robbed them of this timid hope. He was now in his element, knew all about it, rushed into details, and sawed away all doubt from their minds.

The scene was this. Dodd's general performance was mediocre, but passable; he was plucked, for his Logic. Hardie said he was very sorry for it. "What does it matter," answered Kennet; "he is a boating man."

"Well, and I am a boating man. Why you told me yourself, the other day, poor Dodd was anxious about it on account of his friends. And, by-the-by, that reminds me they say he has got two pretty sisters here."

Says Kennet, briskly, "I'll go and tell him; I know him just to speak to."

"What, doesn't he know?"

"How can he know?" said Kennet, jealously. "the testamun were only just out a cauns away." And with this he started on his congenial errand.

Hardie took two or three of his long strides, and fairly collared him. "You will do nothing of the kind."

"What, not tell a man when he's plowed? That is a good joke."

"No. There's time enough. Tell him after chapel, to-morrow, or in chapel if you must: but why poison his triumphal cup? And his sisters, too, why spoil their pleasure? Bring it out with a word about 'plowing' to any living soul today."

To his surprise, Kennet's face expressed no sympathy, nor even bare assent. At this Hardie lost patience, and burst out impetuously, "Take care how you refuse me; take care how you thwart me in this. He is the best-natured fellow in college. It doesn't matter to you, and it does to him; and if you do, then take my name off the list of your acquaintances, for I'll never speak a word to you again in this world; no, not on my death-bed, by Heaven."

"The threat wes extravagant; but Youth's glowing cheek, and eye, and imperious lip, and simple generosity, made it almost beautiful.

Kennet winced. "Oh, if you talk like that, there is an end to fair argument."

"End it then, and promise me: upon your honor!"

"Why not? What hosh! There I promise. Now, how do you construe argumentary?"

The incongruous dog ("I think then, Duff, for teaching me that word!") put this query with the severity of an inquisitor bringing back a garrulous prisoner to the point.

Hardie replied gayly, "Any way you like, now you are a good fellow again."

"Coase, that is evasive. My tutor says it can not be rendered by any one English word; no more can argumentary."

"Why, what on earth can he know about English?—argumentary is a Cormorant: cum-argumentary is a Skinflint; and your tutor is a Duffer. Hush! Keep dark now! here he comes."

And he went hastily to meet Edward Dodd; and by that means intercepted him on his way to the carriage. "Give me your hand, Dodd," he cried; "you have saved your University. You must be stroke of the eight-oar after me. Let me see more of you than I have, old fellow."

With all my heart," replied Edward, calmly, but taking the offered hand cordially; though he rather wanted to get away to his mother and sister.

"We will pull together, and read together into the bargain," continued Hardie.

"Not Logister? Yes and I? What do you mean?"

"Well, you see I am pretty well up in the higher books; what I have got to rub up is my Divinity and my Logic; especially my Logic. Will you grind Logic with me? Say Yes, for I know you will keep your word."

"It is too good an offer to refuse, Hardie; but now I look you, you are excited, wonderfully excited; with the race, eh? Now, just—you—wait—quietly—till next week, and then, if you are so soft as to ask me in cool blood—"

"Wait a week?" cried the impetuous youth. "No, not a minute. It is settled. There, we cram Logic together next week."

And he shook Edward's hand again with glistening eyes and an emotion that was quite unintelligible to Edward; but on the whole, quiet, sensitive, spirits, who sat but fifteen yards off.

"You really must excuse me just now," said Edward, and ran to the carriage, and put out both hands to the fair occupants. They kissed him eagerly, with little tender cries; and it cost them no slight effort not to cry publicly over "the beloved," "the victorious," "the plowed."

Young Hardie stood apart.

"What? Those ladies Dodd's sisters! Why, one of them had called the other mamma. Good Heavens, all his talk in the morning had been of Dodd: and Kennet and he between them had let out the very thing he wanted to conceal, especially from Dodd's relations. He spied at them, and turned hot to the very forehead.

Then, not knowing what to do or say, and being after all but a clever boy, not a cool "never unready" man of the world, he slipped away, blushing. Kennet followed, goggling.

Left to herself, Mrs. Dodd would have broken the ice and spoken to Edward at once, and taken the line of consoling him under their own vexation: it would not have been the first time she had played that part. But Miss Dodd, when she said it would be unkind to poison Edward's day, and it is sweet woman's nature to follow suit; so she and Miss Dodd put their heads and Edward passed a right jocund afternoon with them; he was not allowed to surprise one of the looks they interchanged to relieve their secret mortification.

But, after dinner, as the time drew near for him to go back to Oxford, Mrs. Dodd became silent, and a little distraite; and at last drew her chair away to a small table, and wrote a letter.

In directing it she observed, gayly, to that Julia could catch the address: "Edward Dodd, Esq., Exeter College, Oxford."

Julia was unusually startled at first, and her eye roved almost comically to and fro the letter and its Dodd-ship, and thence to the unconscious of woman's beneficent wiles. But her heart soon divined the mystery; it was to reach Edward first thing in the morning, and prepare him the pain of writing the news to them; and, doubtless, so worded as not to leave him a day in doubt of their feelings and sympathy.

Julia took the missive unobserved by the Destination, and glided out of the room to get it quietly posted.

The servant-girl was waiting on the second-floor lodgers, and told her so, with a significant inflection, viz., that the post was in this street, and only a few doors off.

Julia was a little surprised at her coolness, but took the hint with perfect good temper, and just put on her shawl and bonnet, and went with it herself.

The post-office was not quite so near as represented; but she was soon there, for she was very tall she had passed it by, and she came back slowly and thoughtfully: here in the street, lighted only by the moon, and an occasional gaslight, there was no need for self-restraint, and soon her mortification betrayed itself in her speaking countenance. And to think that her mother, on whom she doted, should have to write to her son, there present, and post the letter! This made her eyes fill, and before she reached the door of the lodgings they were brimming over.

But she put her foot on the step a timid voice addressed her, in a low tone of supplication. "May I venture to speak one word to you, Miss Dodd?—one single word?"

She looked up surprised; and it was young Mr. Hardie.

His tongue was bending toward her submissively, and his face, as well as his utterance, betrayed considerable agitation.

And what led to so unusual a rencontre between a young gentleman and lady who had never been introduced.

"The Tender Passion," says a reader of many novels.

Why, yes; the tenderest in all our nature: Wounded vanity.

Naturally proud and sensitive, and inflated by success and flattery, Alfred Hardie had been torturing himself ever since he fled Edward's female relations. He was mortified to the core. He confounded "the fools" (his favorite synonym for his acquaintance) for going and calling Dodd's mother an elder sister, and so not giving him a chance to divine her. And then that he, who prided himself on his discrimination, should take them for ladies of rank, or, at all events, of the highest fashion; and, climax of humiliation, that so great a man as he should go and seem to court them by praising Dodd of Exeter, by enlarging upon Dodd of Exeter, by offering to grind Logic with Dodd of Exeter. Who would believe that this was a coincidence, a mere coincidence? They could not be expected to believe it; female vanity would not let them. He tingled, and was not far from hating the whole family: as bitter a thing in that which I have ventured to dub "The Tenderest Passion."

He itched to ease his irritation by explaining to Edward. Dodd was a frank, good-hearted fellow; he would listen to facts, and convince the ladies in turn. Hardie learned where Dodd's party lodged, and waited about the door to catch him alone; Dodd must be in college by twelve, and would leave Henley before ten. He waited till he was tired of waiting. But at last the door opened; he stepped forward, and out tripped Miss Dodd. "Confound it!" muttered Hardie, and drew back. However, he stood and admired her graceful figure and action, her ladylike speed without hasting. Had she come back at the same pace he would never have ventured to stop her; on such a thread do things hang; but she returned very slowly, hanging her head; her look at him and his headache recurred to him, a look brimful of goodness. She would be to us in Edward, better perhaps. He tickled to impulse, and addressed her, but with all the trepidation of a youth defying the giant Entepfeu for the first time in his life.

Julia was a little surprised and fluttered, but did not betray it; she had been taught self-command by example, if not by precept.

"Certainly, Mr. Hardie," said she, with a modest composure a young coquette might have envied under the circumstances.

Hardie had now only to explain himself: but instead of that he stood looking at her with a fatent concern; the fair face she raised to him was wet with tears; so were her eyes, and even the glorious eyelashes were fringed with that tender spray; and it glistened in the moonlight.

This sad and pretty sight drove the vain but generous youth's calamity clean out of his head. "Why, you are crying! Miss Dodd, what is the matter? It is nothing has happened."

Julia turned he, head away a little fretfully, with a "No, no!" But soon her natural candor and simplicity prevailed; a simplicity not without dignity; she turned round to him and looked him in the face, "Why should I deny it to you, Sir, who have been good enough to sympathize with us? We are mortified, sadly mortified, at dear Edward's disgrace; and it has been a struggle not to disobey you, and poison his triumphal cup with sad looks. And mamma had to write to him, and console him against to-morrow; but I hope he will not feel it so severely as she does: and I have just posted it myself, and when I thought of our dear mamma being driven to such expedients, I— Oh!" And the sure young heart, having opened itself by words, must flow a little more.

"Oh, pray don't cry," said young Hardie, tenderly; "don't take such a trifle to heart so; you crying makes me feel guilty for letting it happen. It shall never occur again. If I had only known, it should never have happened at all."

"Once is enough," sighed Julia.

"Indeed you take it too much to heart; it is only out of Oxford a plow is thought much of; especially a single one; that is so very common. You see, Miss Dodd, a university examination consists of several classes; neglect but one, and Crichton himself would be plowed; because brilliancy in your other papers is not allowed to count; that is how the most distinguished man of our day got plowed for Smalls; I had a narrow escape, I know, for one. But, Miss Dodd, if you knew how far your brother's performance on the river outweighs a mere slip in the schools, in all university men's eyes, the dons' and all, you would not make this bright day end sadly to Oxford by crying. Why, I could find you a thousand men who would be plowed to-morrow with glory and delight, to win one such race as your brother has won two."

Julia sighed again. But it sounded now half like a sigh of relief; the final sigh, with which the fair consent to be consoled.

And, indeed, this improvement in the music did not escape Hardie; he felt he was on the right track: he enumerated fluently, by name, many good men, besides Dean Swift, who had been plowed, yet had cultivated the field of letters in their time; and, in short, he was so earnest and plausible, that something like a smile hovered about his hearer's lips, and she glanced askant at him with feelings gratitude from under her silky lashes. But soon it recurred to her that this was rather a long interview to accord to "a stranger," and under the moon; so she said a little stiffly, "And was this what you were good enough to wish to say to me, Mr. Hardie?"

"No, Miss Dodd, to be frank, it was not. My motive in addressing you, without the right to take such a freedom, was egotistical. I came here to clear myself; I—I was afraid you must think me a bumbug, you know."

"I do not understand you, indeed."

"Well, I feared you and Mrs. Dodd might think I praised Dodd so, and flattered him that I did for him, knowing who you were, and wishing to curry favor with you by all that; and that is so undefinant and paltry a way of going to work, I should despise myself."

"Oh, Mr. Hardie," said the young lady, smiling, "how foolish: why, of course we knew you had no idea."

"Indeed I had not; but how could you know it?"

"Why, we saw it. Do you think we have no eyes? she said much keener goes than gentlemen have. It is mamma, and I who are to blame, if any body; we ought to have declared ourselves; it would have been more natural more manly. But we can not all be gentlemen, you know. It was so sweet to hear Edward praised by one who did not know us; it was like stolen fruit; and by one whom others praise: so if you can forgive us our slyness, there is an end of the matter."

"Forgive you? you have taken a thorn out of my soul."

"Then I am so glad you summoned courage to speak to me without ceremony. Mamma would have done better though, but after all, do not I know her? My mamma is all goodness and intelligence; and be assured, Sir, she does you justice; and is quite aware of your disinterested kindness to dear Edward." With this she was about to retire.

"Ah! But you, Miss Dodd? with whom I have taken this unwarrantable liberty?" said Hardie, imploringly.

"Me, Mr. Hardie? you do me the honor to require my opinion of your performances; including, of course, this self-introduction?"

Hardie hung his head; there was a touch of satire in the lady's voice, he thought.

Her soft eyes rested demurely on him a moment; she saw he was a little abashed.

"My opinion of it all is that you have been very kind to us; in being most kind to our poor Edward. I never saw or heard a more thing more generous, more manly. And then so thoughtful, so considerate, so delicate! so instead of criticising you, as you seem to expect, his sister only blesses you, and thanks you from the very bottom of her heart."

HE ADDRESSED HER WITH ALL THE TREPIDATION OF YOUTH.

She had begun with a polite composure, borrowed from mamma; but, once launched, her ardent nature got the better: her color rose and rose, and her voice sank and sank, and the last words came almost in a whisper, and such a lovely whisper; a gurgle from the heart: and, as she concluded, her delicate hand came sweeping over with a heaven-taught gesture of large and sovereign cordiality that made even the honest words and the divine tones more than spent. It was too much: it was genius, ardent as herself, and not, in reality, half so timorous, caught fire; and seeing a white, eloquent hand rather near him, caught it, and pressed his warm lips on it in mute adoration and gratitude.

At this she was scared and offended. "Oh! keep that for the Queen!" cried she, turning scarlet, and snatching her fair hand away as if like a startled stag, and she drew her hand away quickly and decidedly, though not roughly. He summoned a lovely smile; but in the very middle of it she said, softly, "Good-by, Mr. Hardie," and swept, with a gracious little courtesy, through the doorway, leaving him spell-bound.

And so the virginal instinct of self-defense carried her off swiftly and cleverly. But none too soon; for, on entering the house, that external composure her two mothers, Mesdames Dodd and Nature, had taught her, fell from her like a veil, and she fluttered up the stairs to her own room, with hot cheeks, and panted there like some wild thing that has been grasped at and escaped. She felt young Hardie's lips upon the palm of her hand plainly; they seemed to linger there still; it was like light but live velvet. She had the ardent look of one who looks into her eyes, set the young creature quivering. Nobody had looked at her so before, and no young gentleman had imprinted living roses on her hand. She was alarmed, ashamed, and uneasy. What right had he to look at her like that? What shadow of a right to kiss her hand? He could not pretend to think she had put it out to be kissed; indeed, she put the back of the hand for that, not the palm. The truth was he was an impudent fellow, and she hated him; and loved him. And then it was so simple as to let him talk to her; mamma would not have been so imprudent when she was a girl.

She would not go down, for she felt there must be something of this kind legibly branded on her face. "O! O! just look at the bold young lady! She has been letting a young gentleman kiss the palm of her hand; and the fool has not gone off yet: you may see that by the window."

But, then, poor Edward! she must go down.

So she put a wet towel to her tell-tale cheeks, and dried them by artistic skill, recovered her position, and came down stairs like a mouse, and turned the door-handle noiselessly, and glided into the sitting-room, looking so transparent, conscious, and all on fire with beauty and animation, that even Edward was startled, and, in a whisper, bade his mother observe what a pretty girl she was; "beats all the county girls in a canter."

Mrs. Dodd did look; and, consequently, as soon as ever Edward was gone to Oxford, she said to Julia, "You are fresh, I hope, and have been excited with all this. You had better go to bed."

Julia complied willingly, for she felt a strange, and, to her, novel inclination; she wanted to be alone and think. She retired to her own room, and went the whole day over every minute, and happy and sorry, exalted and uneasy, by turns; and ended by excusing Mr. Hardie's escapade, and throwing the blame on herself. She ought to have been more distant; gentlemen were not expected, nor indeed much wanted, to be so distant. A little assurance did not misbecome them. "Really I think it sets them off," said she to herself.

Grand total: "What must he think of me?"

Time gallops in reverie: the town clock struck twelve, and rids its iron tongue of midnight under her youthful conscience. "Was this obeying mamma? Mamma had said, Go to bed: not, "Go up stairs and meditate: avoid young gentlemen." She gave an expressive shake of her fair shoulders, like a swan flapping the water off its downy rings, and so dismissed the subject from her mind.

Then she said her prayers.

Then she rose from her knees, and cajoled the imaginary cat out from its theoretical hiding-places. "Puss! puss! pretty puss!"

Thieves and ghosts she did not believe in, yet credited rats under beds, and thought them neither "harmless" nor "necessary cats."

After tenderly evoking the detested and chimerical quadruped, she proceeded none the less to careful research, especially at window and door of one resisted, and then yielded with a crack, and blew out the candle. "There now," said she.

It was her only light, except her beauty. They allotted each Hebe but one candle in that ancient burgh.

"Well," she thought, "there is moonlight enough to undress by."

She went to draw back one of the curtains. But in the act she started back with a little scream. There was a tall figure over the way watching the house.

The moon shone: from her side of the street full on him, and in that instant her quick eye recognized Mr. Hardie.

"Well!" said she aloud, and with an indescribable inflection; and hid herself swiftly in impenetrable gloom.

But, after a while, Eve's daughter must have a peep. She stole with infinite caution to one side of the curtain, and made an aperture just big enough for one bright eye. Yes, there he was, motionless. "I'll tell mamma," said she to him, malignantly, as if the sound could reach him.

Unconscious of the direful threat, he did not budge.

She was unaffectedly puzzled at this phenomenon; and, not being the least vain, fell to wondering whether he played the nightly sentinel opposite every lady's window, who exchanged civilities with him. "Because, if he does, he is a fool," said she, promptly. But on reflection, she felt sure he did nothing of the kind, habitually. He had been struck with her beauty: she had noted that truth in him at a very early stage. She satisfied herself, by cautious examination, that he did not leave the room. He was making a temple of the whole lodging. "How ridiculous of him!" Yet he appeared to be happy over it: there was an exalted look in his moon-lit face; she seemed now first to see his soul there. She studied his countenance like a book of hieroglyphics, and deciphered each rapt expression that crossed it, and stored them in her memory.

Twice she left her ambuscade, to go to bed: and twice Curiosity, or Something, drew her back. At last, having looked, pondered, and peeped till her feet were cold, and her face the reverse, she informed herself that the foolish Thing had tired itself out.

"Good-night, Mr. Policeman," said she, pretending to bawl to him. "And, O, do rain! As hard as ever you can. Why, the benevolent aspiration, a little too violent to be sincere, she laid her cheek on her pillow doughtily.

But her sentinel, when out of sight, had more power to disturb her. She lay and wondered whether he was still there, and what it all meant, and what ever mamma would say; and what, of the two, she or he, was the head culprit in this strange performance, if both were not concerned, and ran the parallel; and, above all, what he would do next. Her pulse galloped, and her sleep was broken; and she came down in the morning a little pale. Mrs. Dodd saw it at once, with the quick maternal eye; and mormured, "It is curious, the effect of love, and romance: yet pleasure seldom agrees with youth; this little excitement has done your mother good, she is no longer young: it has been too much for you. I shall be glad to have you back to our quiet home."

Ah! Will that home be as tranquil now?

CHAPTER XVIII.—(Continued.)

THE truth flashed into the judge's mind. He shaded his face, and did not speak for a minute or two. Then he said, not looking up, a little hoarsely, "This, then, was the shame you told me of long ago."

"Yes," said she.

Both sat quite still, quite silent, for some time. Through the silence a sharp, clear voice was heard speaking through the bedroom doors.

"Take the kedgeree down, and tell the cook to keep it hot for the judge. It is so tiresome people coming on Sunday on his return to dress: had not his proper hours for being at Chambers."

He got up hastily, and went into the dining-room, but he had hardly some difficulty in curbing his wife's irritation.

When he came back Ellinor said:

"I am afraid I ought not to have come here now."

"Oh, it's all nonsense" said he, in tone of annoyance. "You've done quite right." He seated himself where he had been before, and again half-covered his face with his hand.

"And Dixon knew all the time? Have I must put the fact plainly to you—your father was the guilty person? He murdered Dunster?"

"Yes, if you will have it so. He was done by a blow, in the heat of passion. No one can ever tell how Dunster came to provoke papa," said Ellinor, in a stupid, heavy way; and then she sighed.

"How do you know this?" There was a kind of tender reluctance in the judge's voice as he put all these questions. Ellinor had made up her mind beforehand that everything that he must be asked, and must also be answered; but she spoke like a sleep-walker.

"What a long time papa was just after he had struck Mr. Dunster the blow. He was lying insensible, as we thought—dead, as he really was."

"What a long time!" said he, in a low voice. "I have known a good deal about it. And the horselancet that was found with his name upon it?"

"Papa went to ask Dixon, and he brought his steam—I suppose to try and bleed him. I have said enough, have I not?" I seem so confused. But I will answer any question to make it appear that Dixon is innocent."

The judge had not thought of all down. He sat still now without replying to her. Then he wrote rapidly, referring to his previous paper from time to time. In five minutes he had read the facts which Ellinor had stated, as he now arranged them, in a legal and connected form. He just asked her one or two trivial questions as he did so. Then he read it over to her and asked her to sign it. She took up the pen and held it, hesitating.

"This will never be made public?" said she.

"No; I shall take care that no one but the Home Secretary sees it."

"Thank you. I could not help it now it has come to this."

"There are not many men like Dixon," said the judge, almost to himself, as he sealed the paper in an envelope.

"No!" said Ellinor. "I never saw any one so faithful."

And just at the same moment the reflection on a less faithful person that these words might seem to imply struck both of them, and each instinctively glanced at the other.

Ellinor!" said the judge, at the moment's pause. "We are friends, I hope?"

"Yes, friends," said she, quietly and sadly.

He felt a little chagrined at her answer. Why be could hardly tell. To cover any sign of his feeling he went on talking.

"Where are you living now?"

"At East Chester."

"Then you could sometimes to town, don't you? Let us know always—whenever you come; and Lady Corbet shall call on you. Indeed, I wish you'd let me take you there some one day."

"Thank you. I am going straight back to Hellingford; at least as soon as you can get me away from Dixon. There is just one thing more," said she, coloring a little, and hesitating. "This note to you was found under papa's pillow after his death: some of it refers to past things; but I should be glad if you could think as kindly as you can of poor papa. And so—if you will read it."

He took it and read it, not without emotion. Then he laid it down on his table, and said,

"I see that you have suffered a great deal for that night's work. And you, Ellinor, you have suffered too."

Yes, she had suffered; and he who spoke had been one of the instruments of her suffering, though the most powerful of it. She knew that her head a little for reply. Then she looked up at him—they were both standing at the time—and said,

"I think I shall be happier now. I always knew it must be found out. Once more, goodby, and you will not take this letter, I suppose?" she said, casting envious, loving eyes at her father's note, lying unregarded on the table.

"Why, no, certainly," said he, and put it by: he took her hand. He held it while he looked into her face. He had thought it changed when he had left her; it was now more changed the same to him as of yore. The sweet, shy eyes, the indicated dimple in the cheek, and something of ever had brought a faint pink flush into her usually colorless cheeks. Married judge though he was, he was not sure if she had not more charm for him still, in her sorrow and her shabbiness, than the handsome, stately wife in the next room, who had been born to be a blessmatest when he had left her a few minutes before. He sighed a little regretfully as Ellinor withdrew her hand, and obtained the glimpse of had struggled for and sacrificed for; but now he could not help wishing that the slaughtered creature had on the shrine of his ambition were alive again.

CHAPTER XIX.

WHEN Ellinor reached Mr. Johnson's house in Hellingford that afternoon she found Miss Monro was there, and that she had been with Mrs. Johnson during the visit of Mr. Johnson from following Ellinor to London.

Miss Monro fondled and purred inarticulately enough to satisfy the most reverential darling before she could speak intelligibly enough to tell her that Canon Livingstone had come straight to see her immediately on his return to East Chester, and had suggested her journey to Hellingford in order that she might be of all the assistance in her power. He did not at first let out that he had accompanied her to Hellingford; she was a little afraid of Ellinor's displeasure at finding there; Ellinor had always objected so much to any advance to intimacy with him that Miss Monro had wished to make. But Ellinor was different right now.

"How white you are, Nelly!" said Miss Monro. "You have been traveling too much and too fast, my child."

"My head aches," said Ellinor, wearily. "But I must go back to East Chester at once, for Dixon that he is reprieved—I am so tired! Will you ask Mr. Johnson to get me leave to see him? He will know what to do."

She threw herself down on the bed in the spare room—the bed with the heavy blue curtains. Miss Monro had remonstrated when Monro went to do her bidding. But it was now late afternoon, and Mr. Johnson said that it would be impossible for him to get permission from the sheriff that night.

"Besides," said he, courteously, "one scarcely knows what to do. Miss Wilkins may not give the old man false hopes—whether she has not been excited to have false hopes herself. It would be a cruel kindness to let her see him without more legal certainty as to what his sentence or reprieve is to be. To-morrow morning, if I can procure properly understood her story, which was a little confused—"

"She is so dreadfully tired, poor creature!" put in Miss Monro, who never could bear the shadow of a suspicion that Ellinor was not wisest, best, in all circumstances, the intention of life.

Mr. Johnson went on, with a deprecatory bow: "Well, then—it really is the only course open to her friends—that she should rest for the morning. By to-morrow morning I will have obtained the sheriff's leave, and he will most likely have heard from London."

"Thank you! I believe that will be best."

"It is the only course," said he.

When Miss Monro returned to the bedroom Ellinor was in a heavy, feverish slumber: so feverish and so uneasy did she appear, that, after the hesitation of a moment or two, Miss Monro had no scruple in wakening her.

But she did not appear to understand the answer to her request; she did not seem even to remember that she had made any request.

The journey to England, the misery, the surprises, had been too much for her. The morrow morning came, bringing the formal free pardon for Abraham Dixon. The sheriff's order for his admission to see the old man lay awaiting her wish to use it. But she knew nothing of all this.

For days, nay, weeks, she hovered between life and death, tended, as of old, by Miss Monro, while good..Mrs. Johnson was ever willing to assist.

One summer evening in early June she wakened into memory.

Miss Monro heard the faint piping voice, as she kept her watch by the bedside.

"Where is Dixon?" asked she.

"At the prisoner's house at Bromham." This was the name of Canon Livingstone's country parish.

"Why?"

"We thought it better to get him into country air and fresh scenes at once."

"How is he?"

"Much better. Get strong, and he shall come to see you."

"You are sure all is right?" said Ellinor.

"Sure, my dear. All is quite right."

Then Ellinor went to sleep again out of very weakness and weariness.

From that time she recovered pretty steadily. Her great desire was to return to East Chester as soon as possible. The associations of grief, anxiety, and coming illness connected with Hellingford made her wish to be once again in the solemn, quiet, sunny Close of East Chester.

Ellinor's return came only after Miss Monro in managing the journey with her invalid. But he did not intrude himself upon Ellinor, and very more than he had done in coming from home.

The morning after her return Miss Monro said,

"Do you feel strong enough to see Dixon?"

"Yes. Is he here?"

"He is at the prisoner's house. He sent for him from Bromham, in order that he might be ready for you to see him when you wished."

"I will go," said Ellinor, coming decidedly and Ellinor, flushing and trembling.

She went to the door to meet the tottering old man; she led him to the easy-chair that had been placed and arranged for herself; she knelt down before him, and put his hand on her head —he trembling and shaking all the while.

"Forgive me all the shame and misery, Dixon. Say you forgive me; and let me rest my head on you. And then let never a word of the terrible past be spoken between us."

"I forgive you for me to forgive you as never did harm to no one."

"But say you do—it will ease my heart."

"I do forgive you for me, and I asked he raised himself to his feet with effort, and standing up above her he blessed her solemnly.

After that he and love, she by him, gazing at him.

"You's a good man, misey," said he, at length, lifting his slow eyes and looking at her. "Better not t'other ever was."

"He is a good man," said Ellinor.

But no more was spoken on the subject. The next day Canon Livingstone made his formal visit. Ellinor received him in Miss Monro in the room, but that worthy lady knew better than to stop.

They went on, forcing talk on indifferent subjects. At last he could speak no longer on every thing but that which he had most at heart. "Miss Wilkins," he had said, as he was standing by the mantle-piece apparently examining the ornaments upon it—"Miss Wilkins, I trust that any chance of your giving me a favorable answer now—you know what I mean—what we spoke about at the Great-Western Hotel that day?"

Ellinor hung her head.

"You know that I am once engaged before?"

"Yes! I know—to Mr. Corbet: he that is now the judge. You can not suppose that would make any difference—I last it all. I have loved you, and you only, ever since we met eighteen years ago—Miss Wilkins—Ellinor—put me out of suspense."

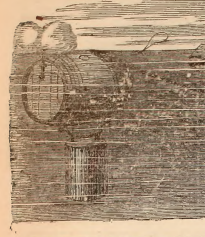
"I will!" said she, putting out her thin white hand for him to take and kiss, almost in spite of gratitude, and she seemed frightened at his impetuosity, and tried to check him. "Wait—you have not heard all—and rather, I have not all of me, angler, irritated beyond his bearing, struck the blow that killed Mr. Dunster—Dixon and I know of it just after the deed was struck —we helped to hide it—we kept the secret—my poor father died of sorrow and remorse—you never know what you did for me! It seems to me as if I had been an accomplice in such a terrible thing?"

"Poor, poor Ellinor!" said he, now taking her in his arms as to a shelter. "How I wish I had known of all this years and years ago! I could have stood between you and so much!"

Those who pass through the village of Bromham, and pause by the low, ivy-covered cottage where the Rectory garden from the road, may often see on summer days an old, old man sitting in a wicker-chair out upon the lawn. He leans upon his stick, and seldom raises his bent head; but for all that his eyes are on a level with the two little flower-children who come to him in all their small joys and sorrows, and who learn to lisp his name, almost as soon as they do that of their father and mother.

Nor is Miss Monro often absent; and although she prefers to retain the old house in the Close for winter-quarters, she generally makes her way across to Canon Livingstone's residence every evening.

THE END.



BOMBARDMENT OF PORT HUDSON BY ADMIRAL FARRAGUT'S F

LEET, MARCH 14–15, 1863.—Sketched by Mr. Hamilton.—[See Page 254.]

SECTIONAL VIEW OF A TORPEDO FOUND IN THE MISSISSIPPI BY THE GUN-BOAT "ESSEX."

INTERIOR OF THE CLOCK-WORK.

A NEW TORPEDO.

We publish on this page a picture of a new TORPEDO lately picked up in the Mississippi by the ESSEX. The New Orleans Era thus describes it:

We have before noticed the fact that the ironclad Essex has been engaged in picking up torpedoes and other civilized inventions for blowing up our gun-boats in the Mississippi. We have information that another of these infernal machines has just been discovered and safely taken out of the water above Baton Rouge.

This torpedo is said to have been quite different from any of the others taken up. It was made to drift with the current, and was attached to a log, with a hole of cotton placed in a complaisant position, for the supposed purpose of attracting the attention of the gun-boats. It was conceived that it would, on being touched, explode by means of percussion, something similar to the works of a clock. A hammer was fixed to strike the fuses, setting fire to the powder, of which there was about 250 pounds.

This torpedo is now on board of one of our war vessels, where it is an object of curiosity, not unmixed with contempt, to our sailors, who do not recognize it as at all in the regular line of fair stand-up, give-and-take naval fighting.

STEALING A MARCH.

STRETCHED at full length before the most magnificent of all the fires, with a pleasant sense of warmth diffusing itself from the soles of the feet along the whole person, a party of us (the First New Jersey Cavalry) lay with a lazy enjoyment of the heat, and a feeling of satisfaction with our supper. Each was drawing upon his pipe, and exhaling a cloud of fragrant smoke, except the chief proprietor of the establishment, the Lieutenant-Colonel of the regiment. I do not think that there can be found a pleasanter fellow for a companion during the long evening lounge around a camp-fire than B——. Though never out of the United States, he has been, Hibernianly speaking, a great deal in them, and has anecdotes associated with almost every place which becomes prominent in connection with the present war. But what I enjoy the most is to set him talking about some of his adventures since he has been with us, and extract all those details which are not obtainable in a second-hand report. As he seems to enjoy the revival in his memory of these former scenes as much as we do to whom they are fresh, it is no difficult task to start him on a narration.

The talk began by some remark upon the character of the country around us, which our regiment had scouted in the spring preceding. There was a little difference of opinion about the bend in the river, and whether our picket line there might not be improved. Captain G—— thought that it might, and appealed to the Colonel. "I think not," was the reply. "If I had to study the line there pretty closely last spring to find a place where I could cross, and the pickets now cover, as far as possible, every practicable ferry. Unless we had more men I could not suggest any improvement."

"Why," said L——, "what were you looking for a crossing here for? W—— never meant to take Rebeldom in this direction, just as he went to Jackson's army afterward at Harrisonburg, did he?"

"No; this was a little affair of my own, when we bagged a party of rebel couriers and brought in some horses—among others that nice pair of Bailey Peyton mares that I had last summer."

"I remember hearing something about that when I rejoined near Seldom's; but we were all off on detached service just then, and I never heard the particulars of the affair, nor know where it took place. How did you manage to get to —m without their taking wing?"

"It is rather a long story for a man to tell about himself," responded B——.

"No matter," I put in; "we are all smokers, and will be very grateful if you will take our share of the talk out of your mouths. So begin at the beginning, and we will take the story, as an artist might now take you, at full length." The Colonel stretched himself into a comfortable position, and began:

"You all know how the contrabands began to flock in to us as soon as we came down from Falmouth to Port Conway. It was a sort of second Exodus, slightly differing from the first, especially as to color and smell. They managed to get to us, not only from down the neck, but also from across the river—one party bringing in valuable mares, and the others materially good information. So we welcomed them all, and sent them on toward the North Pole rejoicing. One of the fellows from the other side, Humphrey, who was with Colonel W—— for some time afterward, seemed to have come off rather against his will. I got into a talk with him, and found out that he was rather ill about ten or twelve miles back from the river. He might have been staying there to this time, perhaps, if the neighbors had not taken the alarm at losing so many of their servants. They had arranged with the rebel pickets, therefore, to assemble themselves and bring all their slaves to a certain place, where a small cavalry post had been established. The general was to send a force to guard them until they got within his lines, when they were to be taken to work on the Richmond fortifications, or else sold South. This kind of plan always gets wind in some way, and many of the negroes took the alarm. Among others Humphrey very sensibly concluded that if he had to leave home, he would prefer himself to decide the direction of his journey; and he consequently stole off by night, escaping across the river to us. Now his casual allusion to this post stuck fast in my mind, and I managed to make him describe it to me. From what he said I judged that it did not connect with any others in the neighborhood, but was there merely for purposes of observation. So it was just possible that I might steal upon them, catch most of them, and be back before there could be time for a force to come down upon us in front.

I began to hunger after the capture, and asked Humphrey whether he could guide a party through the country at night to the house where they staid. The darkey's face lit up with unexpected intelligence and animation at the question; and when he declared not only his ability but his willingness to do so, I felt that I could rely on him. I went straight up to the house and spoke to the Colonel. It was when head-quarters were at Powhatan Hill. I believe that W—— was sorry that he was not a captain instead of regimental commander. If he had been he would certainly have tried to take the affair out of my hands. As it was, he gave me plenty of counsel and warning, but consented to my taking a party of volunteers and crossing the river that night. It rained hard enough at night to quell the courage of any gang before a fight, tattoo, and felt our way down to the river. In a leaky boat, two at a time, we managed to cross, the noise of the skiff in the water sounding in our ears all the time as if it must be audible at least five miles; and just as two blew, dismissing the rest of the escort to bed, we started to the river, perhaps forever. We had, of course, left spurs and sabres behind on such an expedition; but all of my men had their pistols, and I myself had a few seventeen inches, and had three negroes as guides. Humphrey led the advance, following implicitly, and only keeping him in sight from his wearing a light-colored linsey coat. How it happened that some of the men did not get lost in the darkness I can not understand; for I did not hear a whisper sometimes for miles together, and only rarely the splash of a footfall in a puddle, indicating that the boys were keeping closely in my rear. I believe that, with their present recklessness, some of them would have straggled; but danger was then near to them, and they were nervously alive to every sound. As we were guided through heavy fields, over plantation-roads, and across by-paths, feeling very anxiously and to a slight degree scared —at least I did—the party whom we were going to surprise was much more agreeably occupied. They were all young men of the neighborhood, who had gone in a body from a local cavalry company into the Confederate service. So they were rather petted and made much of by the families around, especially by the young ladies. The sergeant had been particularly attracted by a daughter of Dr. Golding, the gentleman at whose place the party was posted; but whether that was the cause or the effect of his selecting the locality I am unable to tell. The afternoon of our march he had told the young lady that he was going to ride down and take a look at the fords, laughingly making the remark that he was going to see if the rebels had left any fish in the river. Humphrey assured me that the jokes were made about the Yankees, ten miles off across the river. At last, as the hands of the clock drew round toward midnight, the merry party broke up, the last words of Miss Golding being a peculiar warning to take care or the Yankees would catch them. It was answered by a defiant laugh, and the sergeant retired with his men to their quarters in an adjoining office. There was a formal watch kept; but, at such a distance from the enemy, the young men had grown very careless. A man was placed on a hill a little distance off, another outside the house itself, and their horses were picketed somewhere within their reach. On this occasion the planter's son-in-law probably made the rebels oblivious of their duty, and that at the very critical moment. Certain it is that the guard outside the door went off duty for down without anyone taking his place, and the outpost, after staying beyond his hour, came in to see why he was not relieved.

"Now, having described the situation of the enemy, I shall go back to the history of my own party. We had been moving at about eight o'clock, and hour after hour marched slowly on under the guidance of the negroes, unable of ourselves to tell in the direction in which we were traveling. We became more and more cautious and watchful as we advanced, though we had not heard a sound of life around us. Humphrey, who was then stopped, talked a crouching attitude. We all found ourselves involuntarily doing the same, though I suppose each one had a confidence that his neighbor was doing so. Presently I could hear footsteps advancing along the path. As we did not wish to meet any one, we of course halted as noiselessly as possible, and yielded the right of way. There were about half a dozen persons in the party, but I could not tell whether they were negroes or a patrol. Whoever they were we escaped their notice, and at once resumed our march. At last we emerged from a wooded hollow, and saw the vague outline of a building in a little denser black than the sky around it. 'All right,' whispered Humphrey, pointing to a particular part of the house. 'Is there any fence or hedge between here and there?' I inquired, 'or is it open?' 'Right up,' he said; 'straight up, massa,' he responded, so excited that I believe he did not comprehend the question. 'Does the house have a room or into a passage?' was my next question. 'Right in dar, massa; you jump right on 'em,' was his answer, to be kept still by the people in the place. So I posted my men, and then my orderly and I headed two parties in at each of the opposite sides of the building. Just as I had got to the top of my speed I felt a violent blow upon my chest which almost staggered me. I threw up my hand and touched a picket fence. With one leap I was over it, and at the door. My men were delayed by trying to climb the fence, and I was just as touched the door as it was opened from within, and I was face to face with a gray back. Before I could even say Surrender! he turned, presenting a run along the passage, and dashed through a side door. For a moment I was bewildered by finding the passage where I expected to find the reserving myself. I followed in time to see him making for a pile of arms.

'Surrender! shouted I; and without my really meaning it my pistol went off. He spun round, saying, 'You have shot me, Sir;' but I did not have time to attend to him, for all around the room my men and comrades lying down. I sprang at the nearest, had my knee on him, my breast on another, and my pistol-muzzle against a third at the same instant. Just then my men get round to the window, and seeing me apparently struggling with assailants, fire through the glass. Unfortunately both were fatal, one man being killed, and another mortally wounded. My man only had a bullet through his arm, and before the rebels immediately surrendered, and we found that the party consisted of seven. The wounded man was a nephew of Dr. Golding, and had been one of the party in the parlor. I immediately sent a message to Dr. Golding requesting him to come and attend upon his nephew and guest. At the same moment a series of most piercing shrieks rang out from the main building, and I thought a dangerous enough for six. I sent a second envoy to the Doctor, informing him that if he did not come at once I should have to bring him, together with a polite request for the cessation of that very loud and disagreeable noise. Both messages were effectual. We had the arm of the slightly wounded prisoner dressed at once; and while some of my men found and sadded the horses of the party, the rest of us assisted in ministering to young Brodus, who, as a short inspection proved, was dying. It was the first time that we were brought face to face with our work, and it made us very melancholy to contemplate the agony of that fine young fellow. Some of my men almost cried. But we did not have time to yield to any sentiments of pity or sorrow. We were ten miles from the river, with an active enemy not so very far off. So, guarding our five prisoners, and bringing off their five horses, we started on our return along the self-same road. We moved, though, much faster on the way back, the cause of which you may perhaps comprehend; and as we reached the hill commanding the river we heard the cheerful notes of our bugles sounding out reveille. There in the clear dawn we could catch sight of some of our men waiting anxiously for the boat. It soon came across to us, and swimming the horses, we made our way into camp, feeling very proud of our expedition and its fruits.—And now, who is going with me to visit the pickets?"

LADY COURTHOPE'S TRAP.

"THERE is a storm gathering yonder over the Beacon Hill; the air is heavy with thunder. Surely, Richard, it were better even now to let your journey rest until to-morrow."

The tall, bronzed knight, standing booted and spurred, with his hand upon his horse's mane, turned to look with a merry smile in the fair, anxious face of his lady by his side.

"And if the storm should come, do you think, my sweet wife, that Dick Courthope has never ridden through wind and rain before, or fair, for fear of a wetting, I could break my pledge to meet Philip Orme this night in Chester? No, no. Only let me find you watching for me here at noon to-morrow, with those same pink cheeks and bright eyes, and I shall reck little whether I ride in sunshine or in shower. So now, sweet one, farewell! and may God bless you!" and springing into the saddle, the good knight waved a last adieu, and started away down the long avenue.

His young wife's blue eyes followed his retreating figure with a wistful gaze until he halted at the great iron gates and passed through, was hidden from her view; then slowly turning, she remounted the stone steps that led up to the door of Chartrel Manor. The gloomy-looking old porter, who seemed to frown upon her as she entered, the stained-glass window in the hall threw a purple tint upon her face, and made it almost ghastly, and the oak floor gave back a hollow echo to her tread. And then a door at the further end of the hall was softly opened, and Marston, the old butler, advanced toward her. Old he was in service, for he had lived in the same thirty years at Chartrel Manor, at first the page and play-fellow, then the confidential servant and the friend of his master, Sir Richard—and now old in years, and a little under fifty, his black hair was still untouched with gray, and there were few wrinkles in his hard, keen face. He advanced to the lady Courthope, glanced quickly at her, hesitated a moment, and then said, in a respectful but constrained tone: "Surely, my lady, Sir Richard will not ride to Chester on such a day as this?"

The lady looked up as though surprised at his addressing her. "Yes," she said, "he has just started. He laughs at the weather; but I—"

"There is little cause to fear, my lady, the storm comes, if it river is swollen!" Marston exclaimed, abruptly. "You will see him back yet, my lady, ere night."

"Nay, he must needs be in Chester this evening," Lady Courthope made answer, as, stifling a sigh, she passed on to the drawing-room.

The butler looked after her. "She would have us believe she cares for him, forsooth! He believes it. He has only been days and thought for her old friends, old times, are all forgotten now. Once he would have told me about this Chester journey: and now that waxen doll bears all his plots, and hardly deigns to speak of them to me. But I have learned all I need to know—Sir Richard must be in Chester this night."

In the long, low drawing-room the twilight had already set in, though it was but four o'clock on a November afternoon; the huge fire had burned low, and the heap of glowing fagots shed a weird light on the carved oak and pictures on the walls, while the high-backed chairs and carved tables cast strange, uncouth shadows all around, as the lady made her way to the deep window-recess, and gazed out on the stormy sky. "He rides fast; his horse is sure-footed; the distance is not great," she soliloquized. "Why is this dread upon me, this terrible foreboding of some coming evil?" She turned and sank into the darkened room, and started as a half-burned log fell with a crash upon the hearth. A longing came over her to hear again her husband's hilthy voice, to see his full glance, to have him there beside her; and then gradually her thoughts wandered away from this moment and this place, and she dreamed as Kensington, alive with gay young voices, smiling faces, and where her voice, her face had, only eight months since, been the queen and the belle of the ball, for she had been a cherished daughter of that house until Sir Richard Courthope's eyes would see her, and brought her here to be the mistress of his Cheshire home. Tenderly she recalled the young brothers and sisters, that now lay asleep in her happy remembrance days, and wondered if they yet missed her, and might perhaps be speaking of her even then; till all at once her heart took another turn, and she felt as though her fond remembrances were treason to the absent husband, who was far dearer to her than any of those former party. But still thinks off this strange sadness which had crept upon her. With a sudden impulse she sprang up, stirred the glowing embers into a blaze, and sitting down beside her harpsichord, began a low, soft air; then her mood changed, and the full notes of some martial tune rang out into the room. Once she paused when Marston entered, bearing the tall, silver candlesticks; and as the music died away she heard the beating of the rain against the casement, and the howling of the wind among the trees. A minute later, and then her fingers were busy there again. "The storm has come, my lady." It was Marston who spoke. She had thought him gone, but he was standing close behind her chair. "Sir Richard can never pass Craven Ford to-night," he went on.

"What will he do?" and she looked round with startled eyes.

"He may make for home, but I fear, my lady; an I had your leave, I would ride out to meet him with a lantern. The night is black as pitch, and one false step by the cliff-path would be death." He spoke low, but there was a strange eagerness in his tone and in his face.

"Go, pray, go!" she exclaimed, her voice trembling with anxiety; "and yet—might you not send Stephen in your stead?" She knew not why she asked that question; she only knew that some vague feeling prompted it.

Marston's face darkened. "He is a stranger to the country, while I have lived here from my childhood. He does not even know the road, while I have ridden along it hundreds of times by night and day. But be it as you will, my lady."

"Go yourself," she once more repeated; "lose not a moment. Heaven send you may be there before Sir Richard!"

The man turned silently to obey her orders, but as he reached the door he looked round, and for an instant his eye met hers—only for an instant; but there was something in that one glance so peculiar, so sinister, that she almost shuddered. Ere she could recover her first shock, ere she could speak or think, he was gone. What did it mean? She had long known that he bore her no good-will, that he regarded her as an intruder in her husband's house, and that he bitterly resented the stern rebukes, and even threats, with which his master had visited his occasional disrespect to her. She had known this long, but never had his dislike been written so plainly in his face as now. Could he be plotting harm? Should she follow him, and countermand his going? And then again she smiled at her own nameless terrors. For thirty years Marston had served Sir Richard faithfully—surely he would not now be false to him. That cliff-path might indeed be feared, but not the old and trusted servant. So she listened till, in less than half an hour, she heard his horse's hoofs crashing on the gravel road. She did not hear something else; she did not hear his muttered words, as he glanced up at the lighted windows of the drawing-room: "She would have stopped me had she dared, but she can not stop me now. There will be a heavy reckoning this night for the scorn she has made Sir Richard heap upon me;" and his teeth were ground with something like a curse.

Lady Courthope, sitting thoughtfully beside the fire, her eyes fixed upon the leaping flames, her hands lying idle in her lap, was left undisturbed, till nearly two hours later Stephen came to tell her supper waited. She asked him as she rose if the storm still raged without. "It has passed, my lady, and the sky is clear." She went to the window and drew aside the curtain. The dark clouds were gone, and in their stead the moon shone bright on wood and hill. Marston's journey would be needless; Sir Richard would be safe now. She heaved a deep sigh of relief, and with a light step went her way to the supper-room.

The evening wore away; the great clock over the stables had long since struck nine, and the hands were nearing ten, when Lady Courthope, throwing a cover over the embroidery which had occupied her since supper, retired to her own chamber for the night. It was a large, lofty room in the west wing of the building, remote from the staircase, and at the further end of a long corridor which opened by side-doors into several unused rooms. But the young bride had chosen it rather than any other, for she knew her husband had lived in it and loved it, and that long ago it had been his mother's room. The high mantle-piece with its curious carvings, the ceiling decorated with strange paintings of nymphs and Cupids, the antique furniture, and the tall canopied bedstead, gave a quaint and sombre aspect to the chamber; but to-night the fire roared and crackled on the hearth, and flashed upon the yellow damask draperies, and the candles burning on the dressing-table lit up every corner. As Lady Courthope entered her maid came forward from a door on the opposite side of the room which led into a small dressing-room.

"Have you been waiting long, Hester?" the lady exclaimed, noting the girl's weary eyes. "You look sadly tired."

"I have but just come in, my lady. Anne and I have been in the work-room all the evening, and 'tis that makes my head ache so."

"Poor girl!" said her mistress, pityingly; "you have been more used to milking cows than stooping over needle-work. But cheer up, Hester, and it will seem more easy in time. Have the others gone to rest?"

"All but Stephen, my lady; I heard him cross the hall just now."

"Tell him he need not keep watch for Sir Richard. He is, I trust, ere now safe in Chester. He must have forded the river while it was yet passable."

"Or if the stream were swollen, my lady, he had but to ride down to the old stone bridge below father's house," the girl said, quietly.

"The bridge? I heard of no bridge!" exclaimed Lady Courthope.

"'Tis by the old priory—a matter of three miles round maybe; but Sir Richard knows it well."

"And Marston had forgotten it," said her mistress, musingly.

"He said nothing of the ford," Hester answered; "he only said that he was going to ride after Sir Richard."

"He has not come back?" Lady Courthope asked, abruptly.

"Oh no, my lady; he told us that if he did not meet Sir Richard he should stay at the Golden Horn till morning."

"I gave him no such leave;" and there was surprise and resentment in Lady Courthope's tone. A long silence followed, while the maid moved softly to and fro, assisting her mistress to undress, till, as she brought the taffeta dressing-gown and velvet slippers, Lady Courthope said, kindly: "That will do; I can brush my own hair for this night. Now go, and sleep off your headache."

The maid lingered a while, but at a second bidding she withdrew, thankful to be released. Lady Courthope followed, to secure the door; then returning, she drew an arm-chair close to the fire, and leaning back in it began to unfasten her shining braids of hair. With her fingers moving dreamily among the golden tresses, as they fell around her lovely face, she sat thinking of many things; she thought of her husband, the husband who seemed yet closer to her heart for that very difference of age which had made many marvel at the marriage; she thought of his tender indulgence toward her faults, of his almost fatherly care, of his sympathy in all her pains and pleasures, and yet of the manly respect and trust with which he treated her—of the perfect confidence which he, the man of forty-five, showed in the wife more than twenty years younger than himself. And then she pictured the coming years, and the time when his hair should be white, and his now upright figure bent; and when she in turn should show her love and gratitude by her unwearied care—when she should forestall his every wish, and make his declining age so happy that he should never regret his youth; and when too—and her cheek flushed at the thought—young children, bearing in their faces a mingled likeness to them both, might perchance be about them, making the house, so quiet now, ring with laughter from morn to night; and as that picture rose before her she yearned to lay her head upon her husband's breast and whisper it to him.

It was so strange to be here, far from him. If she could but leave this lonely, silent room, and mount her horse, and gallop through the darkness to that inn at Chester. That vague dread was coming back to her again. The fire was dying down, the room seemed darker, and a cold chill crept over her frame. The dread grew. The ivory brush upon her knee slid down, and fell with a dull, heavy sound upon the floor. She stooped hastily to reach it; but as she raised her face, all veiled by her long drooping hair, she saw, away by the window in the furthest corner of the room, a bony hand grasping the fringed edge of the damask curtain, and a white, eager face peering from behind it, intently watching her. One instant and the curtain fell to again softly, silently, and that face was gone. But she had seen it, and she knew it. Not six hours ago that same look of hatred and revenge had been turned upon her, and with a sickening heart she recognized the fierce eyes, the lowering brows, and knew at last what that look meant. She did not start or cry. Her pulses throbbed wildly,—her very blood was chilled; but she sat on, calmly, quietly. She had trembled at the bare thought of peril to her husband; but now in her own fearful danger she was brave and steadfast. Her icy hands still toyed with her bright hair, her eyes were bent vacantly upon the dying embers, and there was no outward sign of the tumult within; and yet she knew and understood all. Marston was there close by her. His night-journey had been but a feint to hide his deadly purpose and to screen himself. He had stolen back in the darkness, and hidden there to wait for her, and—murder her. And he might murder her. Here alone in this locked room, how could she escape him? If she fled, if she could even gain the gallery outside, it would avail her little. Long, long before she could pass those deserted rooms, before her voice could summon any to her aid, he would be upon her, his fingers at her throat. And then there came across her a strange memory of how one summer day she had seen him standing on the garden terrace twisting in his hands a piece of rope—how he had wound it round and round until the strained fibres were stiff and rigid, and how then his iron fingers had been bent for one more effort, and when the last turn was given the rope was left hanging idly on his arm. A strange thing to recall at such a time as this; stranger still that she should almost shudder in recalling it. What, if rising from her chair, she were to go straight to that window, and drawing back the curtain, confront him there, and in her husband's, in his master's name, appeal to him for pity? Ah no; that name from her lips would but inflame his jealousy and hate. She raised her eyes, and they rested on something bright and glittering, something which just then almost seemed a friend; for there above the chimney-piece, within reach of her hand, hung her husband's rapier. She might seize it, and with one wild dash stab her enemy ere he could free himself from those concealing folds; but her woman's soul shrank from that deed even in this her dire extremity. In that upward glance another thought had come into her mind—her dressing-room! The door stood open, not ten paces from her. Once locked in there—but, alas! there was neither bolt nor bar, and the key turned on the outside. Her heart almost sank within her. Already she seemed to hear stealthy steps upon the floor, behind, around her, to feel hot breath upon her cheek; and still she sat on quietly. Was there no escape for her? Once again her eyes fell on the open door of the dressing-room.

There are moments in life when every power of the mind is unnaturally strained, and when ideas and plans which at another time might be the work of weary hours are formed in one short instant. Such a moment came to Lady Courthope now. As she looked at the dressing-room door and the key on the outside, a scheme flashed across her, bringing back the life-blood to her cheek, sending fresh hope to her heart. If she could but decoy him into that room—decoy him as she has seen birds and dogs decoyed by some tempting bait. She has a bait. He has come for his revenge, but she knows there is another passion strong in him, and that passion is avarice. Often has she seen his eyes brighten at the touch of gold; often has Sir Richard laughingly said that the one fault of his old and faithful servant was the love of money; and now, if through that love she can beguile him first to the dressing-room, she may yet be saved. The part before her was hard and perilous, but she could trust herself to play it. She knew that if her nerve once failed her doom was sealed, but the brave young heart did not quail. Slowly and deliberately she fastened up her hair, then rising from her seat threw fresh logs upon the fire, and crossing the room laid her brush upon the dressing-table. Some books were lying there; she took up one of them, turned the leaves carelessly, then throwing it down, exclaimed, in a low tone, "Too tired to read, and yet not tired enough for sleep, I wish the night were over!" She yawned wearily, waited a moment, as though in doubt, then muttering, "By-the-by, those emeralds," took a bunch of keys from the table, and went toward a small ebony cabinet inlaid with silver which stood beside the fire-place. Her voice had not faltered. No tone could have betrayed that she had seen that crouching figure, and that her words were spoken for those listening ears, and now she must constrain her limbs to calm, slow movements, to bear out the deception.

She unlocked the cabinet, and from one corner drew out a small satin-wood box—her jewel-box; laying it on the floor beside her, she stooped to arrange two other boxes which she had displaced, and then fastening the cabinet, returned to the dressing-table and lifted one of the lighted candlesticks. With the box in one hand, the candlestick and keys in the other, she advanced toward the dressing-room door. Just as she reached it a board behind her creaked sharply and suddenly, and her heart stood still. Was he following her, tempted too soon by the costly prize? Was the moment come? No; all was again still and silent as the grave. She went on—on to the further end of the long narrow dressing-room, leaving the door still set wide. She put the jewel-box and candlestick upon a table; she stood where her every movement might be seen from the dark corner where he was hiding, and then unfastening the box she laid out the various trays, and spread the glittering trinkets all round her. One by one she lifted them, holding them close to the light, moving them to and fro, so that the precious stones might sparkle in the blaze, and then carefully polishing them put them back. For nearly half an hour she stood trifling now with one, now with another, her fingers busied in rubbing and arranging, her ear strained for any sound, her heart leaping as the flickering candle threw sudden shadows on the walls; and still there was no movement in the dim chamber beyond. She must return there now, for she could stand no longer; her knees would scarcely support her; her strength seemed ebbing, and that forced composure was too terrible to last. For one half instant she paused to gather breath; then, with a weary sigh, she laid aside the bracelet she was holding, and raising her candle moved toward the bedroom. On the threshold she stopped, retreated a step or two, and seemed to hesitate. If she had seen how at that instant the hand behind the curtain was tightening its grasp upon the knife it held, and the crouching form was making ready for a spring—if she had seen this, even her courage might have failed; but she did not see it, and she played out the play. Murmuring in a low, steady tone, "No matter for to-night," she came on into her chamber, leaving the jewels scattered about the table, and the door standing open. And now the trap was set, and she might rest and watch.

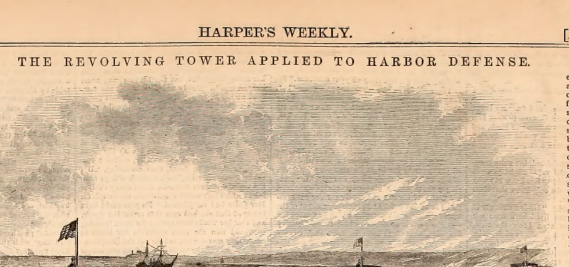
Hastily extinguishing the lights, she drew aside the bed-curtains and lay down. There was a strange repose after that long and fearful self-restraint in lying motionless in the fitful fire-light, her aching limbs stretched out, her weary head resting on the pillow—a strange repose, even though he was so near her. The minutes passed away, the deep tones of the clock struck out twelve, and still all was quiet, save for the click of the embers on the hearth and the distant baying of the dogs in the court-yard. With closed eyes, drawing deep breath, as though asleep, she lay listening. It seemed as if she had lain there many hours, when at last there was a faint stir in that corner. He was coming out now. She dared not look or move, but she heard—she heard the dull fall of the curtain, the stealthy, cautious footsteps on the floor. Was he going to the dressing-room? No—Heaven help her!—he was coming to her bed. The steps came on, nearer, nearer; something brushed against the bed-clothes, then stopped close beside her. Her eyes were closed, her breath still came softly through her parted lips, but within that statue-like form there was a human soul praying in mortal anguish for pardon for herself and comfort for her widowed husband. A pause—then another slight movement. He was bending over her; his hand was pressing the pillow; then something cold and sharp was lightly laid across her throat. The last pang had come, and she had no power now to move or cry. One moment more, and she would be at peace. But the moment passed, and she still lived. Another moment, and that cold pressure was gone. His breath was no longer on her face, yet he was still there; she felt him stirring; she knew that he was watching her. Long he watched, then, muttering low, "My hand shakes; I'll wait a while," he turned away. She heard him turn, she heard his footsteps slowly receding from the bed, but the sound brought no relief; she was past that; she had felt the death-pangs, and she almost longed that the knife had done its work, and brought her release from that long torture; but the end had not come yet. He was going to the dressing-room. Once, twice he stopped, as though listening, then he went on again; and now he was moving something on the dressing-table. There was a faint rattle, a dead pause, then again that stealthy tread. She strove to open her eyes, but they seemed sealed, and it needed a convulsive effort to unclose them. She did unclose them, and she saw him.

The room was very dark now, but by the faint glimmer of the fire she could just discern the doorway of the dressing-room, and the figure standing within it. The trap had taken—the jewels had lured him. He turned his head, and her lids fell instantly, though she lay hidden in the deep shadow of the heavy bedstead. When she looked again he was standing where she had stood an hour ago. There was light in the dressing-room, for he held a blazing match, and a candle burned upon the table by his side. She could see him plainly now, his tall square form, his long arms, but not his face, for his back was toward her. Casting away the burning match, he bent over the table and softly swept the jewels toward him. This was her time. It would be but the work of two minutes for him to gather all together and return to her. She knew that in those two minutes lay her only chance—the chance for which she had so longed. But she seemed spell-bound. That frightful moment when the steel had touched her neck had paralyzed her powers, and an unspeakable horror was upon her. She struggled with that horror; she thought of her husband, of all to whom her life was precious, and with one inward prayer for strength, for courage, she slipped noiselessly on to the floor. He had not heard her; his head was still bent; his fingers were still busy with the jewels. Barefooted, her eyes fixed upon his figure, she stole on, softly groping her way toward the door, past the end of the bed, by the dressing-table; she was close upon it now, her hand was stretched out to grasp the handle—there were but two more steps to take—when her foot struck with a dull sound against an unnoticed stool, and she stumbled. She recovered herself instantly; but faint as the noise was his ear had caught it, and he turned and saw her. For one moment they stood face to face gazing upon each other, then they both made for the door. She was the nearer of the two, and she was there first; she had hold of it; she pushed it to, but ere she could turn the key his fingers were upon the other handle. It was a struggle for life and death—a struggle between a strong man and a desperate woman. It could not last long. Inch by inch the door was yielding to his pressure; when, gathering all her strength for one last effort, with a power beyond her own she forced it home. It closed; the key rattled round in the lock, and with a wild hoarse scream she fell back upon the floor. She was still conscious; she heard him beating on the strong oak panels in his vain fury; she heard his passionate imprecations; and after a while other sounds, too, reached her ear—hurrying feet in the gallery, many voices outside her door. That piercing cry had roused every sleeper in the house, and they were all gathered there now, entreating admittance; she rose, she tottered across the room, and let them in; and as they came around her, gazing horror-stricken at her wild eyes, her blanched lips, she panted out her tale, ever pointing to that inner door; then moaning out, "O husband, save me!" swooned away.

It was still early on the morning of the self-same day when Sir Richard, followed by a groom, galloped up the beech-avenue. The white autumn mist hung like a shroud over the park, the golden leaves fell in showers around him, but he noted them not, as with spur and whip he urged on his flagging steed. His ruddy face was pale as death—his eyes were fixed on the walls of his house, her house—his teeth were set in dread anxiety, for he knew all. They had sent to summon him, and since he left Chester he had not once drawn rein. He was here at last, at his own door; and throwing himself off his exhausted horse, he flung the reins to his servant and sprang up the steps. No wife was there to welcome him. All was still and quiet. Without—the dewy grass, the red sun struggling through the mist, the falling leaves. Within—the dark old hall, the servants sadly watching for him, and low sounds of weeping. He looked from one to another; then his parched tongue slowly formed the words, "Where is she?" They led him to the room where she was lying, but when he knelt beside her, and pressed his quivering lips upon her fevered brow, she only greeted him with a wild laugh, and gazing at him vacantly, began again her miserable rambling talk of emeralds and keys, lonely rooms, and glittering knives. For a while he lingered, looking down upon her haggard face, softly stroking her tangled hair; then, unable to endure it longer, hurried away. They wanted him elsewhere, for Marston was still in the house, and had asked to see him. But Sir Richard shook his head; he dared not trust himself just now near that man; let them carry him away far from his sight. There was nothing fresh to hear, for Marston had already told all—how his first dislike had deepened into deadly hatred; and how, finding that Sir Richard would be absent, he had resolved to wreak his hatred, enrich himself, and flee; how, feigning that night-journey, and leaving his horse some three miles off, he had returned unseen to the house. He had thought to do the deed, and then, escaping with what treasure he might find, be far upon his way to London before the morning broke. His horse was fleet; the servants thought him at Chester; and long before suspicion could have turned upon him he would have been safe. Doggedly and calmly he spoke of all this, and now bade them bring Sir Richard there, to hear what his neglect and harshness had brought about. They carried him bound hand and foot to Chester, where, three months later, dogged and calm as ever, he was sentenced to a life-long exile. Many days went by, and still Sir Richard, ever watching by his wife, met only those vacant eyes, heard only that weary, ceaseless muttering. At length she knew him—at length, when weeks had come and gone, she came from her sick chamber and, leaning on his arm, crept down to the drawing-room. She had last left that room a bright-haired bride, radiant with health and beauty; she entered it again gray-haired and feeble, trembling at every sound, clinging to her husband's arm for protection and support. And when years had passed away, and the roses had returned to her cheeks, the sparkle to her eyes—and when the fair children she had dreamed of, clustering round her knee, looked up into her face, and marveled at those silvery locks, then she would hush them with fond words and tender kisses, but never spoke to them about that night—never again trod that [illegible] never again entered that room.

THE REVOLVING TOWER APPLIED TO HARBOR DEFENSE.

THE question of Fort and Harbor Defense is of the utmost importance at the present moment. These are the vital points at which we may be assailed by a maritime enemy. With the present means of destruction a single vessel of war once within range of the city holds it at mercy. The first gun-boat which lay off the town virtually captured New Orleans; and a single vessel of war in the Narrows at last river could impose its own terms upon New York. Recent events show that ordinary forts are almost powerless to prevent the passage of steamers. The range of casemated guns is so narrow, and their aim is so uncertain, that the chances are that a passing vessel will not be struck. Our fleet passed Forts St. Philip and Jackson almost unharmed, and our Western gunboats run with impunity the gauntlet of the miles of batteries at Vicksburg.



Indeed, the power of our present fortifications, both offensive and defensive, is altogether inferior to that of the iron-clad vessels, with their heavy ordnance, to which they may be opposed. We must have a system of defense adapted to the present state of offensive warfare, and iron must be the material used. Captain Dahlgren, in his able Report, says: "Whatever may be the material of the interior structure, the exterior must be of iron. Bare masonry should never be exposed to the action of rifled cannon." This conclusion is strikingly verified by what has occurred within the few months since the date of this Report. The heavy guns of the Monitor, which brought down the solid rock of the Palisades by the red, produced no perceptible effect on the earth-works of Fort M'Allister, whose huge balls also glanced like hailstones from the iron armor and turret of the vessel.

The offensive power of our fortifications must also be largely increased to meet the new state of things. They must be enabled to concentrate a larger fire upon any desired point. The demonstrated success of the principle of the Revolving Tower shows clearly how this is to be done. It is no derogation to the credit justly due to Mr. Ericsson to say that in application of this principle he has availed himself of only a small part of its capability as proposed to its inventor, Mr. Theodore R. Timby. This gentleman, as was shown at length in an article in a late number of Harper's Magazine, invented the Revolving Tower more than twenty years ago, and secured a patent covering the entire principle of the "Revolving Tower for offensive and defensive warfare, whether used on land or water;" and every such turret is built under this patent, and the inventor is paid a royalty upon each. The principle, as developed by Mr. Timby, is indeed capable of still more effective application to stationary than to floating batteries. The illustration at the top of this page presents an external view of such a stationary tower, and the application of a cordon of them to the defense of the harbor of New York. The diagram at the bottom of the page exhibits the interior structure.

The tower is supposed to be of iron, 100 feet in diameter, with 60 guns in two tiers, revolving once in a minute, by means of a steam-engine placed in the foundation upon which the tower rests. It can be of any required thickness. If one foot is not sufficient, it may be two or five, so as to be absolutely impregnable to the heaviest ordnance. The arrangement for sighting and discharging the guns, which is not established in the "Monitor" turrets, is really the most important part of the whole invention. This will be clearly understood from the sectional diagram, which represents the tower cut down vertically through the centre, so as to show the interior arrangements.

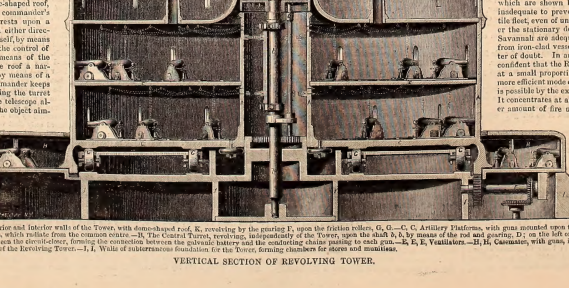
In the centre, under the dome-shaped roof, is a small turret, which is the commander's station during action. This rests upon a central shaft, which revolves in either direction, independent of the tower itself, by means of a wheel and gearing, under the control of the commander, and not by means of the steam-engine. There is in the roof a narrow opening, through which, by means of a theodolite, or telescope, the commander keeps watch of the enemy. By turning the turret in either direction he keeps the telescope always pointed directly toward the object aimed at. If this moves, he follows it, just as a sharpshooter with his telescopic rifle follows the course of a moving object until he is ready to fire. Now, as the tower revolves around the turret, each gun is at every revolution for an instant brought directly in a vertical line with the telescope, and if the gun were discharged at this instant the ball would go straight to its mark. Provision is made for doing this with unerring certainty, by means of a galvanic battery, with conducting wires leading to each gun, so arranged that the connection is formed at the instant when gun and telescope are in a line. A micrometer is attached to the telescope, by means of which the commander ascertains the precise distance of the enemy, and a signal to the officer of each gun directs him to elevate or depress the piece so as to secure the proper range. It will be seen that the gunners have nothing to do but to load their pieces, run them to the port-hole, and place the fuse in the vent. The aiming and discharging of the whole battery is done by one presiding mind calmly seated in the watch-tower. And as it has been abundantly shown that a gun can be loaded in one minute, the effective power of one such tower is 60 guns a minute—one every second—delivered with unfailing accuracy upon any point in the whole circle of the horizon within the range of the pieces. A moment's consideration will show that the precision of the aim of each gun in the battery is greater than that of a sharp-shooter with a telescopic rifle, for it does not depend at all upon the firmness of the hand of the marksman, but solely upon the accuracy of his sight and the coolness of his judgment. Moreover, there is an interval—brief it may be, but still an interval—required for pulling the trigger of the rifle; but in the case of the cannon, the discharge being effected by electricity, there is no space of time which we can measure between the aim and the discharge. If a shot from a cannon traveled with the same accuracy as does a rifle-bullet, a man might be picked off with a 15-inch ball as easily as with a rifle-bullet. This perfect accuracy of flight is perhaps not attainable; but assuming the extreme range of a cannon-ball to be two miles, there is no question that a ship could be hit at that distance by every shot.

Having thus a clear idea of the offensive power of a single tower—that is, that it can deliver a shot every second upon any point within the range of its ordnance—we are prepared to consider the value of a cordon of these towers, in conjunction with various auxiliary appliances suggested by Mr. Timby, as designed for the defense of the harbor of New York, and with such modifications as their topography requires, for every other of our ports.

CORDON OF REVOLVING TOWERS AND CHAINS FOR HARBOR DEFENSE, AS ARRANGED BY MR. TIMBY.

The "Narrows" is of course the point of defense. This passage is about one-third of a mile wide. From each shore a dock is to be built, upon the extremity of which a tower will be placed, reducing the width of the channel to a quarter of a mile. Midway in the channel another tower will be erected upon an artificial foundation. A hostile vessel or fleet seeking to enter the harbor would thus be exposed at every rod of its advance, from the moment when it came within range, to the concentric fire of these three forts, amounting in all to three shots in a second, delivered with unfailing accuracy. As they came up, they would first receive the shots in their bows; when they came opposite the towers, the whole broadsides would be exposed. It is believed that nothing that ever floated could long survive such a fusillade; but if they should succeed in passing, then, as long as they were within range, their sterns would be exposed.

But the plan, as developed by Mr. Timby, and illustrated in the engraving at the head of this page, makes provision for detaining the enemy right under the towers, and with broadside exposed, at point-blank range. A series of massive chains is to be stretched from fort to fort, attached to windlasses moved by the steam-engines in the towers. These chains during peace lie quietly at the bottom of the water, making no obstruction to the passage. But when the approach of an enemy renders it desirable to close the harbor, they are to be drawn up—not "taut," for in that case a great part of their strength would be exhausted in maintaining the tension; but they are to hang swaying in the water at such a height as to prevent the passage of the enemy's vessel. Still further to reduce the strain upon the chains occasioned by their weight, it is proposed to attach to them metallic buoys, leaving their dead weight just sufficient to sink them to the bottom, and causing hardly any strain. Such a cordon of chains would effectually stop the most powerful steamer afloat, leaving her most vulnerable points exposed at short range to a fire of two guns in a second, delivered with perfect accuracy. No vessel ever yet built, capable of navigating the open seas, and thus to be brought to the attack of the harbor of New York, could, we believe, sustain such a fire for a quarter of an hour. It may be still a matter of doubt whether vessels of our "Monitor" class, with scarcely a point vulnerable to shot, could endure it. Nothing can be more certain than that the powerful ironclad ships built by France and England would go down in a few moments under the fire of these towers while detained by the cordon of chains.



But to guard against the possible passage of vessels like our "Monitor," whose vulnerable point lies under water, and is thus safe from cannon-shot, Mr. Timby proposes to add a series of "torpedos" affixed to a chain running from tower to tower in such a manner that they may be drawn directly under a vessel as it lies detained by the chains; these can be discharged at any instant by means of Galvanic battery, thus with almost unfailing certainty blowing the enemy out of the water.

These are the main features of the "System of Revolving Towers as applied to Harbor Defense," as elaborated by the inventor of the principle of the revolving tower. To us they seem fully adequate to insuring an absolutely perfect defense of all our great harbors against any possible assault from the combined navies of the world. Of course to them might be added, if need were, any further auxiliaries, such as floating batteries and rams.

It will be observed that there is not a principle involved in this plan which has not now been thoroughly tested by actual trial. We know that ironclads have been built capable of resisting any guns now known, and that their defensive power can be increased to any required extent. We know that the revolution of these towers can be effected. We know that guns can be instantaneously discharged by the means of the Galvanic battery, and that guns of any size can be fired from the interior of a tower. Thus all the elements involved in this scheme are of well-known and established character; and they are so combined as to bring the most powerful forces known to art to bear in absolute control of a single mind, which directs the whole toward a single desired result.

It must be borne in mind that the defensive powers of these towers is even greater than their offensive powers. That they may be made proof against any guns that have been or can be constructed is clear. Still more evident is it that they would be unassailable by direct assault or escalade. If cannon-balls could not reduce them, human beings could not. They could only be reduced by famine.

The cost of guarding our harbors by such a cordon of towers would of course be considerable. But a most inspection of the general features of the plan is quite sufficient to show that it would be less than by the present mode of stationary forts. And no matter what were the cost, if the end in view were attained it would be well laid out. The one end is to render our great sea-ports absolutely safe from assault by a hostile naval power. A single armed steamer once fairly within range of New York or Boston, or Philadelphia or San Francisco, could in an hour cause more than would be required to build all the towers and appliances required for their protection. Nothing can be more clear than that a cordon of these towers will cost less in time and money than the miles of earth-works and batteries with which the Confederates have endeavored to bar the passage of the Mississippi at Fort Hudson and Vicksburg; all of which are shown by trial to be absolutely inadequate to prevent the passage by a hostile fleet, even of unarmored vessels. Whether the stationary defenses of Charleston and Savannah are adequate to defend those ports from iron-clad vessels is, as we write, a matter of doubt. In any case, however, we are confident that the Revolving Towers, built, at a small proportion of original cost, a far more efficient mode of defense than any which is possible by the existing system of defense. It concentrates at any given moment a greater amount of fire upon any point, delivered with far more accuracy, than has been hitherto attempted. It must also be borne in mind that the cost in men and money is greatly diminished. Miles of fortifications demand thousands of men. A Revolving Tower will require only men enough to work the guns and manage the engines.

THE FIGHT AT PORT HUDSON.

On the night of 14–15th March Admiral Farragut passed the rebel batteries at Port Hudson with his flag-ship, the Hartford, and the Albatross. He attacked the forts with his entire fleet, but all but the two vessels above named were repulsed, and the Mississippi, having grounded, was set on fire and abandoned. We illustrate the combat on pages 248 and 249, and subjoin the following condensed account of the affair from the Herald correspondent:

THE REBEL BATTERIES.

The rebel batteries extend along four miles in length, with a gap here and there between. Below, just before the high bluffs begin, is a very large number of field batteries, the most formidable battery—the central one—is situated, on the highest bluff. Four heavy guns appear to be mounted there in casemates. I say appear, because the flashes from their guns revealed nothing; but the smoke from the muzzles showed that all bayoud was in obscurity —praising it would be the same with guns in open works. The other guns, en barbette, or peering through open embrasures, viewed from the land, consisting of the bay of the land behind and around, though but for a moment. Above the latter are other batteries, one tier frightening them from just below. Beyond these the high bluffs gradually sweep to the general level of the surrounding country. Right opposite the principal batteries, on the right bank of the river, is a point of land on which the Mississippi grounded, in consequence of which she had to be set on fire and abandoned.

After describing the first shots from the Hartford, which were promptly returned from the rebel batteries, the correspondent thus describes the OPENING FIRE.

And now we heard a thundering roar, equal in volume to a whole park of artillery. The war followed by a rushing sound, something like to a hurtling rain then beggars description. Again and again was the sound repeated, till the whole air seemed filled with the raging while fire-storm. It was apparent that the mortar-boats had opened fire. Of this I was soon convinced, for one of the very first shells. Never shall I forget the sight that then met my astonished vision. Just above me, and at an angle of forty-five degrees, with the rapidity of lightning, small globes of golden flame were seen ascending. The pyre circled—it was a mass of unfolding flame, but unreasoning, like the fitful gleam of a firefly, and, like it, made no headway. It was the first shell of the sixth magnitude, the terrible missile—a 13-inch shell—sent from the deck of the mill ship, against which its flight now becomes most clear, till, on reaching its utmost altitude, its controlling force began overcome by the earth's attraction; it describes a parabolic curve, and down, down, it comes, bursting, at last, as it reaches terra firma, but probably alighting in the rebel works ere it explodes to send forth its scathing and destruction around.

THE "RICHMOND" AT WORK.

The Richmond had by this time got within range of the rebel field batteries, which opened fire on her. I had all along thought that we would open fire from our mortars on the top-gallant forecastle, and that, after discharging a few broadsides from the starboard side, the vessel would be wound up by a parting compliment from our stern chasers. To my surprise, however, we opened on our port broadside guns. The effect was startling, as the sound was unexpected; but beyond this I really experienced no inconvenience from the concussion. There was nothing unpleasant to the ear, and the jar to the ship was really quite unappreciable. It may interest the unblinded to be informed how a broadside is fired from a vessel-of-war. I was told on board the Richmond that all the guns were sometimes fired off successively, though this is not the usual course, as it strains the ship. Last night the broadside was fired by commencing at the forward gun, and firing all the rest off in rapid succession, as fast almost as the ticking of a watch. The effect was grand and terrific, and, if the guns were rightly pointed—a difficult thing in the dark, by-the-way—they could not fail to surprise them in and destruction among the enemy.

Of course we did not have every thing our own way; for the enemy poured in his shot and shell as thick as hail. Over, round, astern, at record us, fire the fiery missiles, the hissing, screaming, whistling, shrieking, and howling of which baffle description. It would not be supposed, however, that because our broadside guns were fired that we were simply reeled off, the one after the others were idle. We soon opened with our bow 80-pounder Parrott rifle, which was followed up by one of the gun astern, giving evidence to the fact that we had command of the batteries.

THE ACTION BECOMES GENERAL.

Soon after the Richmond, Lieut. Caldwell, and it was soon ascertained that the Monongahela, with her consort, the Kineo, and the Genesee, were also engaged. The Monongahela carries a couple of two hundred-pounder rifled 9-inch guns, and other lighter batteries. She is credited the rear of her amiable two hundred-pounders to the Richmond; but I was unknown to myself, from my experiences in front of Yorktown last spring, and the opening of the siege-guns from Gen. Warren's works. All I can say is, the noise was splendid. The action now became general. The fire of mortars was incessant, and the flashes from the guns, together with the flight of the shells from the gun-boats, made a spectacle grand in sound and sight impossible to describe. To add to the horrors of the night, it commenced raining, and the inducement of a certain terrible beauty, dense clouds of smoke hanging over the river, shutting out from view the several vessels and confounding them with the batteries, it was very difficult to know how to point the vent running ashore, perhaps right under a rebel battery or into a steamer. Upward and upward rose the deafening shutting of view the beautiful stars and obscuring the whole of the upper vault. Then it was like order was issued, "Boys, don't fire too low on the flash from the enemy's guns." This was our only guide through the "palpable obscurity." Intermingled with the boom of the cannon was the roar of the wounded and the groans of their friends, suggesting that they should be taken below for treatment. So thick was the smoke on the land to concealing several times, and, to add to the horrors of the night, it was next to impossible to tell whether we were running into the Hartford or going ashore, and, if the latter, on which bank, or whether any of the other vessels were about to run into us or into each other. All this time the fire was kept up with little abatement. It seems, however, that we succeeded in silencing the lower batteries of field-pieces.

MUZZLE TO MUZZLE.

This phrase is familiar to most persons who have read accounts of naval fights that took place about thirty years ago, but it is difficult for the uninitiated to realize all the horrors conveyed in these three words. For the first time I had, last night, an opportunity of knowing what the phrase really means. The central battery is situated about the middle of the segment of a circle I have already compared to a horseshoe in shape, though it may be better understood by the term "crescent." This battery stands on a bluff so high that a vessel in passing immediately underneath can not elevate her guns sufficiently to reach those on the battery; neither can the guns on the battery be sufficiently depressed to bear on the passing ship. In this position the rebel batteries on the two horns of the crescent can enfilade the passing vessel, pouring in a terrible crossfire, which the vessel can return, though at a great disadvantage, from her bow and stern guns. We fully expected, on coming to for, as we got within short range, the enemy poured in a terrible fire of grape and canister, which was kept up slow in return—our guns being double-shotted, each gun with a visual of both grape and canister. Every man in his turn was exposed to the same fiery ordeal—nearing the centre battery, and then gradually did our gallant tars return the compliment. This was the hottest part of the engagement. We literally were forced to muzzle, the distance between us and the enemy's guns not more than one hundred yards, though for me it seemed to be only as many feet. In fact, the battle of Port Hudson has been governed by officers and seamen who were engaged in it, and who were present at the passage of Fort Jackson and St. Philip, and the capture of New Orleans, and participated in the fights of Fort Donelson, Fort Henry, Island No. 10, &c., &c., as the severest in the naval history of the present war.

THE "RICHMOND" RETURNS.

Matters had gone on in this way nearly an hour and a half—the first gun having been fired at about half past three o'clock—when the order was countermanded, heart rendeis shutting over our port side. Did the rebels here but receive the slightest intimation of the fact, or that naturally suggested itself to me. To this the reader on the west side of Prospect Island, or near to it, shore that the pop-gun was strewn with the blossom and leaves of the hurtling trees we were passing by. As I passed the machinery of the vessel, on my way forward, I was given to understand that the engineer by an eighty-pounder solid conical shell, which had passed through the hull of the ship, damaging the machinery so as to compel us to return.

CAPILLARY DISEASES.

DR. B. C. PERRY,
THE CELEBRATED DERMATOLOGIST,
Recently FROM 49 WEST 20TH ST., TO 37 ... TON, and the only man in this country who has ever made the Diseased Scalps Loss of Hair, and Blanching,
a specialty, has established himself at
No. 49 BOND STREET, NEW YORK, where he can be consulted by all who are afflicted with any disease of the scalp, loss of hair, or premature blanching.

Dr. Perry is prepared to treat successfully the following diseases, all of which are productive of a loss of hair:

Dandruff, Humors of the Internal Skin, Suppressed Secretion, Irritation of the scalp, Dandruff or Thickened Secretion, Inflammation of the Sebaceous Glands, Premature Loss of Hair, Distended or Swollen Roots, and Premature Blanching.

This is the only method based upon Physiological principles, having never been submitted to the public for the restoration of the Hair.

Particular attention is called to the Doctor's theory of treating Diseased Scalps and Restoring Hair.

It is on such with unbounded success that it is daily and reflecting mind.

There are eighteen Diseases of the Head and Scalp that cause a loss of hair, and in some instances premature blanching, each requiring in its treatment different remedies. Where loss of hair has resulted from any of those diseases, the first thing to be done is to remove the disease by a proper course of treatment; restore the scalp to its normal condition; then the pores open, so that the secretion can pass off, and in every follicle that is open new strands of hair will make their appearance.

The philosophy of premature blanching is this: Iron is one of the principal constituents of dark hair. Lime and Magnesia of light hair. When the suppressed secretion between the skins contains an excess of lime, it is taken up by the strands, causing the hair to turn white. By restoring the pores, the accumulation of lime passes off with the secretions, the natural components of the hair resume their secondary, and the hair resumes its natural color.

Because persons have tried various preparations for the hair, and have been deceived by them, and in some cases their difficulty made worse by their use, they need not be discouraged. The one preparation system for any class of diseases never has known a failure. No one dollar bill pound can be available for a dozen or more diseases; it is always adapted to the condition of the scalp, and in some positively injurious.

Dr. Perry's practice is in accordance with the law of cause and effect. He makes a personal examination, as to the condition of the scalp hair or person, and advises a loss of hair or premature whitening, precocious such remedies according to its nature and requirements, and will remove the disease: hence his great success in treating

Capillary Diseases.

As to Dr. Perry's ability and success in treating diseases of the Scalp, Loss of Hair, and Premature Blanching, he has the permission to refer to Professor Draper, Professor Fleischmann, Clergymen, and others, in every city where he has practiced. They can be seen by calling at his office, No. 49 Bond St.

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS

Are Proven on Biliousness.—In Lord Byron's "Don Juan," one of the first remedies he has Beppo to her lord, on his return from a pestilential region, is: "Some Orange Bitters, my dear." Jug, if you please.

Now a man grows so yellow! How your liver is! Symptoms of a bilious condition manifest themselves in his face, and in the eyes. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters are the best and surest remedy for all bilious complaints that have ever been compounded. Used as a rule against the climatic cause of liver diseases, the BITTERS are the best. They regulate properly the stomach and regulate the secretive organs, and render the system proof against the effects of exposure, failing, and change of diet and of water. They fortify the physique against the causes of indigestion, biliousness, derangement of the bowels, and cure those diseases—the parents of innumerable maladies yet more deadly—with unfailing certainty.

AMERICAN WIT

and

HUMOR.

Illustrated by the Great American Caricaturist,

JOHN McLENAN, Esq.,

Sq., Paper, 50 cents.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage free, on receipt of Fifty Cents.

This rich and readable book is gathered mainly from the Drawer of Harper's Magazine. It is the best living picture of the genial humor of the American people. The facts are those of the every-day life, and the characters, wherever found in every part of the United States, and in every department of social and public life. The anecdotes are of the breath, hue, and pulpit; the garter, shop, and field; the stump, the bar, and the bench. This is a book for every body, and every body will read it with zest. It will do them good, like a medicine. It has not a line to offend the purest taste, not a word for a "little sermon," and then, is relish'd by the wisest men," the grave and reverend seniors will find the book is made for them as well as for the younger and the gay.

American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.
American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being of refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AS ACCURATE AND REliable TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at as low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Aurora and Legionn of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

HERE is a grate gun at last!
In the mold ov Freedum cast,
Made to put dawen treason.
If so be these rebbles dare
To strut reasond in Delaware,
He will know the reason!

He don't feel a cull to grin
When the old tune hawl again
Lincoln's Administeshun;
And refuse to stir a mite
Hall Columby's foes to fite,
For to save the nashun.

He thinks 'tain't much ov a joke
When folkes North begin to crook
For the sake ov party:
He thinks Freemen shood unite
To go in for what is rite,
And support it hearty.

While the Southern rebbels brag
That they'll trample dawen our flag,
And proceed to du it,
He thinks every Northern man
Ought to strike 'em where he can,
Or be made to rue it!

He's the gun to make a noise!
Jest the kind ov metal, boys,

CHARITY GRIMES.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1863.

OUR RELATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

IT is not to be disguised that our relations with Great Britain have reached a most critical pass. The speeches of the Solicitor-General of England and of Lord Palmerston, in Parliament, on 27th March, indicate a determined purpose on the part of the British Government to persevere in the work of fitting out piratical vessels in British ports to prey upon our merchant navy. It was well shown by Messrs. Bright and Gibson, and others, that the equipment of the Florida and Alabama was in violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act; and that other similar vessels—some say eighteen, others fourteen—are being constructed for the rebels at Liverpool and other British ports, without let or hindrance by the Government, and will soon be at sea, manned by British officers, armed with British guns, and as thoroughly British in every respect as the Warrior herself. The only answer to these cogent facts was some legal quips and quibbles in the Nisi Prius style by the Solicitor, and a sneer from Lord Palmerston about "the Americans always picking a quarrel with England whenever they got into trouble."

Passing over the insolence of the latter speaker, who has been well said to represent the black-leg element in the British Cabinet, and the cheap erudition of the lawyer who was hired to defend the Government, the fact remains that we are practically at war with Great Britain without the power of reprisals. Every British dock-yard is now engaged in building steamers to capture and burn our merchantmen, to run our blockade, and to bombard our defenseless sea-board cities. The evidence points irresistibly to the conclusion that all the authorities and men in stations of influence in England are in the conspiracy against us. Lord Palmerston considers our complaints of the destruction of thirty odd American vessels by the British cruiser Alabama mere indications of our wish to pick a quarrel with England; Lord Russell sees no ground for complaint in the Alabama until he has been assured she has got safely to sea, when he issues his tardy warrant; Member of Parliament Laird Iaughs—and the House of Commons re-echoes the laugh—at the objections which are made to his supplying the rebels with a navy; the Commissioners of Customs, with their ears stuffed with cotton and their pockets with the produce of Confederate bonds, are ready to swear off the most obvious Confederate steamer as a vessel of cotton and tweed for the Emperor of China; and the merchants, shipbuilders, and newspapers of England all claim the right of furnishing the rebels with a navy, and denounce us furiously for objecting to their conduct.

These events have very naturally aroused a general and intense hostility to England among all classes in this country. There has never been a time when hatred of the English was so deep or so widely-spread as it is at present. There has never been a period at which war with England could have been more generally welcomed than at present—if we were free to engage in a foreign war.

Yet we do not believe that war is imminent. We can not afford the luxury. The struggle in which we are engaged taxes all our resources, and to carry it safely through to a successful issue will require our undivided energies. For this reason we do not anticipate that our Government will declare war against England—though it has ample ground for doing so; or will even declare an embargo, or seize British property to recompense our ship-owners for the losses they are suffering through the piratical acts of British vessels.

Our cue just now is to suffer every thing from foreigners for the sake of concentrating our whole strength on the suppression of the rebellion. When this is done, we shall have time to devote to our foreign enemies.

So soon as the restoration of the Union has been achieved, we look to see energetic measures adopted by our Government for the settlement of accounts with England. We expect to see every man who has lost a dollar by the depredations of the Alabama paid in full, with interest, by the British Government. The amount can always be collected in the port of New York. Half a dozen British steamers and a score of British ships seized and sold at auction by the United States Marshal would go far to make a balance. And when England next goes to war, let her look out for retaliation. Though her antagonist be only some Hottentot chief, the ocean shall bristle with American cruisers bearing his flag, and England may hope it, that for every peaceful American trader that has been burned during this war by British pirates, ten British vessels shall be destroyed. The next war in which England engages will be the end of her foreign commerce. We mistake our countrymen greatly, if, at the end of twelve months, they have a single British vessel, flag afloat in any sea from the German Ocean to Behring's Straits.

But the watch-word now must be—Patience!

CHARLESTON.

THE attack on Charleston has been made, and has failed. Admiral Du Pont has withdrawn, after losing one vessel and three or four more, being perfectly satisfied that it was hopeless to renew the contest with the force he has. His dispatches and those of his subordinates show the fire of the principal works commanding the harbor has been concentrated, so that a passage through Sumter, Moultrie, and Beauregard is exposed to a fire compared to which the fire d'enfer which destroyed Sebastopol was a mere summer shower. Over three hundred guns, carrying missiles of the heaviest calibre, and rifle guns, which vainly endeavored to bombard Fort Sumter on 7th inst. It is clear that, until we can devise means of blowing up or tearing away the artificial barrier which protected our vessels under the combined fire of the rebel batteries on 7th, it would be useless to renew the attack.

Each person will have his own opinion and forms his own opinion of the affair, according to his hopes and views, and the temper of his mind. The most obvious fact in the matter is that it insures an indefinite prolongation of the war. Had we destroyed Fort Sumter and occupied Charleston there would have been good ground for expecting the early collapse of the rebellion. As it is, the rebels will of course be encouraged to persevere in their rebellion, while we shall merely renew our preparations for what will probably a more successful attack. It will, however, take several months to build more iron-clads, and develop new engines of warfare capable of overcoming the obstructions of the rebel torpedoes. The fine mind of Captain Ericsson and the ablest intellects in the service of the navy are already engaged on the subject, and we doubt not but they will succeed in inventing the article that is wanted. To a nation fixed and resolute in its purpose as this is, failure is impossible.

No one who watches the public mind can have helped observing the improvement which we are making in anti-secession. A few months ago a little defeat depressed us woefully, and depreciated the currency six to eight per cent. Now, the public accept defeats as they accept rain as the natural incidents of war, and are neither excessively depressed by the one nor unduly elated by the other. Fredericksburg, Vicksburg, Charleston, which was certainly not palliated or glossed over in the accounts in the papers, gave rise to no despair, to no abuse of Du Pont or the Government, and barely caused a flutter in the gold market.

This nation is being educated to fit work. The root of our difficulties has been that, as so much harm at the beginning, and made us so ridiculous abroad—is about extinct. No one now undertakes to say how soon we shall crush the rebellion. But no one doubts that we shall do so sooner or later. We may meet with more repulses at Charleston and Vicksburg. General Hooker may be defeated, as General Burnside was. General Rosecrans, who has never yet lost a battle, may meet with trouble. We may lose territory as well as battles. But none of these disasters will alter our purpose of going on with the work in hand until it is accomplished. There never was a time since the war broke out when the people of the North were more unanimous than they are at present in favor of the prosecution of the war, and against the division of the Union on any terms whatsoever. Whatever disappointments and delays the contest may involve, and whatever sacrifices we may be called upon to make—even a crippling foreign war be superadded to the civil war in which we are engaged—the firm, unequivocal, steadfast purpose of the people of the United States, in the face of defeat as well as the hour of victory, and in spite of all official shortcomings and administrative blunders and incapacity, is to proceed steadily on the war until the rebellion has been crushed, the entire territory of our fathers restored to the national domain, and the blessings of peace secured to our children forever.

THE "KEOKUK".

ANOTHER of our iron-clad fleet is gone. The Monitor succumbed to the storm; the Keokuk lived eleven hours after sixteen large shot-holes between wind and water, and after sustaining a fire which would have destroyed a wooden ship in ten minutes. Three important points were developed in her short life: 1st, that she was an excellent sea-going steamer; 2d, that she had attained a speed of ten knots an hour; and, 3d, that the vertical fire was perfect without artificial aid. Her armor did not prove thick enough, but she was so small that she could not have supported thicker plates. On a larger vessel the armor might be increased.

THE LOUNGER.

THE ROTHSCHILDS AND THE UNION.

On the 28th February an article upon "Antipathy of Race and Religion" appeared in these columns, and allusion was made to the Madrid house of the bankers Rothschild. In reference to that article we have received the following note from W. W. Murphy, Esq., Consul-General of the United States at Frankfort, Germany:

"CONSULATE-GENERAL OF THE U. S. A.
FRANKFORT-ON-MAIN, March 16, 1863.

"In your paper, Harper's Weekly, of February 28, you do a great injustice to the eminent firm of Rothschild here, when you hint that they are like a certain Rabbi who held opinions that he was ever ready to change. I know not what the other firms—and there are many of this Rothschild name—in Europe think of slavery, but here the firm of M. A. Von Rothschild & Son are opposed to slavery and to the rebellion. A converted Jew, Erlanger, has taken the whole loan of £2,000,000, and is now in this city; and Baron Rothschild informed me that at Germany could not be induced to recognize or establish a bloodthirsty government, and that so great was their opposition to it that they had let Erlanger & Co. fish out offer it on the Frankfort bourse. I further know that the Jews rejoice in the success of their sect would be guilty of loaning money for the purposes above named; but it was left, they say, for apostate Jews to do it.

"I hope you will correct the statement you made about this firm.

Yours truly,
"W. W. MURPHY."

THE PRESIDENT AND THE REPORT.

THE Report of the Committee upon the conduct of the war is the text for much interpretation. But no thoughtful man will deny its emphatic testimony to the sagacity of the President. Clear commonsense in the conduct of all affairs, civil and military, is invaluable, and that the President unquestionably has. His calmness and forbearance are no less conspicuous. And it is impossible not to smile when you read the aspersions of patriotic orators of the Democratic clans about the fearful despotism under which we are suffering, and think of the patient waiting upon public opinion of President Lincoln.

Last summer when a friend, who knew and mentioned to the Lounger many of the facts in the report, was asked by the President, having lost confidence in M'Clellan, did not remove him, he answered rather tartly, "Is it not the President's way." Emphatically it was. This is a people's war. It can prosper only as the people support it. The people support it. They will support it while it, then the nation will be conquered and the Government destroyed. From the beginning, therefore, the President has sought to conduct it in accordance with the public sentiment. He has not moved faster than the general opinion. He has seemed, indeed, to drag and linger behind it. The reasons for his course will be clearly enough stated in any proper history of the times, for they are very recent and fresh. But it may not have been the best conceivable way, but it was the only practicable way.

It is plain, therefore, that while a great political party was interested in M'Clellan as a possible instrument in the Administration—which was a matter of fact—and while many of all parties were of opinion that he should be allowed a trial of his capacity upon so large a scale and so broad a theatre that every body could see and be satisfied, it would have been extremely unwise in the President to have removed him. And the results of the campaign had caused the country to share his convictions. So after Pope's disastrous campaign the temporary appointment of M'Clellan to the command of the army at Washington was doubtless the best thing practicable under the circumstances, from which the popularity of that General with the army and other Generals was plainly manifest.

In the case of General Burnside, his own frank and generous statement that there was hardly a general officer in his command who approved of his active campaign beyond the Rappahannock, after the battle of Fredericksburg, was sufficient reason for the President to decline to consent to the movement without consultation. But in the matter of Burnside's General Order No. 8, which he considered essential to the discipline of his army, the President said that the General was right, but he wanted time to advise. Finally, he declined to confirm the order, but refused General Burnside's resignation, and relieved him of his command. It is perfectly clear that this noble and brave soldier, whom the hearts of his countrymen follow and bless, was entirely out of his command. It was clearly unwise to maintain him at the head of an army of which the general officers did not confide in his ability, or who were too deeply devoted to another to be just to him. But there is little doubt that the American people and history will differ in opinion from the general officers. No man's record in this war is more loyal, more able, more soldierly, more manly and spotless than General Burnside.

The importance of the report as a part of the history of the war is incalculable. It deserves to be printed in a legible type, an honor which it has not yet achieved.

THE ARCHBISHOP ON THE CONSCRIPTION.

A CONFEDERATE newspaper at the West having declared that Archbishop Hughes favored the new Conscription law and "all the other outrageous acts of the Administration"—adds "Well, who does? The Right Reverend Archbishop in the Church is good authority, but in politics he is of more consequence than the humblest citizen. All his professions and assertions about the war, so far, have been just as far from being fulfilled or sustained by subsequent events as those of the rarest country bumpkin."

Thereupon the Archbishop writes to say that he has never had any political course except to fulfill the duties and obligations of a good and loyal citizen as implied in the spirit and letter of his oath of allegiance to the United States Government. He adds: "The Archbishop thinks that if a law of Conscription had been adopted twenty months ago in the North as it had been in the South, the results would be of more humane consequences to both sections than they are to-day."

The Archbishop is evidently of opinion that when the authority of a Government has been wantonly defied by armed rebellion, although up to that moment some kind of conciliation may have been possible, yet from that moment it must be assumed that every citizen is willing to defend civil order at any cost to himself. He knows his wisdom by taking so perfectly common-sensible a view.

GASCONADE.

We have been two years at war. We have all been subjected to boasting and vaunting in the publicity given to military intentions and movements, and we are as childish as ever in doing the same thing. For two months the attack upon Charleston has been projected. Fleets and soldiers have been collecting. That the task was very arduous every one knew. That the result was doubtful, every body saw. That the newspapers would not, at this time, say nothing until they had something to say, we fondly believed.

But from the moment the expedition was known to have sailed it seemed to be a necessity to say that we had taken Charleston, that the rebels had very bad news, that the flag would fly again over Sumter upon the anniversary of its disgrace, that General Hunter and Admiral Dupont were in possession, that the back-bone of the rebellion had snapped, and that we had telegraphed to Washington. It was surmised in well-informed circles. It was inferred from the want of a flag of truce, that it was reasonable from our point of view. It was, etc., etc., etc.

Not ever since General Banks went up the Chowan or Rowan River, in North Carolina, with forty thousand men, and landed to co-operate with Burnside by falling upon Richmond from the rear, and ever since the Chowan or Rowan River turned out to be a prolonged mud puddle, and General Banks did not appear until he went back to Cuba, there has been a salutary distrust of startling information from our expeditions. When, therefore, we read in the newspapers that Charleston is probably taken Charleston, we are all very sure that we shall see in the first evening edition that the capture of Charleston is not confirmed. We say, then, should the papers print what can not be believed, what is the use of it? Is it to create excitement? The editors know, and we all know, that it is not true. Ought we to wonder that every other nation sneers at our childish boasts and fierce gesticulation, unaccompanied by hard knocks?

Meanwhile, of course, let us hope that long before these lines are read Charleston may be ours. But we must remember that for a year the rebels have been engaged in strengthening the position by sea and land. And if you give a dog enough time enough he can make almost any place impregnable. But we hope it was different. The Lounger has in his possession a letter written from Charleston upon the 18th of April, 1862, by "Yours sincerely, W. A. Hammond," to "Brig.-Gen'l S. R. Anderson, comdg. So. Carolina Volunteers" in Virginia. Mr. Hammond says: "We have every thing prepared so that we can destroy our property (although I doubt the policy of it) on the first appearance of the Federal fleet."

Since that day the Lounger has seen other letters speaking of the constant passage of regroes from the back-country toward Charleston to work upon the fortifications. Thus the works from which fire and death are to be belched upon our brothers, sons, and friends are built under the lash and pistols of overseers to secure the perpetuity and ascendency of slavery. The capture of the city will be no easy task. It is a point of honor with the rebels to defend it. But Charleston is doomed as surely as Babylon. If we recoil now, it is that we may return irresistibly.

FIDELIO.

IT was a severe test for Johannsen, the German Prima Donna, to appear upon the very stage on which Madori is achieving her triumphs. But her performance of Fidelio at the Academy was admirable and effective. There could hardly be a wider difference than that of the music of Norma or Ione and Fidelio. The titanic passion and grandeur of Beethoven contrasts with the elegiac tenderness of Bellini, like a thunder-cloud with the soft citrus vapors of a June evening; and it is some time before the mind and ear that have been listening to the graceful, facile melody of the Italian can adapt themselves to the rich and combined measures of the German.

Nor is it easy to comprehend at once the music of Fidelio. It lacks the melodies which hand-organs seize and which vibrate in the ear. The voices are treated like instruments. The effect is not produced by airs which are accompanied by the orchestra, but by the combination of each, so that you applaud as if you heard a symphony. Yet the profound feeling and power of Fidelio remain are such that you must hear and hear again before its full force and significance are perceived. Johannsen is no longer young, nor has she personal prestige with the public, but her thorough comprehension of the character, her mastery of the music, and her conscientiousness and skilful acting, must persuade every hearer that no injustice is done to the great work.

That Beethoven had not the talent which is called "lyrical" is as true as that Milton had not dramatic genius. The symphony is the natural form of his musical expression, and the music of Fidelio has all the characteristics of such a work. But it is not such as to make this thing expressly clear, as there is no scene in any opera superior as a musical drama to the prison act in Fidelio.

Every choice lover of music will be grateful to Mr. Anchütz and Madame Johannsen for the ample hearing they have given the public of a great work so seldom heard.

EINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR.

No reader will fail to ponder the "History of the Crimean War," by Kinglake, which the first published volumes have just been issued in one by the Harpers. A taste of its quality was furnished in the January number of the Magazine by the publication of part of the historian's estimate of Louis Napoleon, which has produced so great an impression in England, and which recent circumstances have invested with peculiar interest in America. The work is hailed as a magnificent contribution to historical literature. The brilliant pictorial power of the author of "Eothen" is displayed with equal effect upon the pages, but we shall return to its consideration when it shall have become familiar to our readers.

A GRECO-AMERICAN CITIZEN.

A YOUNG MAN now in Alexandria, Egypt, who signs himself "Citizen of the United States of America, and who is a subscriber to the Weekly, writes a letter of ardent sympathy with the national cause. He was born in Greece, he says, but "I am fellow-countryman with Themistocles, Leonidas, Miltiades, and many others; and fellow-citizen with Washington, Adams, Jefferson: but not with the ruffian Jefferson Davis, President of the Rebellion), Franklin, Fulton," etc. He adds that his father was educated in America, at the Mount Pleasant, from 1822 to 1836, and in several other universities . . . and he is now at Athens, because he was one of the commissioners of the revolution. But both he and myself are citizens of the noble freedom's land."

Addressing his letter to the Editor of Harper's Weekly, Mr. Alexander C. Evangelides writes as follows:

"Every one who is a well-wisher for the prosperity of our country desires to hear that the Federal arms obtain the honor of victory, and that the lecherous rebels are easily yielding before the star-spangled immortal banner of the Union. Since it is accompanied by the most frequent successes of the arms of the Union, it is to be hoped, very soon will establish peace.

"I greatly distress me, dear Sir, to see that these persons, being our own countrymen, should be in the wrong. They too are also brave—for America there could not be otherwise. As often as I read the narrations of our battles, which so marvellously your citizens pen forthe, I see that every soldier is a hero, and I envy the fate of those who fall in the field of honor crowned with the laurel.

"O! that the freedom of our brothers, that is so sacred dear to the value of civil rule, and their unique and mighty spirit, serve shortly for the benefit of humanity; and may we again see the peace and strength within the whole continent of America!

"I am confident that the destiny of America is to defend the liberties of all nations by the progression of Christianity. All the world owe, to pray for the happiness of that glorious land!—the land beneath whose tranquil sky were born those illustrious man who rendered their own country glorious, and set forth the fact of the other world by their wisdom—whose names are high above, adorning the heavens of America.

"Such prayers we have address to God, we who are far away from our dear country, living in the midst of nations who are still under slavery and barbarism.

"In Alexandria are many friends of America, and their sympathies are all in favor of the Federals. As a proof of it, is that Mr. "William S. Thayer is incomparably more beloved and more respected than his predecessor, both for his own personal worth as well his being a strict Federalist. In fact we, the few Americans living in Alexandria, assume ourselves happy having such a representative as our noble freedom's friend."

ALEXANDRIA OF EGYPT, March 9, 1863."

PORTLAND BALL FOR THE SOLDIERS.

THE managers of a Grand Bal Masque in Portland, for the benefit of sick and wounded soldiers, have honored the Lounger with a card of invitation. He acknowledges it with pleasure, as another indication of the interest which unites all loyal American citizens in the prosecution of the war and in care for the soldiers who are fighting it. Among them, as he has reason to know, there is but one feeling and one resolution—that the country ought to conquer, and that it shall conquer. If it was right to begin the war, of which they have no doubt, it is right to continue it and to end it for the purpose for which it was undertaken; and whatever restraints that consummation must be swept away. This is an old faith, and a very simple logic. But the faith is ineradicable, and the logic irresistible.

The Portland ball is over; but we will hope sincerely that its results will relieve, in many a sweet case, the consequences of balls of a very different kind.

LITERARY.

THE charming story of Mrs. Gaskell's which has been appearing in the Weekly for some time past, called "A Dark Night's Work," is just issued by the Harpers in a neat and legible and agreeable form. The lovers of "Sylvia's Lovers" will recognize the same earnest tone, the same vital interest, which mark all the stories of the friend and biographer of Charlotte Brontë.

A capital illustrated book for boys is Edgar's "Sea Kings and Naval Heroes," issued by the same house. It tells in lively and easy style entertaining way the stories of Rollo, Sir Francis Drake, Sir Walter Raleigh, Admiral Blake, Prince Rupert, Benbow, Nelson, Collingwood, and many more; and at this time when every American boy is familiar by everyday hearing with the honored names of Farragut, Dupont, Foxhall Parker, Worden, and the rest, this little book has a peculiar interest. There are very few boys who will read with dry eyes Nelson's story ending with the words that have an almost unparalleled pathos: "Now kiss me, Hardy."

The Country Parson has written another of his charming, pleasant books, the "Every Day Philosopher," published by Tickner & Co., who also issue a very neat library edition of John Stuart Mill's "Essay on Liberty." It is a masterly treatise, which every one must read who would know the views of so noble a thinker. His "Representative Government" follows as a matter of course. It is a work of special interest to us. His suggestions among the representation of minorities will not escape attention as a forward movement in the Republican system.

Carleton believes in books that will create a "sensation." Of this kind is Mrs. Edwin James's "Wanderings of a Beauty," which sent a thrill across to the name of the author, and to certain personal portraitures. He also publishes the second part of Orpheus C. Kerr's papers, which, if not as good as the first, are very ludicrous. The "Prisoner of State" is a book which it is a pity any loyal man should have published, because no loyal man could have written. It is intended to show under what a deplorable despotism we are living, and succeeds in proving that no great nation at war was ever so magnanimously tolerant of traitors, rebels, and treacherous citizens, as this. It is a book without interest, without talent, with nothing noticeable but feeble spite. "If I can't help you, I can make it great mischief, sister," is the spirit of this performance.

THE HALF-WAY ROCK.

WHEN I was a little child
(It seemeth long ago)
Our school-house stood from father's
A half-day's row.

It seemed a long, long journey
For little ones to take;
The burning sun above me,
And pebbles 'neath my feet.

But well do I remember
A large old granite rock,
Dividing that long distance,
Beside a sparkling brook.

"The half-way rock" we called it,
And seldom passed it by;
'Twas wide enough to found a house,
And taller some than I.

I loved to climb the lowest side,
To hear the waters rush,
And see the bright, playful glide
Below the alder-bush.

And after the long summer hours,
When tired of books and fun,
Oh, how I longed to reach that spot,
And think 'twas half-way home!

I'm older now than I was then—
Can scarcely stop to rest,
Yet full half-way the path of life
My weary feet have past'd.

"Threescore and ten the years of man,"
And am I half-way home?
My soul! hast found a Rock of rest
Where'er ye roam?

Ah! I have found the Living Rock
A shelter from the heat,
A covert from earth's wildest storms
That on me fiercely beat.

And I long that pleasant symbol—
That broad old granite rock,
That stands half-way from father's
Beside a sparkling brook.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

AN Irishman on board a vessel, when she was on the point of sailing, climbed to mount on deck, as she was going down, replied, that he had no wish to go on deck to "see himself up."

A TENANT WANTED.—To let, with immediate possession, a tenement house, situated in the vicinity of some pyrotechnic mills. The house has been entirely rebuilt and beautifully decorated since the last explosion, when the tenant was ejected without notice.

A young lady, who affected a distinction toward matrimony, wrote on a pane of glass some verses expressive of her determination never to enter into the holy state. A gentleman, who doubted the lady's resolve, wrote under it:

"The fair whose vow these scrutiny time betokens, Whose false resolve is but a broken token."

A merchant at Berlin, having failed to obtain the hand of an opera singer, purchased two dresses and sent them to her to speak for, saying that he would call to know her decision. Shortly, however, before the hour when he had intended to receive an answer, a note was received from his beloved a billet-doux to the following effect: "Of the dresses you have sent I like one quite as well as the other. I will, in fact, keep both, so that you have no need to call for them."

"You see, grandmamma, we performe an aperture in the apex, and a corresponding aperture in the base; and by applying the one to the lips, and forcibly inhaling the breath, the shell is entirely discharged of its contents." "What's that, my dear?" said the old lady, "what wonderful improvements they do make! Now, in my younger days, we just made a hole in each end and sucked."

The orator who carried away his audience is affectionately and humanely requested to bring it back."

"Why, Sambo, how black you are!" said a gentleman, the other day, to a negro waiter at a hotel: "how in the world did you get so black?" "Why, Massa, sah, I suppose the reason am dis—de day dis chile was born there was no white folks."

Marriage must be favorable to longevity; an old maid never lives to be more than thirty.

In the reign of Henry VIII. there was struck a small silver coin, which was called a "dandy prat," which observes Bishop Fleetwood, "was the origin of the term dandy, applied to persons of contemptible parts."

A VULGAR FRENCH CORRESPONDENT.—The absurd story about the Phœnix grew out of the fact that Phœnixes always resided in solid water-fowl. Even they took wing they were said to "rise from their ashes."

"Well, if this ain't mean! Here's this feller boun' about with his hat a-smashin' his chin, and when I pulls it out o' there's no watch on the end of it. The conduct o' these 'ere fowls fairly mystifies me. I'll make the heart of a poor fellow like me, so has to depend on his trade for a livin'."

NONE.—A musician, whose nose had become disfigured by colored blotches, was told by a wag to use quibbs, and to his little son one day at table, "You must eat bread, my boy, to make your cheeks red." The little fellow replied, "Father, what lots of bread you must have snuffed up!"

"I say, Higgins," said a fellow to that aspiring but as yet unsuppressed tragedian, "I met a rich old gentleman from Boston, who has left you a hundred pounds a-piece to see you perform 'Hamlet.'" "You don't say so?" "Fact, I assure you." "Then what's more, I'm positively sure the old chap meant it." "By Jove, then, it's a bargain. Come, you shall have a box for my benefit. But, who is he?" "Ah! be sure, I didn't tell you. Well, he's a blind man." Higgins never spoke to the wretch again.

When an ass you look out for brushes; but on a railroad the brushes look out for asses.

A lady well advanced in matrimhood at her marriage requested the choir to sing the hymn commencing,

"Why do I sing about my love,
And mourned because I found it not."

Why is a cow's tail like a swan's bosom?—Because it grows down.

The following witty and satirical epitaph was proposed to be placed in Westminster Abbey:

"Here walks, adorned with monumental bust,
Sir Isaac Newton, Knight, and Lord Mayor."

Why are railways like laundresses?—Because they have ironed all the country, and have occasionally done a little mangling.

A merchant who died suddenly left in his desk a letter written to one of his correspondents. His clerk, a son of Erin, sealing it instead of the latter, wrote at the bottom: "Since writing the above I have died."

A female begging impostor, importuning a gentleman to give her a "penny," got the benevolent gentleman told she should have one, if she would only leave off begging and take to stealing.

A country doctor announces that he has changed his residence to the neighborhood of the church-yard, which he hopes may prove a great convenience to his numerous patients.

In the olden times divines argued on "How many angels can dance upon the point of a needle?" A modern inquiry of a similar nature would be, "How many lawyers can stand on a single brief?"

A dancer once said to a Spartan, "You can not stand on one leg so long as I can." "Perhaps not," said the Spartan, "but any goose can."

An old tyger, who had attended the Polytechnic, where the learned professor had performed explosions by electricity from guns produced from water, said, "You don't catch me putting much water in my liquor after this. And no-bles before that water was so dangerous, though I never liked it much, even in tea."

The man who undertook to walk against time has given up, but time is still going ahead.

What not is the most likely to catch a handsome but with woman's love?—Sham.

Those who count figures are sure not to be lifted.

DO YOU GIVE IT UP?

What ladies with a grace may fancy,
And wives for hurt bonds recall again;
What many a man who has a wife
Is unable to for a quite life.

Any thing.

Why should people who wish to live a peaceable life never go to small theatres?—Because pantos are dangerous.

Because large gooseberries grow there.

If Cupid frolics upon stilts, is he a lady's door, how would she like him to come?

With a ring, but not without a ring.

Found long ago, yet made to-day,
I'm most in use when people sleep;
What few would wish to give away,
Nor any one desire to keep.

Bed.

Why is a man who carries a watch invariably too late for his appointments?

Because he is always behind time.

Where can Old Clothes be seen in the First-a-vacuator line, and what did he take?

He took a shop at the King's Head.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE fun account of the attack on Charleston see page 266.

AFFAIRS AT VICKSBURG.

We learn from the Richmond papers that the Union forces are being withdrawn from the peninsula at Vicksburg, that four transports have gone up the river filled with our troops, and that the levee has been cut through in front of Vicksburg, the water turned back on the adjoining ground. A dispatch from Jackson, Mississippi, says that Admiral Farragut is still above Fort Hudson with three vessels. The Government stores of the rebels at Baton Rouge have been destroyed by the fire of Farragut's fleet. The same authority says that the "lower fort"—part of Banks's expedition was performing the work of destruction on Thursday, but that they were out of range. The Petersburg Express of the 14th instant has some terrible denunciations are being made by the rebels to destroy Farragut's ships, the Hartford and Richmond.

THE "SWITZERLAND" REPAIRED.

The ram Switzerland has been repaired of the injuries she received in passing the rebel batteries at Vicksburg, and has been sent up the Red River.

CAPTURE OF RICHMOND.

General M'Clernand took possession of the little town of Richmond, Mississippi, on the 14th inst., with a small force, driving the rebel cavalry from the place after two hours' sharp fighting.

DEFEAT OF VAN DORN.

We have an official account of the defeat of the rebel Van Dorn at Franklin, Tennessee, by General Granger's forces. The rebels numbered 19,000, and lost three hundred in killed and wounded. Our loss was only one hundred. General Stanley made a magnificent charge with his cavalry, overpowering a battery and two companies, whom, however, he was unable to hold, owing to the nature of the country.

SITUATION OF GENERAL FOSTER.

The reports from General Foster's expedition to Washington, North Carolina, are not favorable. He seems to be completely hemmed in by the enemy, and all efforts to relieve him have, so far, been futile. The rebels are numerous. The repulse of our fleet by the batteries on Pamlico River, and the destruction of the Albemarle by a torpedo while proceeding to Washington, rendered the arrival of reinforcements impossible. To this, the latest news from all the movements of the rebel forces that the destruction of the railroad bridges between Petersburg and Suffolk, while the bold movements of Generals Hill and Longstreet, on the north bank of the James river, were intended to be a settled intention on the part of the rebels to prevent reinforcements from reaching General Foster.

REBEL ADVANCE ON SUFFOLK.

Letters from the Richmond papers announce that the rebel advance upon Suffolk, the capture of several of our outposts, and the loss of the women and children, was in fact of this attack is to prevent reinforcements from reaching General Foster at Washington, North Carolina. Longstreet, N. C., and to cut off our forces at Suffolk from communication with Norfolk, which latter place, no doubt, the rebels intend to invest. Intelligence reached Fortress Monroe on the 19th that the rebels had destroyed the railroad from Suffolk, and that the gun-boats sent to Foster's assistance had encountered the rebel batteries.

ANOTHER STEAMER LOST.

The armed transport Geneva Washington was destroyed by fire on the night of April 7, on Neuse River, near Foster's, on this last. She remained behind for special service under Colonel Amory, of the 27th regiment, to prevent contraband Nelson Head while the forces were away. General Saxton, who is in command at Beaufort, sent the Fifty-fifth Regiment to make a reconnoissance around the island. In company with the gun-boat Hale they went up the Broad river, and was attacked by a rebel battery, which sent a shot through her magazine, and blew her up. The crew saved themselves upon while attempting to escape, and several of them killed and wounded.

DEAD RIOTS AT THE SOUTH.

Large meetings have been held in the South, in the South, all of which were instigated and participated in principally by fanatical women, who were bent upon the destruction of their children for food, while hundreds and fathers were in the rebel ranks. The first of these took place on the 16th ult. at Atlanta, Georgia, where all entreaties could not deter the women from their purpose. Resolutions until their demands were satisfied. The next occurred at Salisbury, North Carolina, on the 18th ult., where the rioters armed themselves, and by force succeeded in accomplishing their purpose. The third was in the city of Richmond, where the operations of the mob were not fully made public. The fourth occurred on a small undetermined day, when the Richmond papers to suppress the details. The fourth took place at Petersburg, North Carolina; and the fifth at Petersburg, Virginia.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

LORD PALMERSTON'S VIEWS

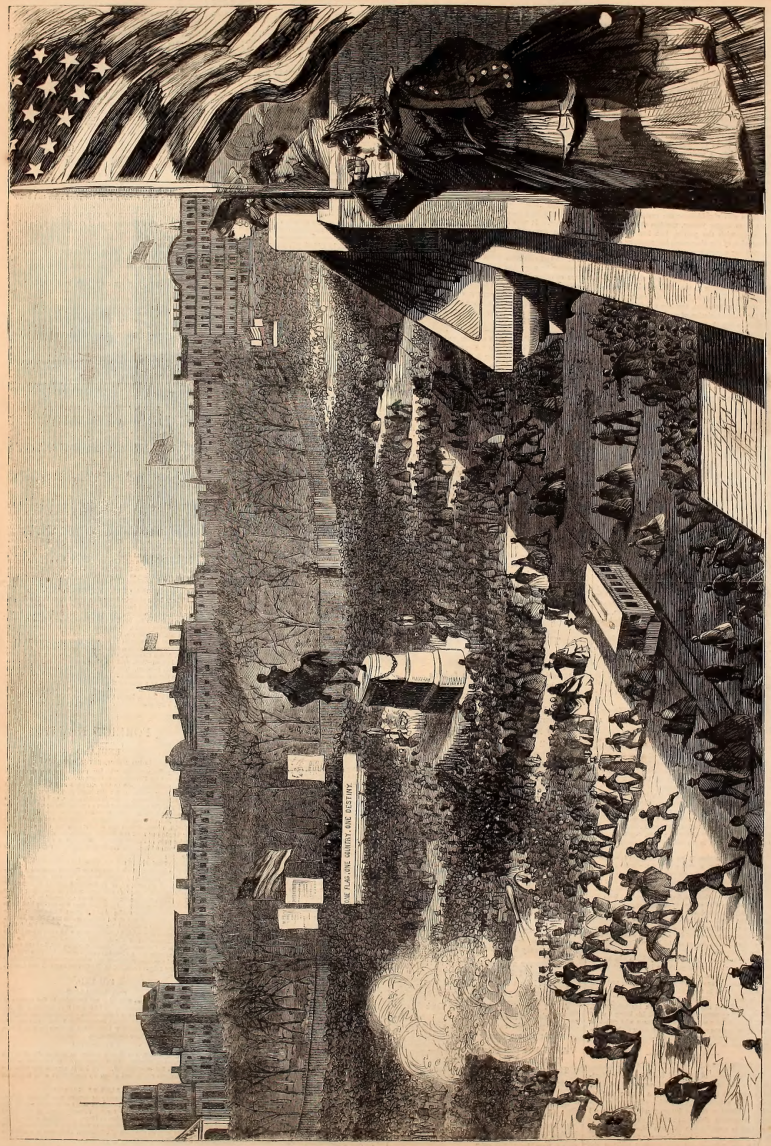
LORD PALMERSTON, who has just been installed as Lord Rector of the University of Glasgow, made a speech especially on that city—one to the students and the other to an assemblage of citizens. He said that the Italian question He allowed briefly to the American war, and defended the policy of the Government in not maintaining a blockade sometimes to term a strict neutrality toward the belligerents. He said that America was a continuous aggregation of the North, citizen that of the South; that "it was not fitting for nominal that the British nation, as a people, should take part in that contest," although the contending parties "and the Union as the result who can a fair chance" to do so.

THE SEIZURE OF THE "PETERSHOPF."

The report of the seizure of the British steamship Peterhoff, by order of the United States Government, at Key, produced an excitement in England second in intensity only to that caused by the news of the overhauling of the Trent. A remonstrance had been addressed to Earl Russell on the subject. It was stated that a memorial had been referred to the law officers of the crown for immediate consideration. The Liverpool Chamber of Commerce and Liverpool the markets closed under considerable depression, owing to reports of extreme difficulties which had arisen from the seizure of the Peterhoff. In the House of Commons, on the 16th inst., Lord Russell stated that as soon as the opinion of the crown lawyers was obtained the Government would communicate with Washington as they might think fit to the Government of the United States.

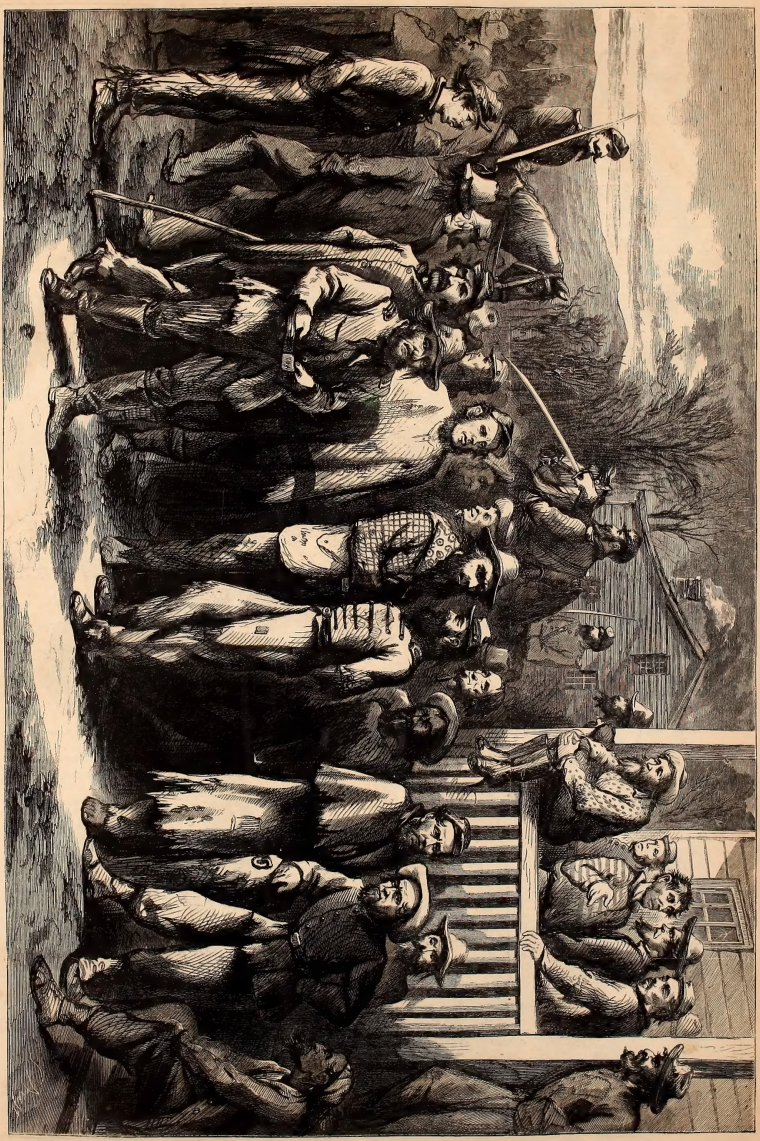
POLAND.

THE REBELLION.



The news from Poland is not favorable to the success of the popular movement. The papers give details of the defeat and surrender of Langiewicz and his force. The English press consider the Polish insurrection virtually at an end, and the Provisional Government opposite to the Polish people to continue the struggle.

LANGUIWICZ.



Langiewicz, the Polish leader, is still confined in the fortress of Cracow. He applied for leave to retire to England, but was refused. The latest reports say that the insurgents chief had given up the contest with Russia as hopeless.

THE KING OF GREECE.

The National Assembly of Greece has decreed Prince William George of Denmark King of Greece, under the name of George the First. Prince George is the third child of Prince Christian of Denmark, brother of the Princess of Wales, and nephew of the King of Denmark. He was born on the 24th of December, 1845, and is a cadet in the Danish navy.

THE NIGHT ATTACK.

OUR bugles ring out in the dark of the night,
"Boots and saddles!" "To horse!" and away
We hurry to fall on the foe in his tents,
As the tiger leaps fierce on his prey.

Sound bugles, sound "Forward!" the horses are fresh;
And our spirits, just called back from dreams,
Leap exultant to think of the flight of the foe,
When we ride where his camp-fire gleams.

Through forest, o'er fallow, o'er meadow we stride;
E'en our steeds feel the hot work at hand,
And the rattle of sabres and champing of bits
Nearly drown the brief words of command.

"Halt!" What is this? We are near to the goal:
"Draw sabres!" the conflict is here.
One thought to the loved ones dreaming at home,
As the steel flashes out sharp and clear.

Hark! a shot. Whence that cry? Ha! comrade, farewell.
"Charge!" Hurrah! like the blasting simoom,
With fierce cries and stern eyes, we dash down on the foe,
As he flies from his tents in the gloom.

Sharp ring out the carbines: the blaze of his camp
Shows flashing the gleam of our swords.
Hurrah! charge again: see they rally, and strive
To drive back the wild Northern hordes.

Ha! they break! they are gone like chaff on the wind;
But no bloodless vantage we gain.
Tears lurk in the cheers we raise o'er the field,
And our glory comes only with pain.

Raise gently the wounded; bear softly the dead
To their rest in their soldierly graves.
Sound bugles—sound "Rally!" our labor is o'er;
Recall to their colors our braves.

A RETURN FROM THE THRESHOLD.

"DOCTOR DAMPIER'S compliments, and he will be obliged if you will send him word whether you will give him what he has written to ask you for."

In the dull light which was reflected from the staircase on the landing at the entrance to my chambers it was not possible for me to see the speaker's face; but there was something in the sound of his voice which struck me with a kind of terror; it was as though I was listening to a voice from another world. So forcible was the shock that I drew back with a kind of fear from the speaker, and even hesitated for an instant to take the letter from his hand, although the person he named was one well known to me. Thinking that this feeling could only arise from the excited state of my mind, I took the letter from his hand, and, unlocking the door, I told him to come in. There was a fire burning in the grate, which lighted the room a little, and as a heavy rain was falling, and had been falling for some time, I said, "How long have you been waiting? Are you wet?"

"Nearly an hour," was the reply; "but I don't mind the wet."

It was the same slow, even voice which seemed to come to me from the darkness of the grave, and I felt the same creeping sensation of horror which had attacked me when he spoke to me outside my door. Snatching up a piece of paper from my table, I took the lamp from the mantle-piece and hastily lighted it, keeping my back toward the speaker that he might not perceive my agitation. With a sudden determination I turned and held the lamp at arm's-length, so that it threw its light full on the messenger's face. Apart from the expression of the countenance, which was stern, and as firmly set as though it were carved in stone, and of itself calculated to make a profound impression on all who looked at it, there was that in the eyes which no human being could fathom. They might belong to a man who had at one time committed a murder, and who was continually on the watch to see if any person who spoke to him suspected the crime of which he had been guilty. Such I have seen; but these to me shone from the deep hollows of the bloodless countenance with a far more appalling intelligence. There was in them an expression of recognition of myself; and in my own mind I recognized him, but always as one who had passed into another stage of existence. By a strong effort I said:

"You say you bring this from Dr. Dampier. Do you know me? Where have I seen you before?"

Without answering my question he pointed to the note I held in my hand. I felt that I could not read the note with any understanding of its contents; so, motioning toward the door, I told him to tell Dr. Dampier I felt too unwell to answer his note that evening, but that I would send an answer the following day. I held the door open, and listened to him as he descended the staircase with a step which sounded slow, even, and solemn as his voice. I waited two or three minutes till I thought he had reached a distance which would prevent me from overtaking him; then thrusting the letter into my pocket I turned out the lamp, shut the door, and left for a friend's house, resolved not to enter my chambers again that night.

As soon as I found myself seated beside my friend at his fireside I recovered my spirits, and taking out the letter, read as follows:

"MY DEAR MR. HENSMAN,—Will you have the kindness to furnish me, at your leisure, with a full report of the case of Samuel Calcraft, in which you were engaged. I prefer making this request to you rather than to the attorney who prepared the case for his defense, because, as you prosecuted him in your official capacity, no person will be able or likely to wish to throw doubt on your statement.

"I do not require your statement for present use, but eventually I shall do so in the interests of humanity; I shall, however, have no objection to reveal the reason to you on receiving your promise that you will not divulge what I tell you till the occurrence of an event which may be still distant.

"Very truly yours,
"J. DAMPIER."

I had scarcely run my eye over this note before I understood the cause of my emotion on hearing and seeing his messenger; and to make this understood, I will relate the case of the Samuel Calcraft referred to in his letter.

In April of the year 1833 the town and neighborhood of Hystos, La., was the scene of one of the worst crimes which it is in the power of a human being to perpetrate. The person murdered was named Exton, a man well-stricken in years, of a most estimable character, the principal leader, and most frequently the pastor, of the religious congregation to which he belonged. Respected by all, whether members of the same sect or not, on account of his thorough conscientiousness, his store was the source from which the greater part of the population of the town and country for miles round derived their supply of articles of all kinds. On the 27th of May, 1832, he was guilty of a weakness which somewhat lowered the respect in which he had been hitherto held by the female members of his congregation: he married the daughter of a settler who used generally to come with her father to his store when he had occasion to renew his supplies of tea, sugar, and so forth. Nothing was known in the town to the detriment of or in favor of the girl; it was her extreme youth which was the ground of objection to her. Shortly after their marriage it began to be rumored about that Exton was not happy in his married life; and this, in consequence of the violence of his wife's character, soon became so notorious that the strongest of his admirers among the women did not hesitate to express their sympathy in his affliction by low groans and other ejaculations whenever, in the course of his praying or preaching, he made any allusion which could be twisted into a reference to the thorn in his flesh. Manifestations of this kind were perfectly understood by his wife, who thenceforth entirely absented herself from any place of worship, and expressed her hatred of her husband on several occasions. The reason of this enmity was a mystery to every body, Exton being a man of an uncomplaining disposition, who never spoke of his domestic troubles, or encouraged even his oldest friends to allude to them in his presence.

On the 5th of April, 1833, he presided at the meeting of his co-religionists, and at its conclusion received a pressing invitation to drive to a farm belonging to a man named Joynson, about three miles from the town, and remain there till the morning; there being a party there to celebrate the birth of the farmer's first son. Refusing the invitation, Exton shook hands with those about him, and walked away in the direction of his house. This was the last time he was seen alive by them. Early the following morning a rumor flew through the town with the speed of electricity that Isaiah Exton had been found murdered on the floor of his bedroom. The houses were soon emptied of their inhabitants, all of whom proceeded toward Exton's store to satisfy themselves of the truth of the rumor, and to gratify that mysterious inclination of humanity to look upon a place which has been the scene on which a human soul has been violently expelled from its earthly sanctuary. The rumor proved true enough; the unfortunate Exton had no doubt been killed, and that, too, only after a struggle of more than ordinary persistency, as was shown by the state of the body and the condition of the room.

There was no proof that the unfortunate man had been robbed, though his wife asserted that a bag containing a large sum in gold had been taken from a drawer in his bedroom. The regard in which he was held by his fellow-citizens made them positive that he had no enemy among them, and the person generally suspected of having had a share in his destruction was his wife; from suspicion they very soon passed to an assumption of her guilt; but as they could not believe her capable of committing the deed with her own hand, they supposed she had an accomplice; and who this could be was a mystery they were never tired of discussing. In due course an inquest was held on the body, at which Jane Burton, one of the servants, stated that she had for some time past noticed a great intimacy between her mistress and a porter named Samuel Calcraft employed in the store; that on several occasions she had seen him coming from the room in which his mistress was, and where he had no business to be; and that on these occasions he had always been much confused on seeing her, and had induced her to promise that she would say nothing about it, promising that he would tell her some day why he went there, which he never had done.

Suspicion having been thus directed toward the porter, the desire for a victim was so great that the discovery of a knife belonging to him covered with rust, assumed to be caused by blood, was considered sufficient evidence on which to commit him to take his trial for the murder of his master. In the interval between his committal and his trial other suspicious circumstances were discovered affecting him, namely, a purse which was found in his chest, and identified as his master's, in which was a considerable sum for a man in his position; also a watch which had been seen in Exton's possession on the eve of his death by several persons, and a miniature portrait of his mother inclosed in a silver case curiously chased, which the deceased was known to value very highly. People being thus satisfied that he was the actual murderer, were unremitting in their endeavors to get him to criminate his mistress. Every inducement it was in their power to offer him they offered. Promises to exert the influence of the whole town in saving his life on the ground that by reason of his youth he had fallen a victim to her wiles were made, but all were of no avail in bringing about the result they desired; the most he could be induced to say was that she had once or twice spoken of her husband in a way which he had told her was not right, and that for some time she had not uttered a word to him on the subject, though he knew from the women-servants they lived apart. His assertions were disbelieved by all; but as there was not a tittle of evidence against Mrs. Exton she was allowed to remain at large, though she might almost as well have been in prison in solitary confinement, seeing that nobody would associate with her, or even speak to her. As for the store, that had to be shut up, not a customer having entered it to make a purchase since the murder of its proprietor.

On the day of the trial of Samuel Calcraft the town was thoroughly emptied of its inhabitants. The prisoner, when placed in the dock, became terribly agitated, and looked as though he would fall to the ground, and whispers reached me which showed that this was taken as further evidence of his guilt, though it did not appear to me at all surprising, considering his youth and the consciousness that most, if not all, of those present knew him, and believed him guilty of the murder.

It was my duty to put the case before the jury in the strongest light which the evidence appeared to me capable of sustaining. I had no personal feeling against the prisoner, of course, and it was rather from habit than design that I wove the evidence against him into my address in such a manner that even a jury altogether unprejudiced might have been induced to convict him. I looked at him as I finished my speech, and I shall never forget the expression of utter despair and horror with which he was regarding me, and which awoke in me a keener sense of the responsibility attaching to my office than I had ever felt before. His counsel had little to say in his defense. The only explanation he had to offer was that Calcraft had certainly had interviews, apparently mysterious, with his mistress, but that this was only for the purpose of conveying spirits to her, which she drank in large quantities without wishing any body to know that she did so, and that this was the reason why he had made Jane Burton promise not to speak about having seen him. The knife he admitted was his, but asserted that it had grown rusty merely from want of use. The miniature he averred had been given to the prisoner by his master in order that he might clean the case, on the day preceding the murder, and he had put it in his room for safety's sake. The purse he said had been given him by his master, and the money contained in it was his own savings. As for the watch, he denied most solemnly that he had put it where it had been found, or that he knew any thing about it; and asserted that somebody must have put it in his chest after he was locked up.

I will not venture to say that the judge had formed a preconceived opinion of the prisoner's guilt, or that he was influenced by the general desire to avenge the death of a man so deservedly esteemed as Exton, but he certainly summed up the case in a manner which I could not think impartial; I was not therefore surprised, knowing what I did of the public feeling respecting the case, when the jury returned a verdict of Guilty.

Sentence of death having been pronounced the prisoner was carried out of court senseless.

It was in conducting this case that I first became acquainted with Dr. Dampier. We spent the evening together after the trial at his house, and I was very deeply interested in his discourse, especially in some of his theories touching life and death. The criminal trials and civil causes were so unusually numerous that I had not left the town when the day arrived for the execution of the convicted murderer of Mr. Exton. On the morning of his execution he sent for me, and though I would have made any reasonable sacrifice to have avoided complying with his request, I could not under the circumstances refuse to go to him. I found that all he wanted of me was to beseech me to save his life. I told him I had no power whatever in the matter, that it was not to me he should appeal. He declared, in language which made those who heard it shudder, that he was innocent; and when they began urging him toward the scaffold, he turned toward me, and with a countenance stern in its expression and deadly pale, said, "You are my murderer, and if a murdered man can haunt you, I will." And so he passed away to his death, and I into the official apartments to hear a case and give a gratuitous opinion concerning it. When I left about three quarters of an hour afterward I looked up and saw the body still hanging.

The man who brought me the note from Dr. Dampier was Samuel Calcraft.

Having written for Dr. Dampier the statement for which he asked, I sent it to his house, and in return requested he would call upon me and give me the explanation he had promised. It was not long before he did so, and having received from me a promise that I would not divulge what he told me, I received from him the following statement:

"You will, perhaps, remember that in the course of the conversation we had on the evening you dined at my house I mentioned some opinions concerning the length of time during which vitality might still remain in the human body after it had ceased to give any outward sign of its existence, and the result of some experiments I made with animals which had to all appearance been suffocated. As the opportunity of making such experiments with human beings seldom occurs, I determined to spare no pains to get possession of the body of Samuel Calcraft, and by means it is not necessary to describe his body came to me, and his coffin with its substitute went the ordinary course, so that within two hours of his being strangled his inanimate body was drawn from a sack which had been placed among a wagon-load of fagots, driven by myself from the vicinity of the prison, while the owner of the vehicle was gone to get me change for a note with which to pay for the wood.

"I had a fire ready lighted beneath a large sand bath I had contrived in my laboratory, and having locked the door, I laid the to all appearance dead body in it, and carefully covered it with sand, the thermometer on being plunged in it marking 80°. There was not the slightest sign of life, the skin was cold, and the members already rigid. As soon as I had thus prepared the body, I inserted two small tubes in the nostrils connected with a large bladder of ammoniacal gas, of which I had several in readiness, and pressing gently on the bladder I gradually forced the gas it contained into the lungs, from which I as gently expelled it. I had previously buried the wires from a galvanic battery of moderate power in the sand, the points lying beneath the base of the skull and the lower part of the spine. For upwards of an hour I continued to force the gas into the lungs and expel it by pressure without discovering any returning signs of life on which I could rely: the very slight warmth I could detect in the forehead on laying my cheek against it being as likely to arise from the transmission of heat from the sand as from the returning vital force; nevertheless, I determined to persevere till there was no room left for hope. By-and-by I imagined I could detect a slight clamminess on the skin, the sand no longer slipped away from it as from a piece of marble. Hardly daring to hope that this indicated that life was not yet extinct, and yet almost trembling with excitement, I controlled myself, and continued my efforts with the same steadiness. After many minutes of that intense anxiety which few besides the experimental chemist ever experience, I had no longer any doubt—a faint, a very faint, but distinctly perceptible, movement of the heart was evident. By slow degrees it increased in force, and I thought it prudent to abandon the use of the ammoniacal gas for a time and substitute for it atmospheric air. The immediate result was a diminution in the strength of the pulsation, but by assisting the action of the lungs mechanically this was restored again, and henceforward I only resorted to the gas occasionally, and then only for a few instants at a time. I no longer regarded the time; continued my efforts; my whole mind was so absorbed in what I was doing that I felt no bodily sensation, neither fatigue, hunger, nor thirst; it must, however, have been several hours before there was the least sign that the patient had recovered consciousness. The first symptom was a twitching of the nostrils, followed by a similar movement of the corners of the mouth. The next indication I perceived was an attempt to raise the eyelids, and after many ineffectual efforts he succeeded. The instant he raised the lids I looked eagerly into his eyes to see their expression, and note his sensations on returning to life from death, as far as it was possible to read them therein. You have seen him, and have probably remarked the extraordinary depth and mystery of his look. Well, that same unfathomable look met mine then; it never changes, never varies.

"As soon as he was able to move his tongue I raised his head slightly and dropped a little brandy and water on it. After a prolonged administration of this stimulant other symptoms of a return to life were exhibited, the relation of which can only be interesting to medical men; let it suffice to say that I had no longer any doubt of the ultimate recovery of my patient.

"My first questions, when he had slept and eaten, had reference to his bodily sensations at the instant of and after his suspension. He describes them as merely a sharp pricking over his body from head to foot, which was the last thing of which he was conscious: his return to life was like a long nightmare. But beyond this, I am convinced he was conscious of something which has no earthly connection. I am not influenced in this opinion by any thing he has said, for whenever I have questioned him he is as silent as a statue: it is from that unearthly, never-changing look of his, accompanied by an absence of animation, and apparently utter insensibility to every thing we regard as painful or annoying.

"His execution took place eleven months ago, as you no doubt remember. For several weeks afterward he remained locked up in my laboratory, till I thought it safe to send him here, to New Orleans, to my brother, who is as thoroughly satisfied of his innocence of the murder as I am; for I am convinced that he would not have denied his guilt to me on his restoration to life, if he had committed the deed."

I did not see the Doctor again after this, but I presume he returned to the place whence he had come. You know how men whose time is fully occupied go on year after year without seeing an acquaintance living in the same city, unless they meet by accident. This was my case and that of Mr. Dampier, the Doctor's brother. About five or six years ago he called on me, to ask me to take proceedings to enforce payment of an insurance on his brother's life—not the Doctor's, but another brother, who was a traveling preacher or something of that kind. The mention of his brother's name caused me to ask if Samuel Calcraft was with him still, when he told me that his innocence had been established years before; "but," he added, "it was such an extraordinary business altogether that I will, if you wish it, write to my brother, and ask him to send you a full account of the affair." Here is the letter I received; you can read it. It relates one of those remarkable cases which have given rise to the saying that murder will out—one of the greatest fallacies ever uttered, as I can testify from my own experience.

"MY DEAR MR. HENSMAN,—At my brother's desire I send you an account of my discovery of the actual murderer of poor Exton; indeed I should have done so at the time, if I had not supposed that you would see an account of it in the newspapers.

"Shortly after I saw you last I had occasion to visit a friend named Penton, who, it turned out, occupied a considerable extent of land joining that belonging to old Sangster, Mary Exton's father, though I was not aware of it till afterward. One day, while strolling about, I got on this man's estate, at no great distance from his house. You are aware of my habit of studying every manifestation of life. Well, on this day, I was looking for objects near a ditch, when I chanced to see some pieces of charred bone lying about among the grass. Without the most distant idea of the discovery this was destined to lead to, I picked up one piece, then another, and another; in short, I became satisfied that the bones were fragments of a human being. I now got interested in the matter, and jumped into the ditch, which happened to be dry just then, and stirring up the dry dirt at the bottom with my heel, I found other things which had passed through the fire, viz., teeth, buttons, and—most important of all—a belt clasp of a very peculiar design, which said more for the maker's mythological knowledge than for the delicacy or purity of his taste. Putting the latter in my pocket, with as many of the teeth, and buttons, and charred bones as I thought necessary to establish the fact of their having formed part of a human being, I returned to my friend Penton. On showing him the buckle, and asking him if he had ever seen it before, he immediately said, 'To be sure I have; it belonged to Joel Singleton.' 'And who was Joel Singleton?' I asked. 'Joel Singleton,' he replied, 'was a fellow of no very good repute. He was a horse-dealer on his own account sometimes, besides working for the worthy Mr. Sangster as a woodman, an occupation which some said he engaged in for the sake of being with Mary Sangster, the young woman poor Exton married.' 'Then, I suppose, when she married Exton he went away?' 'Not at all; he was with Exton for at least a year afterward, and there were rumors about that if Mary could have had her way, she would have preferred him to Exton for her husband, in spite of his loose habits.' 'Do you know where he went to when he did leave?' 'No, he went away very suddenly, and Sangster said he had gone to—to California or Texas, I don't exactly remember which.' 'Well,' said I, 'it strikes me that he went to neither place. Look here! these bones are human bones; they have been in the fire, and so has this buckle; and as I found them all together, it is only reasonable to imagine that the bones belonged to the owner of the buckle rather than to any body else.' 'Why, you surely don't suppose that the fellow was burned?' 'Seeing that somebody has been burned, it seems to me only rational to suppose that he was the person. At all events, the matter must be inquired into,' I answered.

"The next day I went to the district judge and told him of the affair. I need not go into details with you, as you will understand all that was done in the way of search, and so forth. The upshot of the whole was that Sangster, now a very old man, was taken into custody and lodged in prison. The evidence was so purely circumstantial that I do not think he would have been convicted if he had been tried, but he never was, for nature stepped in and placed him beyond the reach of the law. When he was convinced that he could not live many hours, he sent for me, and made the following confession in my presence:

"'Joel Singleton was the murderer of Mr. Exton. I am not going to tell you any thing more about that affair, and so it is of no use to ask me any questions. I knew that he was the murderer, and he knew that I knew it, and if I had not killed him he would have killed me; and besides that, there was the temptation of a bag of gold he stole at the same time. I had only one man about the place, and I picked a quarrel with him, and kicked him out there and then. That night Joel's chance of disposing of me was lost.

* * * * * * *

"'I got rid of his body and clothes in the way you imagine, and threw the ashes into the ditch where you found them. May God forgive us all!'

"This settled the question of poor Calcraft's innocence, and I went directly to New Orleans to consult him as to what he wished should be done. He did not appear at all interested, and left it to me to do what I thought proper. As one instance does not establish a rule, I have not mentioned the restoration of Calcraft to any body besides you and my brother, and I have not had an opportunity of repeating the experiment; but as there have been several cases of horse-stealing about here lately, and Judge Lynch has been using threatening language, there is a possibility that I may be able to renew it, and I have no doubt with equal success.

Yours, etc.,

CHAPTER IV.

THE long vacation commenced about a month afterward, and Hardie came to his father's house, to read for honors, unimpeded by university and college lectures; and the old man plowed and penitent one packed up his Aldrich and his Whately, the then authorities in Logic, and brought them home, together with a firm resolution to master that joyous science before the next examination for Smalls in October. But lo! ere he had been an hour at home, he found his things put neatly away in his drawers on the feminine or vertical system—deep strata of variously cut strata of trowsers, strata of coats, strata of papers—and his Logic gone.

In the course of the evening he traced his sister good-humoredly, and asked "what earthly use that book was to her, not wearing cuffs."

"I intend to read it, and study it, and teach you it," replied Julia, rather languidly—considering the weight of the resolve.

"Oh, if you have honed it to read, I say no more; the crime will punish itself."

"Be serious, Edward, and think of mamma. I can not sit with my hands before me, and let you be perplexed."

"I don't want. But—eplexed!—haw, haw! but you can't help me at Logic as you used at Syntax. Why, all the world knows a girl can't learn logic."

"A girl can learn any thing she chooses to learn. What she can't learn is things other people set her down to." Before Edward could fully digest this revelation, she gave the argument a new turn, by adding, fretfully, "And don't be so unkind as thwarting and teasing me!" and all in a moment she was crying.

"Hollos!" ejaculated Edward, taken quite by surprise. "What's the matter, dear?" and his quired maternal vigilance from the other end of the room.

"I don't know, mamma," said Edward. "What on earth is it, Julia?"

"Nothing.—Don't torment me!"

Mrs. Dodd came quietly to them. "You did not speak brusquely to her, Edward?"

"No, no," said Julia, eagerly. "It is I that am turned so cross, and so peevish. I am quite a changed girl. Mamma, what is the matter with me?" And she laid her brow on her mother's bosom.

Mrs. Dodd caressed the lovely head soothingly with one hand, and made a sign over it to Edward to leave them alone. She waited quietly till Julia was composed; and then said, softly, "Come, tell me what it is; nothing that Edward said to you; for I heard almost every word, and I was just going to smile, or nearly, when you—And, my love, it is not the first time, you know; I would not tell Edward, but I have more than once seen your eyes with tears in them."

"Have you, mamma?" said Julia, scarcely above a whisper.

"Why, you know I have. But I said to myself it was no use forcing confidence. I thought I would be very patient, and wait till you came to me with it; so now, what is it, my darling? Why do you speak of one thing, and think of another? and not without any reason that your mother can see?"

"I don't know, mamma," said Julia, hiding her head. "I think it is because I sleep so badly. I rise in the morning hot and quivering, and more tired than I lay down."

"I am sorry to hear it," said Mrs. Dodd. "How long is this?"

Julia did not answer this question; she went on, "I am sure these still hidden, "Mamma, I do feel so depressed and hysterical, or else in violent spirits; but not nice and cheerful as you are. What I used to be; and I go from one thing to another, and can settle to nothing; even in church I dread by fits and starts I forgot to water my very flowers last night: and I heard Mrs. Maxley out of my window tell Sarah I am losing my color. Am I? But what does it matter? I am losing my sense; for I catch myself for ever looking in the glass, and that is a sure sign of a fool; and I can not pass the shops: I stand and look in, and long for the very dearest silks, and for diamonds in my hair." A heavy sigh followed the confession of these multiform imperfections; but the criminal looked a little relieved by it; and half raised her head to watch the effect.

As for Mrs. Dodd, she opened her eyes wide with surprise; but at the end of the heterogeneous catalogue she smiled, and said, "I can not believe that. If ever there was a young lady free from personal vanity it is you, Julia. Why, your thoughts run by nature away from yourself; you were born for others."

Her daughter kissed her gratefully, and smiled: but, after a pause, said, sorrowfully, "Ah, that was the old Julia, as seen with your dear eyes. I have almost forgotten her. I am now one in what I tell you, dear mamma, and that" (with sudden energy) "is a dreamy, wandering, vain, egotistical, hysterical, abominable girl."

"Let me kiss this monster that I have brought into the world," said Mrs. Dodd: "and now let me think." She rested her eyes calm and penetrating upon her daughter; and as this more look, and a very thoughtful one, the color mounted and mounted in Julia's cheek strangely.

"After all," said Mrs. Dodd, thoughtfully, "your's is a critical age; you are not a girl, you are turning to a woman; my rose-bud to a rose." And she sighed. Mothers will sigh at things none other ever sighed at.

"To a weed, I fear," replied Julia. "What will you say when I own I felt no real joy at Edward's return this time? A mere mockery I cried, 'Do get away, and don't pester me!'"

"To your brother? Oh, fie!"

"Oh no, mamma, that was to poor Spot. He jumped on me in a reverie, all affection, poor thing."

"Well, for your comfort, dogs do not appreciate the niceties of our language."

"I am afraid they do, at times," he kick them."

Mrs. Dodd smiled at the admission implied here, and the deep penitence it was uttered with. "I am remarkably good to-day, I do!" don't laugh at me, but help me with your advice: you are so wise and so experienced: you must have been a girl before you were a mother, and you must know what is the matter with me. O, do pray cure me; or else I shall think I am going mad, and that all my affections deadened, and my peace disturbed."

Mrs. Dodd the mother looked serious and thoughtful enough; and the daughter watched her furtively; "Julia," said Mrs. Dodd, very gravely, "I am afraid you have learned under my eye, and never separated from me a single day, I should say, this young lady is either afflicted with some constitutional disorder of the nerves, and spirits; or else she has—she is—what inexperienced young people call "in love." You need not look at me so fiercely; mothers in their senses suspects you of imprudence or indelicacy; and therefore I feel quite sure that you are not conscious of it, as a crisis, or your health has suffered some shock; pray Heaven it may not be a serious one. You will have the best advice, and without delay, I promise you."

During the pronunciation of this judgment Julia's countenance was entirely a sight; always transparent, it was now nearly prismatic, so swiftly did various emotions chase one another over those vivid features. Emotions that seemed strangely disproportioned to the occasion; for among them were hope, and fear, and shame.

But when Mrs. Dodd came to the ironic conclusion, a kaleidoscope seemed suddenly to shut, so abruptly did the young face lose its noisy play and life; and the mother said, sadly and almost doggedly, "My only hope was in you and your common, not in many doctors."

This expression, so flattering, at first sight, to a great profession, was but a feminine ellipse; the woman "doctors" were unscrupulous and are nasty." However, the learned reader has already seen she was not behind her sex in feats of gymnast.

That very evening, Mrs. Dodd sent a servant into the town with a note like a cocked hat, and summoning Mr. Coleman the apothecary called. Mrs. Dodd introduced the patient, and as soon as he had examined her pulse and tongue, gave her a signal to retire, and detailed her symptoms, loss of sleep, unevenness of spirits, listlessness, hysteria. Mr. Coleman listened reverentially; then gave his opinion; that there was no sign of consumption, nor indeed of any organic disorder; his considerable functional derangement, and it would be prudent to arrest. He bowed out profoundly, and in one hour a buttoned boy called and delivered a smart salve; a box of twenty-right pills; and a bottle containing six drachms of an quantity of each was determined by horizontal glass lines raised on the vial at equal distances: the pills contained aloes, colocynth, soap, and another ingredient I have unfortunately forgotten: the draught, steel, calumba root, camphor, and cardamoms. Two pills every night, a draught three times a day.

"I do not quite understand this, Julia," said Mrs. Dodd; "here are pills for a fortnight, but the bottle will last only two days."

The mystery was cleared by the pretty page arriving every other day with a fresh vial, and a military flourish of hand to cap.

After the third bottle (as topers say), Mrs. Dodd felt uneasy. All this saluting, and firing of vials, at measured intervals, smacked of routine and nonchalance too much to satisfy her mother anxiety; and some instinct whispered that an airy creature, threatened with a mysterious malady, would not lower herself to be cured by machinery."

So she sent for Mr. Osmond, a consulting surgeon, who bore a high reputation in Barking-ton. He came; and proved too plump for that complete elegance she would have desired in a medical attendant; but had a soft hand, a gentle touch, and a subdued manner. He spoke to the patient with a kindness which won the mother directly; had every hope of setting her right without any violent or disagreeable remedies but, when she had retired, altered his tone, and told Mrs. Dodd seriously she had done well to send for him in time; it was a case of "Hyperæsthesia" (Mrs. Dodd clasped her hands in horror). "or, as unprofessional persons would say, 'excessive sensibility.'"

Mrs. Dodd was somewhat relieved. Translation blunts thunder-bolts. She told him she had always feared for her child on that score. But was sensibility curable? Could a nature be changed?

He replied, that the Idiosyncrasy could not; but the morbid excess could, especially when taken in time. Advice was generally called in too late. However, here the only serious symptom was the Insomnia. "We must treat her for that," said he, writing a prescription; "but for the rest, active employment, long walks, or rides, and a change of scene and associations, will be all that will be required. In these cases," resumed Mr. Osmond, "connected as they are with Hyperæmia, medical men consider moderate venesection to be indicated."

"Venesection? Why, that is bleeding," ejaculated Mrs. Dodd, and looked aghast.

Mr. Osmond saw her repugnance, and flowed aside: "But here, where Kephalalgia and other symptoms are waning, it is not called for in the least; indeed, would be unadvisable." He then put on his gloves, saying, carelessly, "The diet, of course, must be Antiphlogistic."

Mrs. Dodd thanked him warmly for the interest he had shown, and, after ringing the bell, accompanied him herself to the head of the stairs, and then asked him would he add to his kindness by telling her where she could buy that?

Mr. Osmond looked surprised at the question, and told her any chemist would make it up for her. It was only a morphine pill, to be taken every night.

"I do not mean the prescription," explained Mrs. Dodd, "but the new food the dear child is to take? An—Eu—Eustic, was it? I have written it down, Sir;" and she held her pre cryx tablets ready.

Mr. Osmond stared, then smiled superior: "Antiphlogistic is not an eeculent, it is a medical term."

"There, see my ignorance!" said Mrs. Dodd, sweetly.

He replied courteously, "I am afraid it is, 'See my rudeness, calling Greek to a lady.' But it is impossible to express medical ideas by popular terms. 'Antiphlogistic' is equivalent to 'non-inflammatory. You must know that nearly all disorders arise from, or are connected with, 'phlegmon,' that is, morbid heat; inflammation. Then a curative system antagonistic to heat, in short, an Antiphlogistic treatment, restores the healthy equilibrium by the cooling effect of venesection or cupping in violent cases, followed by drastic agents, and by vesication and even salivation if necessary—not to be alarmed! Nothing in so mild a case as this indicates the exhibition of active remedies—and, in all cases, serious or the reverse, the basis of the treatment is a light abstemious diet; a diet at once lowering and cooling: in one word, Antiphlogistic. Let us say then, for breakfast, dry toast with very little butter—no coffee—cocoa (from the nibs), or weak tea: for luncheon, beef-tea or mutton-broth: for dinner, a slice of roast chicken, and apple, or semolina, pudding. I would give her one glass of sherry, but no more, and barley-water; it is better for her also to avoid brown meats, at all events for the present. With these precautions, my dear madam, I think your anxiety will soon be happily removed."

Upon the good surgeon's departure, Mrs. Dodd went in search of Julia, and told her she was charmed with him. "So kind and considerate. He enters into my solicitude, and seems to partake it; and, he speaks under his breath, and selects his expressions. You are to take a mercuric, and long walks, and an antiphlogistic diet."

Julia took her four pills that night; and became a little pale at times, and had fewer bursts of high spirits in the intervals of depression. Her mother went with her cans to a female friend. The lady said she would not trust to surgeons and apothecaries; she would have a downright physician. "Why not go to the top of the tree at once, and call in Dr. Short? You have heard of him?"

"Oh yes! I have even met him in society; a most refined person: I will certainly follow your advice and consult him. Oh, thank you, Mrs. Bonnicastle! Apropos, do you consider him skilful?"

"Oh, immensely: he is a particular friend of my husband's."

This was so convincing, that off went another three-cocked note, and next day a grand green carriage and pair dashed up to Mrs. Dodd's door, and Dr. Short bent himself in an arc, got out, and slowly mounted the stairs. He was six feet two, wonderfully thin, livid, and gentlemanlike. Fine long head, keen eye, lantern jaws. At sight of him Mrs. Dodd rose and smiled, Julia started and sat trembling. He stepped across the room inaudibly, and, after the usual civilities, glanced at the patient's tongue, and touched her wrist delicately. "Pulse is rapid," said he.

Mrs. Dodd detailed the symptoms. Dr. Short listened with the patient politeness of a gentleman, to whom all this was superfluous. He asked for a sheet of note-paper, folded it up gently, he seemed to be persuading one thing to be two; he wrote a pair of prescriptions, and while than employed looked up every now and then and conversed with the ladies.

"You have a slight subclavicular affection, Mrs. Dodd: I mean, a little pain under the shoulder-blade."

"No, Sir," said Julia, quietly.

Dr. Short looked a little surprised; his female patients rarely contradicted him. Was it for them to disown things he was so good as to assert for them?

"Ah!" said he, "you are not conscious of it; all the better; it must be slight; a mere weakness: no more." He then numbered the prescriptions 1, 2, and advised Mrs. Dodd to drop No. 1 after eight days, and resume it on No. 2, to be continued until convalescence. He put on his gloves, to leave. Mrs. Dodd, then, with some hesitation, asked him humbly whether she might ask him what the disorder was. "Certainly, madam," said he, graciously; "your daughter is laboring under a slight torpidity of the liver. The first prescription is active, and is to clear the gland itself, and the biliary ducts, of the excretory accumulation; and the second is exhibited to promote a healthy normal habit in that important part of the vascular system."

"A liver complaint, Dr. Short! What, then, it is not Hyperæsthesia?"

"Hyperæsthesia? There is no such disorder in the books."

DR. SHORT PRESCRIBES.

"You surprise me," said Mrs. Dodd. "Dr. Osmond certainly thought it was Hyperæsthesia."

And she consulted her wee tablets to establish the word.

Meantime, Dr. Short's mind, to judge by his countenance, was away roaming distant space in search of Osmond. "Osmond? Osmond? I do not know that name in medicine."

"O, I!" cried Julia, "and they both live in the same street!" Mrs. Dodd held up her finger to this outspoken patient.

But a light seemed to break in on Dr. Short. "Ah! you mean Mr. Osmond: a surgeon. A very respectable man, a most respectable man. I do not know a more estimable person—in his grade of the profession—than my good friend Mr. Osmond. And he gives opinions in medical cases, does he?" Dr. Short paused, apparently to realize this phenomenon in the world of Mind. He resumed in a different tone: "You may have misunderstood him. Hyperæsthesia exists, of course; since he says so. But Hyperæsthesia is not a Complaint; it is a Symptom. Of biliary derangement. My worthy friend looks at disorders from a medical point; very natural: his interest lies that way, perhaps you are aware; but profounder experience proves that mental anxiety is nearly one of the results of bodily health: and I am happy to assure you that, the biliary canal once cleared, and the secretions restored to the healthy habit, by these prescriptions, the Hyperæsthesia, and other concomitants of hepatic derangement, will disperse, and leave our glittering comfort in the engrossing cares of her natural intelligence, her friends' affectionate admiration, and above all, of a sound conscience. Ladies, I have the honor—" and the Doctor eked out this sentence by rising.

"Oh, thank you, Dr. Short," said Mrs. Dodd, rising with him; "you inspire me with confidence and gratitude." As if under the influence of these feelings she took Dr. Short's pain, and pressed it. Of the two hands, which met for a moment then, one was soft and melting, the other a bundle of bones; but both were very white, and so equally adroit, that a double fee passed without the possibility of a by-stander suspecting it.

For the benefit of all young virgins afflicted like Julia Dodd, here are the Doctor's prescriptions:

FOR MISS DODD.

Misft: Elect: Cujus sum: 3j omni mane.
xviii. Sept. J. S.

Id: Anglicè redit: per me Carol: Arundin: The same done into English by me C. R. Short.

FOR MISS DODD.

1. O Jupiter and us! 1 plummer's pill to be taken every night. 1 oz. compound decoction of Aloes every morning. 8th Sept. J. S.

FOR MISS DODD.

2. O Jupiter and us! with Confection of Senna, Bitartrate of Potash, extract of Dandelion, of each half an ounce, let an electuary be mixed, of which let her take 1 drachm every morning. 18th Sept. J. S.

"Quite the courtier," said Mrs. Dodd, delighted. Julia assented: she even added, with a listless yawn, "I had no idea that a skeleton was such a commonplace thing; I'll never see one before."

Mrs. Dodd admitted he was very thin.

"Oh no, mamma; thin implies a little flesh. When he felt my pulse, a chill struck to my heart; I doubt if a black suit seemed to stand to me, and lay a finger on my wrist: and mark me for his own."

Mrs. Dodd forbade her to give way to such gloomy ideas; and expostulated firmly with her for judging learned men by their bodies. "However," said she, "all the good, kind, clever, valuables do not answer his expectations and mine, I shall take you to London directly. I do hope papa will come home."

Poor Mrs. Dodd was herself slipping into a morbid state. A mother collecting Doctors! It is a most fascinating kind of connoisseurship, grows on one like Drink; like Polemics; like Melodrama; like the Millennium; like any Thing.

Sure enough the very next week she and Julia sat patiently in the most morning lyrics of a pleasant and titled London surgeon. Full forty patients were before them, so they had to wait and wait. At last they were ushered into the consulting-chamber, and Mrs. Dodd entered on the beaten ground of her daughter's symptoms. The noble surgeon stopped her civilly but promptly. "Auscultation will give us the clew," said he, and drew his stethoscope. Julia shrank, and cast a reproaching look at her mother; but Mrs. Dodd persuaded her to it by taking part in the examination, and making it as delicate as possible. The young lady sat panting, with cheeks flushing shame, and eyes flashing indignation. The impassive chevalier reported on each organ in turn without moving his ear from the key-hole. "Lungs pretty sound," said he, a little plaintively: "so is the liver. Now for the—Hum? There is no cardiac insufficiency, I think, neither mitral nor tricuspid. If we find no tendency to hypertrophy we shall do very well. Ah, I have succeeded in diagnosing a slight diastolic murmur; very slight." He deposited the instrument, and said, not without a certain shade of satisfaction that his research had not been fruitless, "The Heart is the pecuaan organ."

"Or, Sir!" is it serious?" said poor Mrs. Dodd.

By no means. Try this" (he scratched a prescription which would not have misbecome the tomb of Cheops); "and come again in a month." "Ting!" He struck a bell. That "ting" said, "Go, live Guines! and another come!"

"Heart disease now!" said Mrs. Dodd, sinking back in her hired carriage, and the tears were in her patient eyes.

"My own, own mamma," said Julia, earnestly, "do you distrust yourself? I have no disease in the world, but my old, old, old one, of being naughty, wayward girl. As for you, mamma, you have resigned your own judgment to your inferiors, and that is both our misfortunes. Dear, dear mamma, do take a doctress next time, if you have not had enough."

"To a what, love?"

"A doctress, mamma."

"A female physician, child? There is no such thing. No; assurance is becoming a characteristic of our sex: but we have not yet intruded ourselves into the learned professions; thank Heaven."

"Excuse me, mamma, there are one or two: for the newspapers say so."

"Well, dear, there are none in this country happily."

"What, not in London?"

"No."

"Then what is the use of such a great overgrown place, all smoke, if here is nothing in it you can not have a doctress? Let us go back to Barkington this very d y, this minute, this instant; oh, pray, pray."

"And so you shall, to-morrow. But you must pity your poor mother's anxiety, and see Dr. Chalmers first."

"Oh, mamma, not another surgeon! He frightened me; he hurt me; I never heard of such a thing; he ought to be ashamed of himself; oh, please not another surgeon."

"It is not a surgeon, dear; it is the Court Physician."

The Court Physician detected "a somewhat morbid condition of the great nervous centres." To an inquiry whether there was heart-disease, he replied, "Pooh!" On being told Sir William had announced heart-disease, he said, "Ah! that shows how easily mistaken." He examined, however, that it must be trifling, and would go no further, the nervous system once restored to the healthy state. "Ay, Jupiter, aid us!" a pill and black draught."

Dr. Kenyon found the nervous symptoms were irritated and required soothing. "O, Jupiter, etc. Blue pill and Seidlitz powder."

Dr. Osmond returned home consulted and confused; Julia listless and apathetic. Tea was ordered, with two or three kinds of bread, thin, neat slices of meat and fish, a little fine magg, etc., their favorite repast after a journey; and, while the tea was drawing, Mrs. Dodd looked over the notes and prescriptions of the visitors that had called during their absence: "Dr. Short—Mr. Osmond—Mrs. Hetherington—Mr. Alfred Hardie—Lady Percy—Mrs. and Miss Bosanquet. What a pity Edward was not at home, dear; Mr. Alfred Hardie's visit must have been a long one."

"Oh, of course, mamma."

"A very manly, gentlemanly gentleman."

"Oh yes. No. He is so rude."

"Is he? Ah, he was ill just then, and pain irritates gentlemen: they are not accustomed to it, poor Thinge."

"That is like you, dear mamma; making excuse for every Julia added, faintly, "but he is so impetuous."

"I have a daughter who reconciles me to impetuosity. And he saw a good heart, he was so kind to my boy."

Julia looked down smiling; her prostrate temper to be raised with a spirit of contradiction; she began to pick poor Alfred to pieces: he was thin, dark, and no other; and then so bold, she might say impudent.

Mrs. Dodd replied calmly that he was very kind to her son.

"Oh, mamma, you can not approve all the words he spoke."

"It is not worth while to remember all the words young gentlemen speak, nowadays; he was very kind to my boy, I remember that."

The tea was brought, the table laid out down, and patted a chair, with a smile of invitation for Julia to come and sit beside her. But Julia said, in one minute, "Dear me!" and left the room.

When she came back, she fluttered up to her mother and kissed her vehemently, then sat down radiant. "Ah!" said Mrs. Dodd, "why, you are looking yourself once more. How do you feel now? Better?"

"How do I feel? Let me see: the world seems once more to smile on me here, and Mr. the butterfly it all belongs to." She spake, and to confirm her words the air thing went waltzing, sailing, and fluttering round the room, and zipping mamma every now and then on the wing.

In this buoyancy she remained some twenty-four hours; then came clouds and chills, which, in their turn, gave way to exhilaration, duly followed by depression. Her spirits were so uncertain, that things too minute to justify narration turned the scale either way: a word from Mrs. Dodd—a new face at St. Anne's Church looking devoutly her way—a piece of town gossip distilled in her ear by Mrs. Maxley —and she was sprightly or languid, and both more than reason.

Mrs. Dodd had not the clew; and such extreme caused her anxiety; for her own constitution, and her experience of life, led her to connect health, and happiness too, with gentle, even spirits.

One drizzly afternoon they were sitting silent and saddish in the drawing-room, Mrs. Dodd correcting the mechanical errors in a drawing of Julia's, and admiring the rare dash and vigor, and Julia doggedly studying Dr. Whatsly's Logic, with now and then a sigh, when suddenly a trumpet seemed to articulate in the little hall: "Mestress Doddi at home?"

The lady rose from her seat, and said, with a smile of pleasure, "I hear a voice."

Julia looked up, and darted a hard-feat ured, gray-headed man, laughing and shouting like a school-boy broke loose. He cried out, "Aha! I've found y' out at last." Mrs. Dodd glided to meet him, and put out both her hands. He paled somewhat, with the pretticst air of lady-like cordiality; he shook them heartily. "The vagabins said y' had left the town; but y' had only flitted from the quay to the suburbs; 'twas a pashitt put me on the scint of ye. And how are y' all these years? an' how's Sawmil?"

Sawmill! What is that?"

"It's just your husband. Isn't his name Sawmil?"

"Dear, no! Have you forgotten?—David."

"Oh, ay! I knew it was some Scripcher Patriarch or another, Jacob, or Nauthan, or Samuil. He is a fine lad any way—and how is he, and where is he?"

Mrs. Dodd replied that he was on the seas, but expected—

"Then I wish him well off 'em, confound 'em oneonall! Hallos! why, this will be the little girl grown up int' a wumman while ye look round."

"Yes, my good friend; and her mother's daughter."

"And she's a bonny lass, I can tell ye. But no freend to the Dockers, I see."

"Ah!" said Mrs. Dodd, sadly, "looks are deceitful; and I am under medical advice at this very—"

"Well, that won't hurt her, unless she takes it." And he burst into a ringing laugh: but, in the middle of it, stopped dead short, and his face changed, and he looked, mad'y, and, impressively, "mind what y' are at, though! Barkton's just a trap for fanciful femals: there's a deep well there (Barkton, mad'y, and in a shrill throat called Stephenson, and a genteel, cadaverin old assassin called Short, as long as a may-pole: they 've made the rose pale of Miss Flore's cheek here. Why, they'd starve Cupid, an' vanceek Venus, an' blister Pomone, the vagabins."

Mrs. Dodd looked a little confused, and exchanged speaking glances with Julia. However, she said quietly, "I have consulted Mr. Osmond and Dr. Short, but have not relied on them alone. I have also seen Sir William Best. And to Dr. Chalmers. And to Dr. Kenyon." And she felt invulnerable behind her phalanx of learning and reputation.

"Good Hivens!" roared the visitor, "what a gauntlet o' gabies for one girt to run; and come out alive! And out of health." My faith, Miss Flore, y' ve touched than yo lock."

"My daughter's name is Julia," observed Mrs. Dodd, a little haughty; but instantly recovering herself, she said, "This is Dr. Sampson, love, an old friend of your mother's."

"And the Author an' Inventor of th' great Chronothermal Theesy o' Midicine, th' Unity Periodical Cure o' Remittens f' all Diseases," in the visitor, with such prodigious swiftness of elocution, that the words went tumbling over one another like the waves on a ringes out of a race, and the sentence was a pile of loud, indistinct syllables.

Julia's lovely eyes dilated at this clishmaclaver, and she bowed coldly. Dr. Sampson was repulsive to her: he had revealed in this short interview many of the characteristics of voice, speech, and manner she had been taught from infancy to abun: boisterous, gesticulatory, idiomatic; and she had the rich discourse out of her mamma's mouth twice; now Albion Villa was a Kail Indian hut in one respect: here nobody interrupted.

Mrs. Dodd had little personal egotism, but she had a mother's pride, and now began this opportunity of adding another Doctor to her collection: so she said, hurriedly, "Will you permit me to ask you how many your learned confreres have prescribed for?" Julia sighed aloud, and depressed the subject with earnest furtive signs; Mrs. Dodd did not see them. Now Dr. Sampson was himself afflicted with what I shall venture to call a mental ailment: to wit, a serious misinterpretation of other men's opinions; he had not even patience to hear them.

"Mat—ony!" he cried, "said he, hastily: "when you've told me their names, that's enough. Short treats her for liver, Sir William goes in for lung disease and Hypertrophy, Stevens sits it: Short and Kinyon the mukis smethrin; and I say they are fools and lyrss all four."

"Julia!" remonstrated Mrs. Dodd, "this is very extraordinary."

"No, it is not extraordinary," cried Dr. Sampson, defiantly: "nothing is extraordinary. And dy'e think I've known these shallow men thirty years, and not learned 'um?"

"Shallow, my good friend? Excuse me! they are the ablest men in your own branch of your own profession."

"Th' ablest? I' Oh, you mean the moneymakingest: now listen me! our learned Professors is a rascally one. It is like a barrel o' beer. What rises to the top?" Here he paused for a moment, then answered himself furiously, "THE SCUM!"

This blast blown, he moderated a little. "Look see!" said he, "up to three or four thousand a year, a Doctor is mostly a learned man, and sometimes knows something of midicine: not much, however, for it is not taught any where; but if he is making over five thousand, he must be a rogue, or else a fool: either he has boxed an' boxed, and cript an' crawled, int' wholesale collusion with a bushyeetcher an' th' accoucheur—the two jockeys that drive John Bull's family coach—and they are sucking the pashint togither like a leash o' leeches; or else he has turned spicialist; has tacked his name to some poplar discovery, real or imaginary; it needn't exist to be poplar. Now, those four you have named are spicialists, and that means mononanciers—why on airth didn't ye come to me among the rest?—their buddies expatriate in West-ind squares, but their souls dwell in a'alley yerm man Jock of 'em: Aberford's in Soho Square Alley, Chalmers's in Nairre Court, Short's niver sits out o' Liver Lane, Paul's in stuck fast in Kidney Close, Kenyon's in Mukis Street, Grosvenor, and Hibbard's in Lung Passage. Look see! hint times y' are out of sorts, sid o' consulting three bats an' a rovrt at a guinea the piece, send direct to me, and I'll give y' all their opinions, and all their prescriptions, gratis. And dessilicit dear ye'll find 'em at the price, if ye swallow 'm."

Mrs. Dodd thanked him coldly for the offer, but said she would be more grateful if he would show his superiority to persons of known ability, by just curing her daughter on the spot.

"Well, I will," said he, carelessly; and all his fire died out of him. "Put out your tongue!—Now your pulse!"

THE "KEOKUK."

We publish on page 269 an engraving of the double-turreted iron-clad "Keokuk," which was sunk at the attack on Charleston. The following is a history and description of this vessel:

The Keokuk was designed by B. C. W. Whitney, of this city, and was built at the yard of J. S. Underhill and Co., Dry Dock, New York. She was launched in the early part of last winter, and sailed from New York on the 11th March, arriving at Port Royal on the 20th.

The Keokuk was not only a two-turreted vessel, but was also a ram. She was smaller than the Ericsson Monitors, being 200 feet in length over all, having a beam, which was 5 feet long. She had a beam of 36 feet, with a depth of hold of 11 feet 6 inches, and drew 9 feet of water. Her sides sloped inward at an angle of thirty-seven degrees, to shed the enemy's shot.

She was built of iron, and her armor extended nearly four feet below the water-line. The horizontal deck was five feet above the water-line. Her propelling power was furnished by two propellers and two engines of five hundred horse power. The hull of the vessel was composed of half-inch rolled iron. She had three keelsons running the whole length of the vessel, and two fore and aft bulkheads, leaving on each side a space, and forming an inner skin, which would probably keep out the water in the event of the outer skin being pierced by shot. In addition to these she had two bulk-heads—one forward and one aft—which could be filled with water, so as to sink the vessel down while in action. These could be filled in fifteen minutes and pumped out in forty minutes. In using the ram, should the vessel be wrenched so as to cause leakage, the compartment alluded to was to preserve the vessel from sinking. The ram was constructed so as to be the appliance of these water-tanks.

The armament was remarkable, the gun revolving to the three ports placed in each turret. They weighed each 40 tons, and were built of a ground-work of half-inch rolled plates, like the vessel herself, and had a face four inches thick, standing edgeways, placed one and a quarter inches apart, the interstices being filled with yellow pine. Over all this were three plates, each five-eighths of an inch thick, having also strutted bolts together which are one-eighth inch bolts, with countersunk heads, one foot apart. The turrets, therefore, were built of a solid mass twelve inches thick. Each turret had three ports, with heavy shutters working in two halves—one port on each side, and one forward and aft. Each turret contained an 11-inch gun, carrying a 180-pound shot. These guns moved on revolving carriages, which were placed on a floor 10 inches below the level of the deck, their giving a greater height to the ports, which were 20 feet in diameter, and 7 feet 6 inches at the top—being cone-shaped—and 8 feet 8 inches high. The turrets were additionally supported within by a bent of five by six inch iron, on edge-rays, fifteen inches apart; and the ports were made sufficiently large to give the guns a complete vertical and slight forward lateral range.

The rudder and propeller were guarded by an overhanging structure and a wrought guard on the after-part. This little vessel carried one hundred men all told. She had capacity in her coal-bunkers for two hundred 11-inch shot, one hundred and fifty 11-inch shell, with shrapnel and canister, small ammunition and powder for service. She appeared admirably calculated for river work, her light draught and compact form, by means of her propellers, fitting her especially for intricate navigation. Her builder was confident that, though in some respects a novel one, he was confident that, though in some respects a novel one, he had succeeded in found as shot-proof and serviceable as any; and the care and completeness with which he personally superintended, and multiplied tests of the offense and defense, gave hopes of a most efficient boat. Mr. Whitney was one of the earliest to urge the employment of building a shot-proof fleet, and his studies in the question, as well as his knowledge of the qualities of iron, gave his opinions weight.

The ventilation of the vessel had been carefully attended to, and the accommodations for the officers and crew were of an excellent character.

In many points the details of the vessel were new and interesting. For instance, the air-tube for portion of the sides of the Keokuk could be thrown open to admit light and air, and, of course, to effect the expulsion of foul air; and there being a passage on each side of the vessel, communication, as we learn to the style, an extensive circulation of air was kept up without artificial means, although such means were provided, and which would, in the opinion of many, have rendered the vessel, in point of ventilation, second to none.

ERICSSON'S DEVIL.

On page 269 we give a drawing and plan of the famous new weapon of naval warfare known as ERICSSON'S DEVIL. It is intended to destroy torpedoes, and had it done its work at Charleston, our iron-clads would not have been repulsed on 7th. Four of these devils were made here and sent down to Charleston. All four were lost on the way. One, however, was picked up at sea, and is now in the hands of Admiral Dupont. It seems, however, not to have been used in the attack on 7th.

THE APPROACH OF THE BRITISH PIRATE "ALABAMA."

THE IRON-CLADS AT CHARLESTON.

On pages 264 and 265 we publish two views of Charleston Harbor—one from the Battery, looking seaward, and showing Fort Sumter in the distance; another from our blockading fleet, showing the entrance to the harbor, with our iron-clads just over the bar.

The following narrative of the attack of 7th is from the officers of the Keokuk:

The fleet, after leaving Hilton Head, rendezvoused in the mouth of the Edisto. Several days were occupied in gathering the vessels and making final arrangements—issuing orders and otherwise arranging for the great combat. All being completed, the fleet left in detachments, and assembled off Charleston on Sunday, the 5th instant. The iron-clad fleet crossed the bar and entered Charleston Harbor on Monday. The Keokuk, drawing less water than any of the others, was sent in first, to find the channel and replace the buoys. Proceeding up the main ship-channel, the Keokuk found an easy and unobstructed entrance, with full eighteen feet of water in the shallowest places—more than has ever before been on Charleston bar. The buoys were replaced without difficulty, the rebels offering no opposition.

The Keokuk returned to the fleet, and on the morning of the 7th the order was given the Iron-clads to enter the harbor. The order was to proceed in single file, or in line ahead. The Weehawken was the leading vessel, having in front of her a scow, and then between the scow and herself Ericsson's torpedo exploder, or "devil," as it has been called.

The Ironsides, with Admiral Dupont on board, was the fifth in line, and the Keokuk the last. In this order the bar was passed in safety, without detention.

The order given to the commanders of the various vessels was to keep on straight up the harbor until they were within one thousand yards of the forts, and then to attack, directing their efforts principally against Fort Sumter.

In this order the fleet moved on steadily and gallantly up toward Forts Sumter and Moultrie, the rebels unbuoying their forts until they got well up into the harbor. The Ironsides stopped off Fort Moultrie to cast her anchor, it being dangerous to take her farther up on account of her draught of water. At this moment there seemed to be a temporary misunderstanding, and all the iron-clads, except the Weehawken and the Keokuk, gathered about the Ironsides, apparently supposing that she had given the signal for their assistance. They were, however, soon signaled to go into action. The Keokuk and Weehawken kept steadily on; she led the line, and had advanced to within four hundred yards of Fort Sumter, against whose granite walls she hailed her heavy shot with all the rapidity that the energy of her brave crew could furnish. The rebels, as was expected, immediately concentrated their fire on the Keokuk, which seemed to lead in the attack. From Sumter, Moultrie, Batteries Beauregard on Cummings Point, and from a fort erected on the middle ground, the fire of four or five hundred guns were concentrated in a terrible ball upon the devoted vessel. Such a fire had never, perhaps, in the history of the world been equaled. It was met by the officers of the Keokuk with heroic fortitude, while the balls were striking her at the rate of one every second. Her guns were worked with vigor and precision, and their weight and force were already making their mark upon the walls of Sumter.

THE ERICSSON DEVIL AND "WEEHAWKEN."

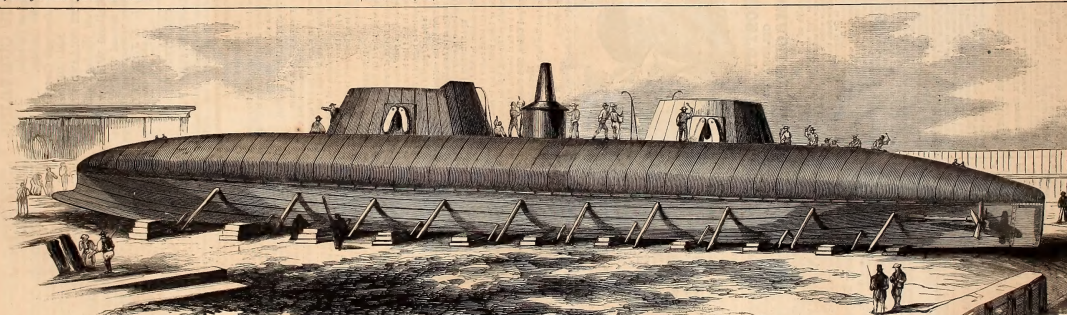
It soon, however, became apparent that she had some of the impregnability of Ericsson's Monitors—that, in fact, she was a failure. The rebel balls seemed to penetrate her as easily as if a wooden vessel. The port-holes or shutters of her turrets became jammed and her guns practically unserviceable.

During the thirty minutes she remained under this concentrated fire one hundred shot struck her, ninety of which were water-line shots, or such as would cause her to leak in a seaway. In fact, she was perfectly riddled. Her flag was shot into tatters and the whole of her sides battered, bruised, and pierced. Perceiving the severe injuries she had received, the Admiral signaled her to retire out of action and anchor beyond range. This was safely accomplished.

In the mean time the Monitors Nahant and Catskill had moved up to the support of the Keokuk, and engaged Fort Sumter. The Ironsides and other vessels at longer range were dividing their attention between Moultrie and Sumter. Into and on the latter fort a heavy fire was thus poured, and, it is believed, not without effect.

The engagement was kept up from one until four o'clock, when, in obedience to the Admiral's signals, the fleet retired slowly, receiving and returning the rebel fire until they anchored out of range within the bar.

The Weehawken was assigned the important duty which was faithfully performed in the midst of the fight, to examine, and, if possible, to fire the obstructions which the rebels have extended across the harbor from Fort Sumter to Moultrie. Protected by the scow and the "devil" in front of her, she pushed straight up toward the obstructions. They were found to consist of a net-work of chains and cables stretched across the harbor, over which it was impossible for the Weehawken to run without fouling her propeller, and which she found it impossible to force. To the net-work the rebels are supposed to have suspended torpedoes and other submarine explosives. Having completed examination, and tested the impossibility of working up the harbor until means are devised for the removal of these obstructions, the Weehawken returned and reported to Admiral Dupont, who ordered a discontinuance of the conflict.



It is believed that the damage done to Fort Sumter by our fire was serious. So far as it showed externally it consisted in two embrasures being knocked into one, and numerous indentations in the wall, which, it is believed, a few hours more pounding would convert into a serious breach. What damage or loss of life was sustained in the interior of the fort is not, of course, known, but it is believed to have been considerable.

Fort Moultrie was also well hammered, and at least one gun was dismounted. Beyond the sinking of the Keokuk, the damage to the iron-clads was very slight, not more than would require twenty-four hours to repair. They all came out of the contest in fighting trim, and able to have continued the conflict had it been desirable.

The Ironsides was hit frequently, but besides having one port shutter injured was unharmed.

Our informant heard of no serious casualties on board any of the vessels except the Keokuk. This vessel sunk next morning, about one thousand yards from Morris Island beach. She had thirteen wounded, two of whom, including Acting-Ensign McIntosh, will probably die.

The "devil" was not lost, as stated by the rebel dispatches. When the Weehawken returned from the reconnoissance of the obstructions, the scow she had in tow broke loose and grounded off Morris Island. The rebels, thinking it a dangerous affair, peppered away at it, thinking it was the "devil," or something worse.

ADMIRAL DUPONT.

We publish on page 257 a portrait of ADMIRAL DUPONT, commanding our fleet off Charleston.

Samuel F. Dupont is a native of Delaware, and is about sixty years of age. He entered the navy on 19th December, 1815, and rose steadily in his profession to the rank of Captain. At the outbreak of the war he had been twenty-two years at sea, and eight and a half years on active duty on shore. From 1839 to 1861 he was commandant of the Navy-yard at Philadelphia. When the war broke out he was appointed Commodore, and was given the command of the naval expedition against Beaufort, South Carolina.

On 5th November he made his first reconnaissance of the rebel batteries at Hilton Head, Bay Point, the operation being very similar to the affair of 7th inst. at Charleston. Having drawn the rebel fire, and ascertained the position of the batteries, the Admiral (then Commodore) made every preparation for the attack, which was commenced on 7th November, and terminated in the surrender of the two forts within a few hours. Dupont's plan of attack, the vessels sailing in a circle, and delivering an incessant fire, has been the subject of much encomium.

Ever since this affair Dupont has remained in command of the fleet of the Department of the South. He has lately been mustering his ironclads for the bombardment of Charleston, and on 7th made a preliminary attack, of which we give an account on another page. Having felt the enemy, the gallant Admiral is now in a position to make a real attack as soon as his preparations are completed.

THE SUMTER MEETING.

We illustrate on page 260 the MASS WAR MEETING which was held in Union Square in this city on 11th inst. The following account is from the Tribune:

The Sumter rally on Saturday at Union Square was a triumphant gathering of the loyal people of the commercial metropolis. The meeting was in the concourse immense; the speeches patriotic and eloquent. The stands were erected for the occasion, and the vast accumulation of the orators and musicians, and upon each platform were flags of stars, with the stripes and bars of the Union. The magnificent statue of WASHINGTON was decked with a festoon of red, white, and blue, with ornaments, and trimmed with evergreen. The vast acreage of people pouring in from every street and at an early hour surged about the stands, forming a sea of upturned faces beaming with patriotic devotion to their country. Many of the public buildings and large offices on Broadway and other parts of the city had the National flag flying during the day. Captain Newbery and Henry Brewster made a brave pass, from which the stars and one hundred and fifty guns was fired. The police arrangements, under Inspector Carpenter, were all that could be desired, and the utmost order was preserved throughout the day. It was a magnificent mass meeting of the loyal citizens of New York, who, forgetting their party associations, and party and factious issues, made haste to show their allegiance to the flag which had been struck from its staff by rebel cannon at Fort Sumter two years ago. When the speaking commenced, Union Square presented an imposing and animated scene. Here the wicked locks of Daniel S. Dickinson were streaming in the wind, while his pungent sentences stirred the souls of his auditors with intense emotion; there Governor Morton of Indiana reasoned of the righteousness of our cause and the judgment that will come upon traitors, while Generals Frémont and Sigel, at different stands, but almost within hearing of each other, moved their hearers with a spirit of enthusiasm which was expressed in cheer upon cheer and sentiments of high commendation. Handkerchiefs and flags were waved by the fair hands of ladies who filled the doorways, windows, and balconies that border the Square, and the booming cannon seemed to give emphasis to the sentiments so splendidly applauded. The short pauses between the speeches were filled with music almost harmoniously with the momentary eloquence of the speakers.

OUR JUBILEE.

Ah, you can calmly state of that glad day
When wars tumultuous cry shall cease,
And a proud nation's veins taken up the lay
Of universal peace.

Yes, you can give that time brave welcoming,
Right royal stand among your fellow-men,
And set the echoes flying till they sing
The triumph strain again.

Why not? Your household lights still brightly burn!
You've never watched them paling on your sight,
Till reddest sparks of their fairest gleam
And faded into night.

By decoded hearth, with head bowed low,
You have not felt the heart of wife despair,
Waiting in anguish for the coming blow,
And mourn for strength in fear.

Nor yet in feverish dreams have fobby hair,
And seen your loved, with faulty-jabbing breath,
Lying on battle-field in mortal gasping pain,
Wrestling alone with death.

Nay, more than this. No hour within your life
Has held the anguish of that fearful day,
When I had only reading dooms and strife,
And knelt, but could not pray.

"Thy will!" It is an easy thing to say
When those you love most feath you your breast,
When in your arms they breathe their life away,
And sweetly sink to rest.

But oh! 'tis hard, and pallid lips are dumb,
When dear ones die afar from kindred ties;
But God forgives, and in the days that come
The sorrow sanctifies.

I'm very weak. Your words were lily said.
I'm glad your household lights have never waned;
That you have not to mourn o'er loved ones dead
Ere Freedom's heights were gained.

'Tis meet that you should rather in the hour
That gives to you the land redeemed and free,
With mirth, and shout, and cannon's mighty roar,
And song of jubilee.

But oh! I tell you, there are some that day
Who'll pray for strength rebellious thoughts to calm.
For whom will rise above victorious lay
A sad, funereal psalm:

Who'll say in tears, with lowly, drooping head,
"We can not join in song and jubilee,
And redeemed! than has our martyred dead."
Their blood hath ransomed them!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CHLOASMA, OR MOTH PATCHES

upon the face, called Moth, are very annoying, particularly to ladies of light complexion, as the discoloured spots on the skin show more strongly on them than on brunettes, but they contribute greatly in marring the beauty on either; and any thing that will remove such patches without injuring the skin in texture or color, would no doubt be considered a great achievement in medical science. Dr. B. C. FERRY, having devoted his whole time and attention to Diseases of the Skin, will guarantee to remove Moth Patches and other discolorations from the face without injury to either texture or color of the skin. His success in this, as in other branches of his specialty — DISEASES OF THE SCALP AND LOSS OF HAIR—will warrant him in guaranteeing a CURE IN EVERY CASE.

CONSTITUTION, vs.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

It is the state of the Constitution that determines the character of local diseases; and local diseases may be also traced as the cause of bringing on a proportional constitutional derangement. Hence the importance of

BRANDRETH'S PILLS

in either case is hardly to be estimated. The organs of the stomach and bowels almost seem supreme in aiding a restoration to health with their assistance.

TWENTY YEARS EXPERIENCE.

FROM THE REV. D. S. MERRITT.

New Brunswick, Jan. 5, 1857.

I am now 52 years of age. 20 years of my past life I spent in the ministry. For 20 years I have used Brandreth's Pills as my family medicine, and I wish no other. During that time I have had no occasion to call in any physician to my family, save in the sickness of my wife with children.

D. N. MERRITT.

Associate publisher of the Brunswick Fredonian.

DR. THOMAS R. HAZARD, of Portsmouth, R. I., says:

"That twenty-seven years experience with this medicine confirms his belief that in very few cases would the Physician's services be required if Brandreth's Pills were promptly used in the early stages of disease."

MR. D. J. TENNEY, the well-known Jeweler of New York, now residing at the Astor House, was cured of dyspepsia and costiveness of many years' standing by when all other medicines had failed.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS,

In dizziness and influenza, now to some extent prevailing, no safer or better medicine can be used. They are entirely vegetable and innocent, vide the testimony of Dr. Chilton, which is on file at the office, 294 Canal Street.

Just Tribute to Merit.

AT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, LONDON,
of July 1862, Class 30.

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Jurors. Commissioners' Report, page 30. Sold by grocers and manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Prepared Corn Flour" of this and other countries. Recommended by the faculty for food and luxury of the age, without a single fault. One trial will convince the most skeptical. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without isin-glass, with few eggs, at a cost astonishing the most economical. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Rolls. It is a substitute for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. It is the cream making and cream raising agent. Is put boiled in milk will produce rich Cream for coffee, chocolate, &c., &c. Is the best for infants, puddings, under the Duryea's Maizena," with directions. A most delicious article of food for children. Sold by Druggists, Fancy Goods by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Manufactured at Glen Cove, Long Island. Wholesale Depot, 166 Fulton Street.

W. DURYEA, General Agent.

AYER'S
Cherry Pectoral
For the Rapid Cure of
COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,
BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING-COUGH, CROUP,
ASTHMA, AND CONSUMPTION

This remedy has won for itself such notoriety from its cures of every variety of pulmonary disease, that it is entirely unnecessary for us to adduce evidence of its virtues in any community where it has been employed. So wide is the field of its operations, and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds with persons publicly known, who have been rescued from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of its kind is too apparent to escape observation, and where it is known its character for the cure of pulmonary maladies what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs which are incident to our climate. And not only is formidable attacks upon the lungs that it conquers, but dangerous affections of COLDS, COUGHS, HOARSENESS, &c.; and for CHILDREN, it is the pleasantest and most reliable that can be obtained.

As it has long been in constant use throughout this section, we need do more than assure the people the quality is kept up to the best that it ever has been, and that it may be relied on to aid by all Druggists and Dealers in medicine everywhere.

IRON-CLADS.

THE fight at Charleston is the third practical test of iron-clad vessels. The first was the Merrimac drama, which proved that iron-clad vessels could resist ordinary shot; that iron-clad vessels with beaks could sink wooden vessels without suffering any serious injury; and that two iron-clad vessels might fight each other at close quarters without inflicting much damage. The second was the bombardment of Fort M'Allister, which proved that iron-clads of the Monitor type can bombard a fort within easy range, and sustain a pretty heavy fire without fatal injury. The third experiment proves that these same vessels can stand the heaviest fire ever known in the history of artillery at a distance of from 300 to 750 yards without being disabled.

Of the seven Monitors which took part in the Charleston fight only two were injured to any extent. These two received blows on the turret which impeded its revolution. None of the hulls were perforated, nor did a ball go through any single turret. Not a man on board of any of them lost his life. Yet these vessels, carrying only fourteen guns, were exposed, at a distance of from 300 to 750 yards, for a period of over half an hour, to a fire of 300 heavy guns, mounted in casemate batteries and heavy earth-works, and served with precision and vigor. It is admitted on all sides that the fleet could have passed Fort Sumter had they been able to override the obstructions, consisting of stakes, nets, and other artificial barriers armed with torpedoes.

We have thus determined a most important fact in naval warfare, which is, that vessels can be constructed of iron, or with iron plating, which can run the gauntlet of any batteries in existence. This is progress, undoubtedly; but not enough has been done as yet.

While we have been building Monitors the rebels have not been idle. They have brought to perfection the science of defensive warfare, as applied to the defenses of a port. The combination of piles, stakes, nets, cordage, and torpedoes, which blocked the entry of Charleston harbor on 7th April was without precedent, and, judging it by its effects, it was a perfect success. We may note the fact as one to be treasured up for use hereafter, in the event of war with Europe; but meanwhile the much more important and immediate duty devolves upon us of discovering a means of demolishing such submarine antagonists. It was understood, before the attack on Charleston was made, that Captain Ericsson had invented a machine called a "devil," which was nothing more than a gigantic torpedo, borne on a submarine raft and fired by a submarine battery; and that this machine would quickly demolish any obstructions or torpedoes lying in the line of its fire. For some reason or other it does not appear that these "devils" were used at the attack on Charleston. Three of the four sent down to Port Royal are said to have been lost. The fourth was an inoffensive spectator of the conflict. It behooves the Navy Department to ascertain why the fourth "devil" was not called into play on 7th; and if the judgment which prevented its employment be shown to have been sound, it is incumbent on us to make such improvements in its structure as shall render it capable of performing the service for which it was intended. It is easier to blow up obstructions in a channel-way than to establish them.

The fate of the Keokuk; the injuries sustained by the Ironsides, though at a considerable distance from the rebel forts; and the deep indentations made by the Anglo-rebel shell and shot in the Monitor turrets, demonstrate clearly that an iron shield, to resist a fire of 8 or 10 inch rifled shot at close quarters, must be rather over than under ten inches of solid iron. This is far heavier plating than is worn by any iron-clad vessel afloat, except the Monitors. The French and English iron-clads, of the Warrior and La Gloire type, carry plates of from 4 to 5 inches in thickness. We presume that at a distance of 500 yards, every well-aimed rifled shot from our large guns would go through this plating as easily as an old 12-pounder, fired from an old smooth-bore gun, penetrated the wooden sides of an old three-decker. Under these circumstances one can not but admire the simplicity of the Navy Department in equipping the Roanoke for sea, at a vast expense. This vessel carries 4½ inch plating, and her sides stand 8 feet out of water. Nothing could be better conceived for a target; and a vessel like the Montauk or Passaic would probably sink her in fifteen minutes without sustaining any injury.

The lessons taught by the three practical experiments of iron-clads which we have made are these:

1st. That in future naval combats no vessel should be entered that is not iron-clad.

2d. That to be of service the plating on the exposed portion of the vessel should be not less than ten inches thick.

3d. That however iron-plating may increase the defensive power of a vessel, it does not increase its aggressive power against forts, and that—Providence being always on the side of the heaviest artillery—we can not expect to succeed if we fight 300 guns with 14; but that we must increase the number of our guns, that is to say the number of our vessels, so that when next we fight we may fire as many tons of iron as the enemy.

4th. That iron-clads are as helpless against submarine obstructions as wooden vessels, and that the explosive power of powder must be developed in some new machine, akin to Ericsson's "devils," to destroy or remove such obstructions.

THE LOUNGER.

THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

THE war so absorbs the public mind—our literature in every form is so full of it—it is so much in our hearts and mouths—that, as you ascend the staircase to the gallery of the National Academy's thirty-eighth annual exhibition, you will find yourself asking whether the noise of war has not reached the quiet studios of the painters also, and whether it will make itself felt in art, as in all other forms of life. The question will be answered almost before you have paid your annual respects to Mrs. Croker, who sits, as of old—and long may she sit—at the receipt of custom. For immediately upon your left, as you enter, three drawings in water-color arrest your eye. "Who goes there?" they all say to you by their vigor, breadth, and character, as the guard in No. 432 shouts to the appalled contraband, who drops his bundle and stick in overwhelming consternation. These pictures, Nos. 432, 434, and 435, are by Thomas Nast, an artist not unknown to the friends of this paper for the masterly sketches with which he has illuminated its pages, especially the picture in commemoration of the Emancipation Proclamation. Beside the guard there are The Intelligent Contraband and The Reliable Gentleman, both products of the rebel region. The broad-faced, humorous intelligence of the contraband, and the "gentleman," who is a characteristic specimen of the class of "gentlemen" which is produced only at the South, and seems crossed between the Yankee and the Spanish Mexican—Ichabod Crane and a guerrilla chieftain—are all fresh and living illustrations of the time; nor have we any where seen a finer type of the loyal soldier in this war—the soldier who has not forfeited his rights of a citizen, despite Governor Seymour—than the picket whose challenge so dismays the contraband. There is a charming grace and ease in all three sketches.

And indeed we may as well say at the door that the Exhibition is of an unusual general excellence. There are no very remarkable works, none that hopelessly surpass all the rest; but the average of excellence is higher. There are fewer positively bad pictures upon the walls than usual. And the gallery of smaller works is truly a "gallery of gems." The phrase is original, but we hope it will not be less acceptable for that reason. Meanwhile there are other pretty things to see in the vestibule, where Nast's sketches hang. Here, for instance, is No. 442, a bank of violets in spring, by W. H. Furness, Jun., of Philadelphia, whose portrait of his father two years since was an earnest of remarkable skill and power, and whose portrait of a lady, No. 17, in the first gallery, is one of the finest in the present exhibition. No. 270, in the last gallery—A Boy Reading—has the same thoughtful, conscientious treatment, simple and true. Mr. Furness has no apparent mannerism—no tricks to unlearn. In the vestibule, too, are a pair of butterflies, Nos. 455 and 456, painted from nature by Mr. Joseph Bridgham, who reproduces the astonishing brilliancy of the original hues with great skill and delicacy. Mr. Saintin, in No. 447, has a cabinet portrait of Kensett, the painter, whose genial aspect welcomes every comer to the rooms. Calvert Vaux, in the same room, has two plans of villas, Nos. 450 and 454, which are rich without gingerbread, and effective without niggling. Look about the vestibule. Don't suppose that there is nothing to see because it is a vestibule, or because the works are small.

The war confronts us again as we enter the large gallery and turn to the right to begin. No. 3 is a Loyal Refugee, by Vincent Colyer, who went as a teacher to North Carolina, and paints what he knows. The refugee is a slave boy escaping to our lines; and the picture opens the Exhibition with a thrill, for we remember as we look at it that the flag of the United States is at last what it was meant to be, the flag of freedom to all mankind. Bierstadt's Mountain Brook, No. 6, is charming. The mossy rocks and the smooth green water delight the study which they invite. So Sunrise at Narraganset, No. 10, by W. S. Haseltine, is more a technical study than a picture, but it has the reddish warmth of the Narraganset shore, and sparkles cheerily. Mr. Gifford's Kauterskill Clove, No. 15, attracts much attention. It is the representation of an exceptional effect of sunlight in autumn. The shaggy mountain sides are impressive, but the mind is in constant doubt about the light. So in the next section, No. 90, Mansfield Mountain, Sunset, a careful work of Mr. Gifford's, is another peculiar effect, full of splendor. But both of these pictures, and No. 385, Como, in the small gallery, are almost sensational. Such aspects of nature are so infrequent that you doubt whether you are not arrested by the novelty of the effect rather than by the accuracy of the work; and when they are constantly selected by a painter they become a mannerism. Thus No. 385 would be recognized any where as a Gifford, not by its real merit, but by a purely mannered treatment. On the other hand, his No. 409, in the same room, Baltimore, 1862, Twilight—one of the pictures of the war, in which the painter has taken his part—is to us the most pleasing of his works in the Exhibition. The solemn figure of the sentry against the bright evening red—the spires and domes of the distant city—the guns and piles of balls—and the long line of the parapet, are simply and exquisitely done. The picture is a poem. Mr. Gifford is a painter of so much talent that he can do nothing ill; but is he not too fond of a superficial effect, while he has all the power necessary for the simplest and truest impression?

Mr. John Lafarge's Flowers in a Lacquer Bowl, No. 21, are admirable. The moist, rich, crisp fullness of a mat of blossoms is broadly and beautifully done. In No. 53 we have Healy's portrait of the poet Longfellow. It is a capital likeness, and painted with great force. Healy has two other portraits of the heroic size and treatment, No. 181, Dr. O. A. Brownson, and No. 195, The Archbishop of Baltimore. If they were both priests we should say leonine and feline. Certainly the doughty Doctor looks like a very battering-ram of the Church. But his intrinsic good-humor shines and sparkles through the strength. The three are very effective portraits. No. 87, A Lady, is a portrait by Mr. Stone, whose skill in handling is mingled with a certain rich and luxurious taste which makes his portraits as picturesque as Sir Peter Lely's. If, standing before the picture, the Lounger throws down his glove and says that no Lely portrait of Charles's court is lovelier than this, even to the rippling love-locks, who will dare pick it up? Will it be some one who puts June roses and muslin and blue ribbons against elaborate coiffure, rich stuffs, pearls, and the dainty fan, and therefore declares for No. 112? It is called A Morning Walk, by Thomas Hicks, and is one of the brightest and best of his works. A girl in a garden, not

"Queen rose of the rose-bud garden of girls,"

but a day lily rather, clad in the airiest muslin, with a thin trickle of blue ribbon around her neck; fresh, dewy, buoyant, swinging with lithe grace into the morning air. Let him who will quarrel with the hands in this portrait. They shall not unclasp for him, and he had better betake himself out of the spring sunshine into No. 111, The Last Days of October, by J. R. Brevoort, where the brightness is the hectic of death. It is one of the many autumn pictures in the Exhibition; Mr. Whittley's Autumn, New Jersey, No. 121, is another, near by. They are both characteristic scenes and pleasant pictures. Mr. Kensett, in No. 123, Morning in the White Mountains, shows that clear, masterly, healthy vigor and exquisite feeling which keep him still pre-eminent. A lichened mossy crag, sharp cut against the sky, rises from the foliage. The broad daylight, the ample air, the careful and delicate leaf-work, the hard, gray rock, and the pervasive firmness and fineness of handling, make Mr. Kensett characteristically represented by this single work. This is true, also, of Elliott in No. 143, and of Huntington, President of the Academy, in No. 137. Trees that every year bear good fruit do not need the fostering attention due to saplings, so we pass on. But if No. 152, Marching Along, by J. G. Brown, be the blossom of a sapling, what delicious fruit we shall have by-and-by! It is one of the most charming pictures in the Exhibition. A procession of children are marching over a rustic bridge, escorting perhaps a Queen of May, whom Uncle Kuhleborn will surely seize from beneath the plank. The variety of artless and bewitching expression, from the rapt sweetness of the flower-crowned maid to the little hind-captain in petticoats, with his solemn effort to share the fun, is delightful. The spirit of the scene is in Emerson's musical and beautiful lines,

"With children forward and behind,
Like Cupids studiously inclined;
And he, the chieftain, paced beside
The centre of the troop allied,
With sunny face of sweet repose.
To guard the babe from fancied foes,
The little captain innocent
Took the eye with him as he went;
Each village senior paused to scan
And speak the lovely caravan."

In this room, also, is one of the large landscapes of the Exhibition, Gibraltar, No. 136, by S. Colman, Jun. It is an open, placid, daylight portrait of the famous rock, a historic landscape. Huntington's Ichabod Crane and Katrina Van Tassel, No. 146, is fully in the delightfully humorous spirit of the story, and Gray's Pride of the Village, No. 128, is a charming pendant. Any lover of Irving would be very lucky in owning the two pictures, interesting not only from their subjects, drawn from his pages, but from the association of the two painters and friends, the President and Vice-President of the Academy. Near by, No. 130, is a small picture of Gray's, America in 1862. A kneeling manly figure of a slave looks up into the eyes of the genius of America, who breaks his chains with one hand and offers him a sword with the other. The motto of the State of Virginia might well be engraved beneath it, Sic semper tyrannis. Mr. Gray deserves the earnest thanks of every worthy American for the noble aspect which he has given to the slave—a fine foreshadowing of the benediction of Justice to a race called to resume its manhood. In No. 157, Mr. William Morgan, a name unknown to us hitherto, has a portrait group, figures of cabinet size, with an interior. Of one of the likenesses, at least, we can speak in high praise.

But we must turn abruptly from the third section of the large gallery, looking in as we go upon the collection in the "Small Gallery." Here No. 240, the Bridge of Sighs, by Charles Parsons, is a most poetic and admirable picture. The weird dim arches of the bridge, with the dimmer arches of other bridges in the murky distance, the dreary silence of the water level, and the vague confused roar of the city far above; a blankness and heavy sadness every where, as if the tragic death stirred the air into dull gloom, as the body and rocking boat ripple the river into faint waves, are full of pathos. In this little picture Mr. Parsons has modestly dared, and succeeded. It is not unworthy its subject; and the line of the poem of Hood's which he has placed in the catalogue does not extinguish the impression of his work.

"All that remains of her now is pure womanly."

The poem itself is the complement of Burns's "A man's a man for a' that." For it says, with infinite pathetic tenderness, a woman's a woman for a' that. The interest of the picture lies in the sentiment of the whole scene rather than in the figures; and it is one of the most truly imaginative works in the collection. This room deserves a separate notice, which it shall surely have. But meanwhile we must mention Mr. Hennessy's three exquisite little pictures Nos. 323, 334, and 361, and Mr. Winslow Homer's Nos. 255, and 371. The two last are incidents of the camp, treated with perfect spirit and freshness. No. 371, Home, Sweet Home, was marked "for sale" in the catalogue on the first day. But on the second it was labeled "sold." It is a little work of real feeling; soldiers in camp listening to the evening band, and thinking of the wives and darlings far away. There is no strained effect in it, no sentimentality, but a hearty, homely actuality, broadly, freely, and simply worked out. We beg the visitor to the Exhibition not to be confused by the multitude of small works in this room, but to take our word for it that he will be repaid by giving plenty of time to them. It is a collection as full of promise and cheer for American art as any we have ever seen.

Next week we will make another tour through the Gallery.

FROM A DIARY.

THE young gentleman known as the Marquis of Hartington shows his hand. I was reading his speech this morning, when James T—— looked over my shoulder and asked me whether I had any doubt now that he wore the rebel badge at the Fifth Avenue ball by deliberate design?

"It certainly looks bad for him," I answered.

"And how does it look for the ball?" he asked.

"What do you mean?"

"Why, that a man who has no other claim to attention whatever than that he is the son of an English duke insults host and guests and is allowed to remain in the house."

"Ah, yes."

"Yes; and that isn't the worst of it."

"No?"

"Not at all. I do not forget that he was rebuked by a young officer who knew, if nobody else did, that he ought to have been shown the door. Yes, and there was more than one guest who thought the same. The young men of New York did not mean to suffer the insult to pass unnoticed; but they deferred to the claim of the officer, who declared that it was his right to reprove him. But doesn't it seem to you that the host had a certain duty in the case?"

"Undoubtedly."

"If a gentleman at a party gets drunk and begins to sing an indecent song, the host is the proper person to expel him."

"Undoubtedly."

"Wasn't this a thousandfold more insolent insult?"

"It certainly was. And as you were there, and I wasn't, just tell me, did the host censure this man?"

"Not that I am aware. But he felt aggrieved with the young officer for making trouble."

"Indeed!"

"Yes. And didn't he try to salve the wound to the susceptibilities of this English offender, by asking him to dine the next day or soon afterward?"

"Such is the story here at the club."

"Didn't he reproach the young American officer for his conduct?"

"So I hear."

"Well, now, the young Englishman goes home and says that we don't know when we are beaten; that the Union is dissolved; and repeats all the rest of the British slang about us, doesn't he?"

"I have just read it."

"Who ought, then, to be aggrieved, the host who was angry that the lord wasn't allowed to show his colors unrebuked, or the young officer who was resolved that he shouldn't?"

"If you put me on my honor, I say that the event justifies the young man, because it is now clear that the rebel badge was willingly worn."

"What reparation can be made him?"

"He needs none from all generous and loyal men. They have always applauded his conduct. And I think that the host owes him his warmest thanks for preventing his house being known as a place where an Englishman could insult this country unrebuked."

As we were speaking old ——, who plays whist at the Disunion Club, joined us.

"Pooh, pooh!" said he, "what business is it of ours? It was in a private house."

"That indeed," answered James T——; "but it was a public insult, and the whole country knows it. While such things happen it is no wonder that the London Times and all foreigners and rebels suppose that we are not in earnest. If the war is a joke, it is no matter whether every Englishman in the city wears the rebel badge or not. But if it be earnest, and the thousands who have lost friends, sons, husbands, brothers, fathers, and lovers think it is, any man who tolerates such an offense insults them all, and secures further slaughter by encouraging the rebels and their friends to believe that we shall presently come to terms. Of course this young Englishman has said to every body he meets, 'Oh, it's a mere game of brag! Why, I wore a rebel badge in the finest society in New York, among the very people who subscribed heavily for the war two years ago; and when a young fellow in a uniform talked big about it the host was vexed with him, and blamed him the next day. No, no. The war is only a jolly sham with the people at the North. It is real only with the Confederates.'"

Old ——, who plays whist at the Disunion Club, grunted and left us.

THE ACCOUNT WITH ENGLAND.

THE public interest is constantly turned to our relations with England. The unequivocal statement of the British Government by the mouth of Lord Palmerston that it will not be driven by any cry which may be raised "to come down to this House with a proposal to alter the law" is a distinct declaration that it will furnish no remedy for the wrong it commits.

What, then, is the wrong? That ships are built and armed and manned in the ports of a friendly neutral to prey upon our commerce; and that already they have almost driven trade from American bottoms. Our claim is, that a frank and fair enforcement of her own neutrality act would obviate the complaint: and that, beyond her own laws, the law of nations forbids the offense.

To this perfectly plain statement the reply of England is quibbling, evasive, and confused. The Solicitor-General says that the offense if committed is an infraction of municipal law merely, and that it is at the option of British to enforce it or not. If we wish to complain we may do so, and if we can bring sufficient legal evidence the British Government will probably allow the proceedings.

We answer that a friendly power will not hesitate, under such grave circumstances as those of this war, to detain ships upon suspicion as we did during the Crimean war: and that when she stands out upon purely technical grounds, when the moral proof is overwhelming to all the world, she reveals a disposition which is not friendly.

Thereupon the British Government replies that so sell and fit a vessel of war is no more unfriendly than to sell guns and ammunition to either party. To which the reply is conclusive that the English laws themselves make a difference, which is recognized by international law, and by the very action of the British Government, which, at the last moment, and of course too late, sent to stop the Alabama. When merchants sell goods they are seen at the option of the buyer; but when a ship-builder like Mr. Laird builds ships for a purpose of which Mr. Laird does not even pretend ignorance, and which is to prey upon the commerce of a friendly power, there is a breach not only of the municipal, but of international, law. And, as the London Daily News remarks, it is for the Solicitor-General to answer why Mr. Laird, after his open confession of guilt, was not punished by the Government and not by the proclamation of neutrality the Queen warned her subjects against "violating or contravening either the law of nations of the realm in matters of neutrality, or the law of nations in relation thereto."

The case is very simple. Our commerce is ruined by ships built in England, manned in England, armed in England, coaling from English ports, entering our English ports, flying only the English flag until just at the moment of sinking, when they run up the rebel flag. It is no more treason, in a national flag, by any government in the world, than a red bandana handkerchief. We respectfully represent the facts. The Prime Minister smirks, the Solicitor-General twiddles his thumbs, and says that his Government can not help it. Are we not driven to ask how we can help it ourselves? If the difficulty lies in English laws which the Government will not execute, or in the law of nations, which it chooses to interpret to the result for us is the same. Our ships are hunted from the sea, and our commerce is transferred to British vessels. The question, then, for this nation merely to consider when, and in what way, it will be most wise for it to defend itself.

EDWARD EVERETT DIFFUSING "SOUND POLITICAL INFORMATION."

MR. EDWARD EVERETT has recently made a speech which we commend to the attention of Mr. G. Tickner Curtis, Mr. James Brooks, and other Bell-Everett orators of the Democratic organization for diffusing sound political information. One passage in it is especially addressed to people who hold with Mr. G. Tickner Curtis that this war is waged unconstitutionally:

"But it may be asked again, how can we support an Administration which openly assumes that the war is unconstitutional? I should certainly be a very unthinkful pupil of the political school in which I was trained if I did not never lose the sacred name of the Constitution justly invoked without respect, or yield to it any thing less than implicit obedience. It is, however, as great a duty to respect to it where it does not apply, as to disregard it where it does apply. I must say that the only case in which I feel history ought to teach us caution in this respect; for from the formation of the Government in 1789 to the present day there has not been an important controverted measure—no, not one—which its party opponents have not denounced as unconstitutional. It is to one of the articles of the wording echoed that the Government of the United States is not a constitutionally war power, but only a sovereign State. But how if the sovereign State strikes the first blow, fires on your vessels, bombards and batters your forts, threatens your capital, and invades the loyal members of the Union who refuse to join in the war of opposition?

"Few, I suppose, will doubt that the United States may constitutionally wage a war of self-defense against a foreign enemy, domestic or foreign. But in waging this war of self-defense we are not, in the opinion of many statesmen on whom I have usually acted and whose judgment I greatly respect, go beyond the powers specially granted by the Constitution to the General Government for the purposes of ordinary administration in time of peace. This opinion seems to me to rest on a misconception of the position under which war is waged. The Constitution authorizes Congress to declare war, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, and to clothe the President with the power of Commander-in-Chief. It goes no further. It prescribes nothing as to the enemy against whom, the measures by which, nor the ends for which the war may be carried on. It gives no more power to carry on war with a foreign State than with a domestic State; and it is as absurd, as the subject of British criticism, to speak of raising the cotton or of emancipating the slaves of a district in rebellion, as the rights of war in the one case or the other. Unquestionably, in some respects the higher code of international law, as applied to the Government of the United States alone, but all civilized governments are governed by that august code all unjust wars are forbidden, and all unjust modes of carrying on war, however necessary they may be to the enemy or what the pretext: while, by the same code, all just wars, and admittedly all wars of self-defense, and all its warlike measures sanction alby our Christian civilization, are lawful, not merely as far as they may be expressly prohibited by municipal law of our own country."

Mr. Everett then supposes that misunderstanding with Spain had led to war, and that Florida had tried to secede to her, and carry Key West, Fort Pickens, and the Tortugas—and he asks:

"Would any one doubt that the United States could, without violating the Constitution, invade Florida, in order to recover the public property, the islands, the forts, and the national establishments thus seized: to rout the enemy: to chastise those acts of hostility to the National Government, and to take effectual security that they should not be repeated? Would not the Government of the United States, without violating the Constitution, be authorized to occupy for the same purpose the ports of Cuba? Would not the arming and employing of the slaves in the forts and arsenals seized by the enemy, and acquainted with the country, be as legitimate on one side of the Gulf of Florida as on the other? and would not their employment under the authority of the United States, and the control and direction of its officers, instead of leading to a servile war and the massacre of the unarmed and defenseless out which humanity revolts, be the surest means of preventing such barbarities, and reducing this frightful element of danger within the limits of Christian warfare?

"COLD AND UNFRIENDLY NEUTRALITY."

In the recent debate upon the Alabama in the British Parliament John Bright, after exposing the fearful consequences that were building in England for the rebels, described the attitude of British Ministers as "a cold and cruel and I will say unfriendly neutrality." Lord Palmerston, in closing the debate, surpassed his customary insolence. He asserted with the utmost complacency of a peer the ordinary "political capital" of this country. He said that a nation which had set aside its own laws and violated the law of nations was unwise to do the same. And he spoke of the Government as "the Northern Union," although he knows that the United States will by no means recognize, of which he is the head, his treaties of amity and commerce in the United States, both North and South. The British Government in this country are accustomed to speak with the utmost bitterness and contempt of Mr. Seward's tone toward England as insolent. But all the insolence that can be found in all the speeches Mr. Seward ever made, or in all the letters he ever wrote, will be surpassed by the haughty and intolerable tone of this one speech of Palmerston's. It was a cool, deliberate, and public insult to the whole United Britain; and in its way it does as much mischief as the pirates whom it excuses.

But it is evident that Mr. Bright Lord Palmerston laid himself open to a thrust which Bright spared him. The gentleman, said Lord Palmerston, "who did a certain thing [Bright] was a friend, I do not know what the meaning of those terms may be; but they appear to me to be a contradiction in terms" (laughter and cheers, hear, hear.) If nothing is more than friendly toward one party it is something very different toward the other party (laughter and cheers), and seems to be what in common parlance is meant by neutrality between contending parties."

Precisely so, Mr. Bright might have replied that is just what I say. British neutrality is cold and unfriendly toward the Government which we have treaties, and which is a recognized power in the world; and it is something very different toward the belligerent power which refuses to be or to not recognize, whose flag is unknown to us, with which we have no treaty, and which is not acknowledged by any nation in the world. And this is British neutrality! This is the neutrality which the Prime Minister of England calls "honest and sincere"—the two most conspicuous words for the truth that the English language furnishes.

FOREIGN WAR.

THE speech of the Postmaster-General at the first Sunter meeting in New York was interesting for its unreserved statement of the opinions of the English nations held by the Cabinet. The substance of his remarks was that England is a despotic power, and has no sympathy with citizens of a about ready to take up arms for it; and that, under the present circumstances, we ought to avoid giving her a pretext for war. The Postmaster-General, he said, the plan of the New York merchants who sent food to Lancashire rather than General Butler's plan of relieving operatives.

Certainly the feeling between the two countries is very inflammable; and, as we have already said, it is not strange up the moment with England, it is for this nation to decide how it may most wisely and most efficiently protect itself from that great Britain. The complacent reiterations by British papers and politicians of their honest neutrality, to be indicative of the unfriendly way in which to regard any other attention. But we are not to forget that prudence is often the highest heroism. We must not forget, either, that war between America and England would be a misfortune for mankind. We must remember that if John Bull swaggers and talks like the bully, he does not fight like the bully, and every honorable man will be very slow to commit extreme measures until every peaceful means of self-defense is exhausted.

But the danger of war is evident from the enormous stake of the British people in the commerce she is on trial quite as much as we. The victory of this Government is a blow to every mercantile power in Europe. The British Government, whose system move overwhelming than years of peace could be, for during peace the monarchy has only to say, "Fact with the navy." But during war, to triumph is the vindication of John Bright and his friends against the haughty Tyrrism of Britain, of the plan of maintaining the commercial power by liberty and equality against privilege.

But while this is the British political and social interest in our war, the international stake is not less. Emerging victorious from this struggle our flesh compose the most powerful State in the world. The sceptre of the seas drops from the senile grasp of Britain. Whoever may be mistress of the seas in any future war, the power that is lord of formidable marine account unsettled between us.

To see us destroyed in the first flush of our youth has been the desire of the British governing class, the instinct of her nobles and her merchants. The young Hurrigton, who did not refuse to insult his friend and all his people when they were in trouble, announces upon his return home the conviction, sprung from his instinctive desire, that we shall be ruined; while Laird, the shipbuilder, speaking for another interest, boasts in Parliament of his disobedience to British laws in order to help on that ruin, while British law-makers eagerly listen and loudly applaud.

To secure the fulfillment of this wish Mr. Blair thinks that England would easily allow herself to be drawn into armed assistance of the rebellion. Such an impression is given by the Postmaster-General of the Cabinet, who is supposed to be most allied with Mr. Seward, added to our own knowledge of the spirit and acts of the British Government, should lead us to the utmost careful preparation and consideration. No American citizen can really wish a war with England; but it is the duty of every one to contemplate the chance; to act moderately and calmly; neither to fear war nor to provoke it; and to bear in mind that neither a wise man nor nation grows by uncomfortable pressure.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION.

THE publication of this important work, which has been long announced, has at last commenced. The first part is issued, and the work will be regularly continued. The great resources of a great publishing house will be lavished upon it. The accuracy, completeness, and comprehensiveness of its illustrations, including portraits of all the civil and military leaders, some of which, like that of General Scott, are the very finest specimens of wood-engraving, with the most effective sketches of places and events drawn upon the spot, and elaborate facsimiles of important documents, make it an invaluable pictorial gallery; while the ability, the care, the patient research and laborious collation devoted to the preparation of the text, are the earnest of a complete and satisfactory chronicle.

Of course, a history of the rebellion written simultaneously with the events it records is of the most difficult character; but as it is to represent the philosophy of the war. Its chief merit must be sought in the fidelity, and clearness, and picturesqueness of its narrative, and these will be entirely independent of the historian's views of the occult causes of the occurrence he describes. "Alison's History of Europe" and "Jaquettan's War," rather than Gibbon's "Decline and Fall," are the model of such a work. What we demand of the author is comprehensive knowledge of events and a skillful presentation of them. Any man's judgment of the causes of a contemporary civil war will be colored by his previous political relations. The issue now brought to the decision of the sword in this country is one that has been already fiercely debated. The debate has extended through a generation. Every citizen during that generation has taken his side. The question regarded the question from his political, partisan, social, personal, and moral convictions. Of these he can in no event disembarrass himself. They control the origin of the war. But this discussion, however essential to the completeness of such a work, is necessarily that of a philosophical historian. The rock properly begins where this discussion ends.

Of the general justice of the preliminary view contained in Mr. Headley's Introduction to Harper's History, that the war sprang from the intrinsic aggressive nature of slavery, there can be no doubt whatever. The author seems to us entirely unjust in his estimate of the scope and character of "Abolitionism." It is as impossible to identify the Abolitionists with the rebels as to calling Methodists ranters. But while we differ upon this point it is all the pleasanter to commend the sincerity, the vigor, the grasping and sequence of events, the copious and exact detail, and the literary elegance, precision, and skill with which the author has set out upon in the second number. We can not well fancy a more welcome monthly visitor to the hundreds of thousands of patriots thrilling to the heart that Harper's Pictorial History of the Great Rebellion.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WANTED—A fifer and drummer to beat time for the "Star-Spangled Banner." A good audience to trim the "tune of other days." A ring that will fit the "finger of scorn;" a loose pulley to run on the "mark of envy;" and a now "Yankee Doodle" for the Government."

A TALE OF WOE.—I clasped her tiny hand in mine; I clasped her bouncess form; I vowed to shield her from the world, and from the world's cold cruelty. She set her bankrupt eye on me; the tears did wibby flow; and with the little that I had I parted from you, for you had not a cent.

"AH!" said a phrenologist, gazing on a fine expanse of forehead, "there's a development! I see what Nature has done for him; he's evidently laid out for a lawyer."

The following note actually passed between two celebrated constables: "Dear Sir,—send me a shilling; To which his friend replied: "Dear Sir,—I have but a half, and this the wife's old coin. She set her business eye on me; the tears did wibby flow; and with the little that I had I parted from you, for you had not a cent.

The late Earl Dudley is said to have wound up a tribute on the character of a deceased friend with these words: "He was a good man—an excellent man; he had the best mahogany sideboard I ever saw in my life."

An old angler says that no one by merely conversing with a fish ever succeeded in catching it one.

A pert fellow was talking the quarter-deck of one of his men-of-war with his hat on, a sailor asked his master if he might speak to him. "Why do you ask me that, my admiral?" "Why, it's the King." "Well, King, or no King, you must not speak to either," he answered. "Lord, where should he learn manners?" replied Jack; "he was never aboard of a ship in his life."

A lady put to sale a prodigate to the famous Robert, Earl of Oxford. "Why, and I have been in all the jails in the kingdom." "While do you want me, pray, that recall?" asked the Earl. "Your lordship has been in the Tower, and I have been in every other."

A periodical has started not long ago, the first number of which contained a letter from a correspondent who signed himself "A Constant Reader."

A gentleman who had been spending the evening with a few friends, looking at his watch just after midnight, said, "It is tomorrow morning—I must bid you good-night, gentlemen."

An individual was arrested the other day while endeavoring to pick a gentleman's pocket. He said he would used to the business, and was just trying to "get his hand in."

"Your horse seems to make up faces at having that thing put in his mouth," said a youngster who sat Foote put his face into a grimace after feeding him. "Oh no," said Foote, "he don't mind it a bit."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

THERE is nothing new from General Hooker's army. Some general orders have been issued relative to the affairs of regiments whose term of enlistment is about to expire.

THE REBELS AT SUFFOLK.

Our troops at Suffolk have had a brisk time of it late. The enemy have been pressing them closely, and an attack upon our lines has been looked for, from hour to hour, for some days past. On 18th we made a demonstration which developed the rebels. General Peck's dispatch of 19th announces that "General Getty, in conjunction with the gunboats, under Lieutenant Lamson, has just returned from a heavy battery at the West Branch, and captured six guns and a full blood of the Forty-fourth Alabama regiment. They crossed in boats. The Eighty-ninth New York and the Eighth Connecticut were in the engagement."

GENERAL FOSTER AT NEWBERN.

General Foster has succeeded in passing the rebel blockade in the sound at Newbern, with the loss of the pilot-boat and several wounded. The Ellanor was riddled by at least forty shots. General Foster was heartily received at Newbern. His force is Washington, North Carolina, is still there.

THE SIEGE OF WASHINGTON-HAIRED.

The enemy have retreated from their position around the town of Washington, after a siege of three weeks. Their batteries on Tar River have been abandoned. General Foster left Newbern on the 18th for Washington, North Carolina, with a brigade from Hilton Head, to relieve his army, but it is not probable that he will require this reinforcement to compel the enemy to retire.

MOVEMENTS AT VICKSBURG.

A dispatch from Jackson, Mississippi, to Richmond states that a force of rebels crossed from Providence to Milliken's Bend, on the 16th, and attacked our pickets. With the single exception of the Fifty-fourth Massachusetts, which fought like veterans—the fleet passed gallantly through the fire of the batteries. Between 2 and 3 o'clock next morning the enemy were running down. On reaching Warrenton Admiral Porter bombarded their works, with what effect is not known.

GENERAL BANKS AT WORK.

The campaign in Louisiana has been gloriously opened by General Banks. The rebel forces under Taylor's army have been completely hemmed in by the armies of General Banks and Admiral Farragut. Farragut's army are abandoning his position near Brashear City, leaving his heavy artillery behind him. The fine ram Queen of the West was retaken in Grand Lake by our troops, and the rebel ram Webb was run ashore and burned in Red Bay. The capture of the steamer Diana, lately edured by the rebels, is also announced. The rebel State steamer Cleifton having removed the obstructions in the river and coming down the Teche.

A FIGHT IN ARKANSAS.

The rebels made a determined attack on Fayetteville, Arkansas, on the 18th, in force of three thousand men, but they were gallantly repulsed by our troops, who only numbered fifteen hundred in all, and some of them unarmed. The fight lasted four hours, and although our troops were greatly outnumbered, they drove the rebels at our pieces of artillery, the latter were driven back toward Van Buren in disorder. They were commanded by General Cabell. Our forces were in charge of Colonel Harrison.

THE FOOD QUESTION.

Jefferson Davis has issued an address to the people of the Southern Confederacy, urging them to devote their agricultural labor to the production of food. He says that although the rebels are on half rations of meat there is plenty of it in the country, but that a difficulty exists as to its transportation, which is now about to be remedied.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The papers publish a letter from General Corcoran relative to his shooting Lieutenant-Colonel Kimball. The General gives the account of the affair substantially as alleges that Lieutenant-Colonel Kimball was not on duty at the time, and was justified in shooting Corcoran to arrest the progress of his commanding officer, who was in the performance of his duty, in visiting the troops. General Corcoran, while regretting the disaster, states that the attack was made upon him without the action which he took an imperative necessity.

THE 22D OF FEBRUARY.

The anniversary of the great uprising day of 1861 was commemorated on 22th in an appropriate manner by a meeting of the Loyal Leagues, at Metropolitan Hall, over which Lieutenant-General Scott presided. It was a large and enthusiastic meeting. In the city during the memorable 22d of April two years ago

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE REBEL LOAN.

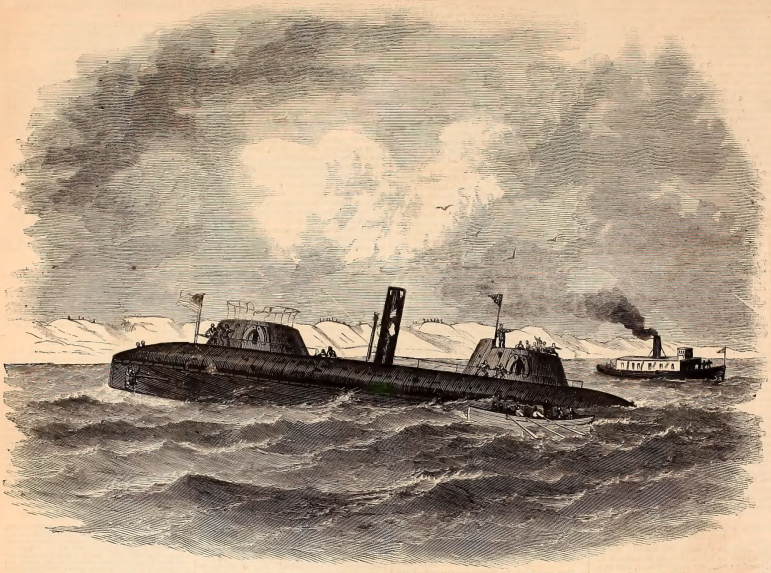
The rebel cotton loan sustained a very heavy collapse in England on the 18th, in consequence of the suspension of J. S. Spencer, of Liverpool. It was thought that Mr. Spencer was the only agent of the rebels in England. The amount was consequently quoted at from one and a half to two and a half discount.

THE ANGLO-REBEL FLEET.

On the 6th of April one of the rebels' surveyors at Liverpool found the Alexandra, a small gun-boat recently launched for the rebels, at Mr. Miller's dock. She was ordered on the instructions received by Mr. Pierce Edwards, who is supposed to be the rebel agent, and the reason to believe that the Alexandra was being fitted for the rebel service at Nassau or Bermuda.

A letter called the Japan or Virginia, supposed to be fitted for the rebel service, was launched from the yard of Laird, Scotland. The Government had ordered her detention; but she hailed the vigilance of the officials.

POLAND.



THE REBELLION.

The revolution in Poland is gaining fresh spirit, and extending. Longjewitz has been conveyed from Cracow to Morawia. In Swato and other districts the nobility, middle classes, and peasantry have risen en masse against the Czar. The insurgents have addressed a manifesto to the people, declaring that they are resolved to fight to the death. A Circassian chief landed in Courland with a well-appointed force, and has joined the insurgents. The Russians have also endangered a British steamer at Memel for having a despatch on board for the Polish Government. It is said that the Czar of Russia will grant an autonomy to Poland, but will not sanction a national Polish army.

MEXICO.

DEFEAT OF THE FRENCH.

We have news of a defeat of the French army at Puebla, after a desperate contest with the valiant Mexican General Ortega. The attack was made on the 17th ult. The French attacked the fort by the 1st line, on the side that the French then held the outer works at Puebla, but it soon met fifteen thousand of the enemy and severely repulsed on the 18th of March, and compelled to retire.

CHAPTER V.

MRS. DODD knew her man (ladies are very apt to fathom their male acquaintance—too apt, I think), and, to pin him to the evil-minded theme which interested her, seized the opportunity while he was in actual contact with Julia's wrist, and vainly enumerated her symptoms, and who told him what Mr. Osmond had said about Hyperæsthesia.

"Goose Greece!" barked Sampson, loud, clear, and sharp as an irritated watch-dog; but this one bow-wow vented, he was silent as abruptly.

Mrs. Dodd smiled, and proceeded to Hyperæmia, and thence to the Antiphlogistic Regimen.

At that unhappy adjective, Sampson jumped up, cast away his patient's hand, forgot her existence—she was but a charming individual—and galloped into his native region, Generalities.

"Antiphlogistic! Mai—dear—mad'm, that one long fragment of ass's jaw has slain a million. Adapted to the weakness of human nature, which receives with rivirince ideas, however childish, that come draped in long-coated and exotic words, that ansinuine polysyllable has riconciled the modern mind to the chimeras of th' ancients, and outmatched the gallipot, the musket, and the sword: ay, and but for me

Had barred the door
To disturbers more, on the great coming sceince, the sceince of healing diseases instead of defiming, and dividing 'em, and bapthening their names and their remidies, and shortening nothing but the pashint.

Th' antiphlogistic Theory is this: That disease is fiery, and that any artificial exhaustion of vital force must cool the system, and reduce the morbid fire, called, in their donkey Latin, 'flamma,' and in their compound donkey Latin, 'inflammation,' and, in their Goose Greece, 'phlogosis,' 'phlogosus,' etc. And accordingly th' antiphlogistic Practice is, to cool the sick man by bleeding him, and, when bild, either to robbed him with a change of instrument, bite and suck instid of gashes, or else to rake the bild, and then blister the bild and raked, and then push mercury till the teeth of the bild, raked, and blistered, shake in their sockets, and to starve the bild, purged, salivated, blistered wretch from first to last. This is the Antiphlogistic system. It is seldom carried out entire, because the pashint at the first or second link in their sausage-chain, expires; or else gives such plain signs of sinking, that even these ass-ass-ins take fright, and try f' undo their own work, not destroy it, by tonics an' turtle, and stimulants; which things given at the right time instid of the wrong, given when the pashint was merely weakened by his disorder, and not enfeebled by their dildy remidies, would have cut th' ailment down in a few hours."

"Dear me!" said Mrs. Dodd; "and now, my good friend, with respect to my daughter—"

"N' list me!" clashed Sampson; "ye're goen to fathom th' antiphlogistics, since they still survive an' slay in holes and corners like Barkton an d'Ily; I've driven the vamperes out o' the cintres o' civilisation. Begin with their coolers! Exhaustio. is not a cooler, it is a feverer, and they know it: the way parrots know sentences. Why are we all more or less feverish at night? because we are weaker. Starvation is no cooler, it is an inflamer, and they know it, as parrots know truths, but can't apply them: for they know that burning fever rages in every town, street, camp, where Famine is. As for blood-letting, their prime cooler, it is inflammatory; and they know it (parrot-wise), for the thumping heart, and bounding pulse, of pashints bild by butchers in black, and bullocks bild by butchers in blue, prove it; and they have recorded this in all their books; and they have bild, and, and starved, and mercuried, and murdered, on. But mind ye, all their sham coolers are real weakened f' under their bild; inverted Sahra and his brimstin lake among their refrigirators), and this is the point whence t' appreciate their imbecility, and the saivice I have rendered mankind in bean the first t' attack their banded school, at a time it seemed impiganble."

"Ah, this promises to be very interesting," sighed Mrs. Dodd; "and before you enter on so large a field, perhaps it would be as well to dispose of a little matter which lies at my heart. Here is my poor daughter—"

"Nanneed. A woman Bean is in a constant state of flux and reflux; his component particles move, change, disappear, and are renewed; his life is a round of exhaustion and repair. Of this repair, the brain is the sovereign ajint by night and day; and the blood the great living material; and digestion the only indispensible supply. And this balance of exhaustion and repair is too nice to tamper with; dint a single sleepless night, or dispirited day, write some pallor on the face, and tell against the bodily f' to loss a single day's supply of nutrimint, a trifling diary, or a cut finger, though it takes but half an ounce of blood out of the system. And what is the cause of that rare disease that occurs only to pashints that can't afford dorking —Dith from old age? Think ye the man really overcomes mother years, or is worn down by Time? Nay, you's just Potry an Bosh. Navshins have been thinned by the lancet, but river by the scythy and years are forces, but noi-sances of evinite. No, Centenarius decays and dies, bekase his bodily expinditure goes on; and his bodily income lessens by failure of the generative and reproductive forces. And now suppose bodily exhaustion and repair were a mere matter of pecuniary, bodily, of vital, economy — what would you say to the steward, or housekeeper, who, to balance your accounts and keep you solvint, should open every known channel of expinditure with one hand, and with the other—stop the supplies? Why this is how I would describe the fatcity centuries have burned th' human candle at both ends, yet wondered the light of life expired under their hands."

"It seems irrational. Then in my daughter's case you would—"

"Lookee! A pashint falls sick. What haps directly? Why the balance is troubled, and exhaustion exceeds repair. For proof, obsairve the buddy when Disease is on the rise.

And you will always find a loss of flesh.

To put it ecconomikly, and then you must understand it, bean a housekeeper—

When cash is scarce, or expensive, the gallicdint, Blood, and Goose Greece; imagines him a fiery pervaild, though the common sense of mankind through its unprejudiced experience, pronounces him, what he is and looks, an 'invalid,' gashes him with a lancet, spills out the purest liquid mankind knows, the blood, the galicdint, and fells this weak man, wounded now, and pale, and fainting, with Dith stamped on his face, to the earth, like a fine young oak, or a neighbored ox. If the weak man, wounded thus and weakened, survives, then the chartered Thugs who have drained him by the long-hole, turn to and drain him by the spigot; they rake him, and then blister him, and then salivate him; and lest Nature should have the ghost of a chance to counter-balance these frightful outrages, they keep strong meat and drink out of his system emptied by their stabs, bites, purges, mercury, and blisters; damdijits! And that, think ye, was the system that Medicine from Hippocrates to Sampsin; Antiphlogistic is but a modern name for an ass-ass-inating routine which has niver varied a hair since scholastic medicine, the silliest and dullest of all the hundred forms of Quackery, first rose—unlike Science, Art, Religion, and all true Sins—in the West; to wound the sick; to weaken the weak; and mutilate the hurt; and—Then Mankind!"

The voluable impatter of his own profession delivered these last two words in thunder so sudden and elative as to make Mrs. Dodd work out of her hands. But here, as in Nature, a moment's pause followed the thunder-clap; so Mrs. Dodd, who had long been severely watching her opportunity, smothered a shriek, and edged in a word: "This is irresistible; you have confuted every one of their hearts' content: and now the question is, what course shall we substitute?" She meant, "in the great case, which occupies us." But Sampson attached a nobler, wider, sense to her query.

"What course? Why the great Chronobarimetal gramaw, based on the recurrent and febrile character of all disease; above all, on

The law of Periodicity, a law
Whence Medicine yet has wells of light to draw.

By Remittency, I mean th' ebb of Disease, by Periodicity, th' ebb and also the flow, the paroxysm and the remission. These remit and recur, and keep time like the tides, not in aqui and remittent fever only, as the Profission imagines to this day, but in all diseases from a Scirrhus in the Pylorus t' a toothache. And I discovered this, and the new paths to cure of all diseases it opens. Alone I did it: and what my reward? hooted, insulted, belied, and called a quack, by the banded school of profissional assassins, who, in their day hooted Harvey and Jinner, authors too of great discoveries, but discoveries narrow in their consequences compared with mine. T' appreciate Chronobarimulamyer must begin at the beginning; so just answer me—What is Man?"

At this huge inquiry whirring up all in a moment, like a cock pheasant in a wood, Mrs. Dodd sank back in her chair despondent. Seeing her here no second subject, Sampson turned to Julia and demanded, twice as loud, "WHAT IS MAN?" Julia opened two violet eyes at him, and then looked at her mother for a hint how to proceed.

"How can that child answer such a question?" sighed Mrs. Dodd. "Let us return to the point."

"I have never strayed an inch from it. It's About Young Physic."

"No, excuse me, it is about a young lady. Universal Medicine! what have I to do with that?"

"Now this is the way with them all," cried Sampson, furious; "there bowed John Bull. The men and women of this benighted nashin have an ear for any thing; provided it matters nothing: Talk Jology, Cuchology, Entomology, Theology, Meteorology, Astronomy, Dunetonomy, Bothoronomy, or Boshology, and one is listened to with rivirence, because these are all far-off things in fogs; but at a word about the great, near, useful art of Healing, y' all stop your ears; for why; your life and dailinaunty happiness depend on it. But 'no,' sis John Bull, the knowledge of our own buddies, and how to save or even Bokin, Beef I mean, day by day from disease and shattered ass-ass-ins, all that may interest the thinkers in Saturn, but what the devil is it to y' talk t' us of the hiv-y buddies, not of our own. Babble o' comets an' meteors an' Etherial nibula (never mind the nibula in our own skulls). Discourse t' us of Prediatinashin, Spitzbirgen sea-weed, the last novel, the siventh vie; of Christchinizing the Patagonians or confidion they are not to come here, and Chrischinize the Whitechapelians; of the letter to the Times from the tinker wrecked at Timbuctoo; and the dear Professor's lecture on the probability of snail-shells in the backyard of the moon! but don't ask us to know ourselves!—lijits!!"

The eloquent spenker, depressed by the perversity of Englishmen in giving their minds to every part of creation but their bodies, suffered a momentary loss of energy; then Mrs. Dodd, who had long been watching lynx-like, glided in. "Let us compound. You are for curing all the world, beginning with Nobody. My ambition is to cure my girl, and leave mankind in peace. Now if you will begin with my child, I will submit to rectify the universe in its proper turn. Any time will do to set the human race right: you own it is in no hurry: but my child's case presses; so do pray cure her for me."

"I Mai—mad'm—shall cure her! How on airth am I to do that?"

"At least tell me what her Indisposition is."

"Oh! What, didn't I tell you? Well, there's nothing the matter with her."

At receiving this cavalier reply for the reward of all her patience, Mrs. Dodd was so hurt, and so nearly angry, that she rose with dignity from her seat, with her cheek unusually pink, and her water in her eyes. Sampson saw she was ruffled, and appealed to Julia of all people. "There now, Miss Julee," said he, ruefully; "she is in a rage because I won't humbug her. Poplus would decipee. I tell you, ma'am, it is not a medical case; give me disease and I'll cure't. Stop, I'll tell ye what do; let her take and swallow the Barkton Dodd prescriptions, and Butcher Boat's, and canting Kinyon's, and after those four tinkers there'll be plenty holes to mend; then send for me!"

"BUT I THOUGHT I'D JUST ASK YE."

Here was irony. Mrs. Dodd retorted by finesse; she turned on him with a sugared smile, and said: "Never mind doctors and patients; it is so long since we met. I do hope you will waive ceremony, and dine with me en ami."

He accepted with pleasure; but must return to his inn first and get rid of his dirty boots, and pashints. And with this he whipped out his watch, and sat that, dealing with universal medicine, he had dispatched more than one sick individual; so shot out as hard as he had shot in, and left the ladies looking at one another after the phenomenon.

"Well!" said Julia, with a world of meaning.

"Well, dear," replied Mrs. Dodd, "he is a little eccentric. I think I will request them to make some addition to the dinner."

"No, mamma, if you please, not to put me off so transparently: tell me first the reason you did not ring the bell, and bid the servant conduct that man to the door, very early in the conference? If I had interrupted, and shouted, and behaved so, you would have packed me off to bed, or somewhere, directly."

"Don't say 'packed,' love. Dismissed me to bed."

"Ah!" cried Julia, "you are yourself again: that privileged person is gone, and we must all mind our P's and Q's once more. This is most than natural. You would not lay down your character for a single person, to take it up again the moment he was gone—without a reason. Here is some mystery." Then she clasped her hands, and raised them to Heaven, just like the best actress: "my own mamma has a secret, a secret from her Julia. Well, I deserve it." This acknowledgment slipped out through speaking too fast, and was no sooner uttered than this statuesque Hebe hung her head most penitentially, and looked as if she could bite her tongue off."

Mrs. Dodd, with an air of nonchalance, replied to the effect that Dr. Sampson was not her offspring; and so she was not bound to correct his eccentricities. "And I suppose," said she, coldly, "you must accept these extraordinary people as we find them; and it is time to dress for dinner."

That day her hospitable board was spread over a trap. Blessed with an oracle irrelevantly fluent, and dumb to the point, she had asked him to dinner with maternal address. He could not be on his guard eternally; sooner or later, through inadvertence, or in a moment of convivial recklessness, or in a parenthesis of some grand Generality, he would cure her child; or, perhaps, at his rate of talking, would say out all his idle themes, down to the very "well-being of mankind;" and then Julia's mysterious indisposition would come on the listing. With these secret hopes she presided at the feast, all grace and gentle amenity. Julia, too, sat down with a little design, but a very different one, viz. of being very chilly company, for she disliked this new acquaintance cordially, and hated the science of medicine.

The unconscious Object chatted away with both, and cut their replies very short, and did strange things; sent away Julia's dinner, regardless of her scorn, and prescribed mutton: called for Champagne and made her drink it, and point; and then excited Mrs. Dodd in hopes that he was attending to the case by degrees.

But, after dinner, Julia, to escape medicine, universal, and particular, turned to her mother, and dilated on the treachery of her literary guide, the Cutthroater. "He said 'Odds and Ends' was a good novel to read by the sea-side. So I thought 'then oh, how different it must be from most books, if you can sit by the glorious sea and even look at it.' So I sent for it directly, and, would you believe, it was an ignoble thing; all dinners and contracts. The sea, indeed! A pond would be fitter to read it by; and one with a good many goose on."

"Was ever such simplicity?" said Mrs. Dodd.

"Why, my dear, that phrase about the sea does not mean any thing. I shall have you believing that Mr. So-and-So, a novelist, can 'wither fashionable folly,' and that 'a painful incident' to one shopkeeper has 'thrown a gloom' over a whole market-town, and so on. Nowadays every third phrase is of this character; a starling's note. Once, it appears, there was an age of gold, and then came one of iron, and then of brass. All these are gone, and the age of 'jargon' has succeeded."

She sighed, and Sampson took a "tremendous header" off the sea-side novel into the sea of fiction. He rechristened that joyous art Fecksbin, and lashed its living professors. "You devour their three volumes greedily," said he, "but after your meal you feel as empty as a drrum; there is no leading idea in 'um; now, there always is in Molière: and he comprehended the midicine of his age. But what fundamental truth d'our novelists iver convey? All they can do is pile incidents. Their customers dictate th' article: unideaed melodrams for unideaed girls. The writers and their feckshins belong to one species, and that's 'the non-vertebrated animals;' and their midicine is Bosh; why they bleed still for falls and fevers; and niver mention vital chronometry. Then they don't look straight at Nature, but see with their ears, and repeat one another twelve deep. Now, listen me! there are the cracters for an 'ideaed feckshin' in Barkington, and I'd write it, too, only I haven't time, ye know."

At this, Julia, forgetting her resolution, broke out, "Romantic characters in Barkington? Who? who?"

"Who should they be, but my pashints? Ay, ye may lauch, Miss Julee, but wait till ye see them." He was then seized with a fit of candor, and admitted that some, even of his pashints, were colorless; indeed, not to mince the matter, six or seven of that sacred band were nullity in person. "I can compare the beggars to nothing," said he, "but the globules of the Do-Nothings; dee——d insipid, and nothing in 'em. But the others make up. Man alive, I've got 'a rosy cheeked miser,' and an 'ill-used attorney,' and an 'honest Screw,' he is a gardener, with a hid like a cart-horse."

"Mamma! mamma! that is Mr. Maxley," cried Julia, clapping her hands, and thawing in her own despite.

"Then there's my virgin martyr, and my puppy; they are brother and sister; and there's their father, but he is an impenetrable dog—won't unbosom. Howiver, he sairves to draw chicks for the other two, and so keep 'em goen. By-the-by, you know my puppy."

"We have not that honor. Do we know Dr. Sampson's puppy, love?" inquired Mrs. Dodd, rather languidly.

"Mamma!—I—I—know no one of that name."

"Don't tell me! Why it was he sent me here: told me where you lived, and I was to make haste, for Miss Dodd was very ill: it is young Hardie, the banker's son, you know."

Mrs. Dodd said, good-humoredly, but with a very slight touch of irony, that really they were very much flattered by the interest Mr. Alfred Hardie had shown; especially as her daughter had never exchanged ten words with him. Julia colored at this statement, the accuracy of which she had good reason to doubt; and the poor girl felt as if an icicle passed swiftly along her back. And then, for the first time in her life, she thought her mother hardly gracious; and she wanted to say she was obliged to Mr. Alfred Hardie, but dared not, and despised herself for not daring. Her composure was further attacked by Mrs. Dodd looking full at her, and saying, interrogatively, "I wonder how that young gentleman could know about your being ill?"

At this Julia eyed her plate very attentively, and murmured, "I believe it is all over the town: and seriously too, so Mrs. Maxley says; for she tells me that, in Barkington, if more than one doctor is sent for, that bodes ill for the patient."

"Deevelich ill," cried Sampson, heartily:

"For two physicians, like a pair of oars, Conduck him faster to the Styjjin shores."*

Julia looked him in the face, and coldly ignored this perversion of Mrs. Maxley's meaning; and Mrs. Dodd returned pertinaciously to the previous topic. "Mr. Alfred Hardie interests me: he was good to Edward. I am curious to know why you call him a puppy?"

"Only because he is one, ma'am. And that is no reason at all with 'the Six.' He is a juveneel pidant, and a puppy, and contradicts ivery new truth, bekase it isn't in Aristotle and th' Eton grammar; and he's such a chatter-box, ye can't get in a word idgeways; and he and his sister—that's my virgin martyr—are a farce. He keeps sneerin' at her relijjin, and that puts her in such a rage, she thritens 't' intercede for him at the Throne.'"

"Jargon," sighed Mrs. Dodd, and just shrugged her lovely shoulders. "We breathe it—we float in an atmosphere of it. My love?" And she floated out of the room, and Julia floated after.

"You look flushed, love," was Mrs. Dodd's first word in the drawing-room. "Lie on the sofa a minute, and compose yourself."

Sampson made grog and sipped it, meditating on the gullibility of man in matters medical. This favorite speculation detained him late, and almost his first word on entering the drawing-room was, "Good-night, little girl."

Julia colored at this broad hint, drew herself up, and lighted a bed-candle. She went to Mrs. Dodd, kissed her, and whispered in her ear, "I hate him!" and, as she retired, her whole elegant person launched lady-like defiance; under which brave exterior no little uneasiness was hidden. "O, what will become of me!" thought she, "if he has gone and told him about Henley."

"Let's see the prescriptions, ma'am," said Dr. Sampson.

Delighted at this concession, Mrs. Dodd took them out of her desk and spread them earnestly. He ran his eye over them, and pointed out that the mucous membrane man and the nerve man had prescribed the same medicine, on irreconcilable grounds; and a medicine, moreover, whose effect on the nerves was nil, and on the mucous membrane was not to soothe it, but plow it and harrow it; "and did not that open her eyes?" He then reminded her that all these doctors in consultation would have contrived to agree. "But you," said he, "have baffled the collusive swindle by which Dox arrived at a sham uniformity—honest uniformity can never exist till scientific principles obtain." Then, with a sudden start, he compared her to Daniel. He was very fond of comparisons. "Danle," said he, "questioned those two elderly blaggrds apart, and thin they couldn't agree in a lie, ye know, all for want of a 'consultashin.' So says you, 'Well done, Danle, my lad.'"

"My dear friend, I am not so familiar—with giants—as you do me the honor to imagine."

"Whist! Whist! and you said, 'I'll do a bit o' Danle.'"

"Oh, quelle horreur!" cried Mrs. Dodd, in unfeigned disgust.

"Listme! All four, been Danled, told y' a different lie; and disn't that open your eyes? Sceince, indeed! Put an easy question t' any real sceince; will it sing ye four songs as wide apart as the four winds of Hiven? Take a pashint and his case to four lawyers, the most abused of all Sceince's sons; will they fling him four impident guesses a thousand miles wide of each other; and ten thousand from the truth?"

Mrs. Dodd seemed dazzled by this observation, and bowed her head in reluctant assent.

"Ye begin to see through 'em? Now then, post nubila Phœbus: that is not donkey Latin, ma'am, but the real article, and means, 'After four muddlehids see one Sampsin work.' To begin, is the pashint in love?"

The doctor put this query in just the same tone in which they inquire, "any expectoration?" But Mrs. Dodd, in reply, was less dry and business-like. She started and looked aghast. This possibility had once, for a moment, occurred to her, but only to be rejected, the evidence being all against it.

"In love?" said she. "That child, and I not know it!"

He said he had never supposed that. "But I thought I'd just ask ye; because she has no bodily ailment, and the paassions are all counterfeit diseases; they are connected, like all diseases, with cerebral instability, have their heats and chills, like all diseases, and their paroxysms and remissions, like all diseases. Nlistme! You have detected the sighs of a slight cerebral instability; I have ascertained th' absence of all physical cause: then why make this healthy pashint's buddy a test-tube for poisons? Sovereign drugs (I deal with no other, I leave the nullities to the noodles) are either counterpoisons, or poisons, and here there is nothing to counterpoison at prisent. So I'm for caushin, and working on the safe side th' hidge, and that's the mintal; till we are less in the dark. Mind ye, young women at her age are kittle cattle; they have gusts o' this, and gusts o' that, th' unreasonable imps. D'ye see these two pieces pasteboard? They are tickets for a ball,

In Barkton town-hall."

"Yes, of course I see them," said Mrs. Dodd, dolefully.

"Well, I prescribe 'em. And when they have been taken,

And the pashint well shaken, perhaps we shall see whether we are on the right system: and if so, we'll dose her with youthful soceity in a more irrashinal forrm; conversaziones, cookeyshines, et citera. And if we find ourselves on the wrong tack, why then we'll hark back.

Stick blindly to 'a course,' the dockers cry.
But it does me harm! Then 'twill do good by-an-by.
Where lairned ye that, Echoes of Echoes, 'say!
The killer plows 'a course,' the healer 'FEELS HIS WAY.'"

So mysterious are the operations of the human mind, that, when we have exploded in verse meritorious as the above, we lapse into triumph instead of penitence. Not that doggrel meets with reverence here below—the statues to it are few, and not in marble, but in the material itself—but then an impromptu! A moment ago, our Posy was not: and now is. With the speed, if not the brilliancy, of lightning, we have added a handful to the intellectual dust-heap of an oppressed nation. From this bad eminence Sampson then looked down complacently, and saw Mrs. Dodd's face as long as his arm. She was one that held current opinions; and the world does not believe Poetry can sing the Practical; verse and useful knowledge pass for incompatibles; and though Doggrel is not Poetry, yet it has a lumbering proclivity that way, and so forfeits the confidence of grave, sensible people. This versification, and this impalpable and unprecedented prescription she had waited for so long, seemed all of a piece to poor mamma; wild, unpractical, and—oh, horror!—eccentric.

Sampson read her sorrowful face after his fashion. "Oh, I see, ma'am," cried he. "Cure is not welcome unless it comes in the form consecrated by cinturies of slaughter. Well, then, give me a sheet!" He took the paper and rent it asunder, and wrote this on the larger fragment:

R. Die Mercur. circa x. hor: vespert:
eat in musca ad Prœtorium.
Saltet cum xiii canicul:
prœsertim meo. Dom: reddita,
6 hora matutin: dormiat ad prand·
Repetat stultit: pro re nata.

He handed this with a sort of spiteful twinkle to Mrs. Dodd, and her countenance lightened again. Her sex will generally compound with whoever can give as well as take. Now she had extracted a real, grave, prescription, she acquiesced in the ball, though not a county one; "to satisfy your whim, my good kind friend, to whom I owe so much."

Sampson called on his way back to town, and, in course of conversation, praised Nature for her beautiful instincts, one of which, he said, had inspired Miss Julee, at a credulous age, not to swallow "the didly drastics o' the tinkerin dox."

Mrs. Dodd smiled, and requested permission to contradict him; her daughter had taken the several prescriptions.

Sampson inquired brusquely if she took him for a fool.

She replied calmly: "No; for a very clever, but rather opinionated personage."

"Opininated? So is ivery man who has grounds for his opinin. D'ye think, because Dockers Short, an' Bist, an' Kinyon, an' Cuckoo, an' Jackdaw, an' Starling, an' Co., don't know the dire effecks of calomel an' drastics on the buddy, I don't know't? Her eye, her tongue, her skin, her voice, her elastic walk, all tell me she has not been robbed of her vital resources. Why, if she had taken that genteel old thief Short's rimidies alone, the girl's gums would be sore,

And herself at Dith's door."

Mrs. Dodd was amused. "Julia, this is so like the gentlemen; they are in love with Argument. They go on till they reason themselves out of their Reason. Why beat about the bush; when there she sits?"

"What, go t' a wumman for the truth, when I can go t' infallible Inference?"

"You may always go to my David's daughter for the truth," said Mrs. Dodd, with dignity. She then looked the inquiry; and Julia replied to her look as follows: first, she colored very high; then, she hid her face in both her hands; then, rose and turning her neck swiftly, darted a glance of fiery indignation and bitter reproach on Dr. Meddlesome, and left the apartment mighty stag-like.

"Maircy on us!" cried Sampson. "Did ye see that, ma'am? Yon's just a bonny basilisk. Another such thunder-bolt as she dispinsed, and ye'll be ringing for the maid to sweep up the good physician's ashes."

Julia did not return till the good physician was gone back to London. Then she came in with a rush, and, demonstrative toad, embraced Mrs. Dodd's knees, and owned she had cultivated her geraniums with all those medicines, liquid and solid; and only one geranium had died of them.

There is a fascinating age, when an intelligent virgin is said to fluctuate between childhood and womanhood. Let me add that these seeming fluctuations depend much on the company she is in; the budding virgin is princess of chameleons: and, to confine ourselves to her two most piquant contrasts, by her mother's side she is always more or less childlike: but, let a nice young fellow engage her apart, and, hey presto! she shall be every inch a woman; perhaps at no period of her life are the purely mental characteristics of her sex so supreme in her: so her type, the rose-bud, excels in essence of rosehood the rose itself.

My reader has seen Julia Dodd play both parts; but it is her child's face she has now been turning for several pages; so it may be prudent to remind him she has shone on Alfred Hardie in but one light; a young, but Juno-like, woman. Had she shown "my puppy" her childish qualities, he would have despised her; he had left that department himself so recently. But Nature guarded the budding fair from such a disaster.

We left Alfred Hardie standing in the moonlight gazing at her lodging. Sudden! But, let slow coaches deny it as loudly as they like, fast coaches exist; and Love is a passion, which like Hate, Envy, Avarice, etc., has risen to a great height in a single day. Not that Alfred's was "Love at first sight," for he had seen her beauty in the full blaze of day with no deeper feeling than admiration; but in the moonlight he came under more sovereign spells than a fair face: among these were her virtues and her voice. The narrative of their meeting has indicated the first, and, as to the latter, Julia was not one of those whose beauty goes out with a candle. Her voice was that rich, mellow, moving organ, which belongs to no rank nor station; is born, not made, and, flow it from the lips of dairymaid or countess, touches every heart, gentle or simple, that is truly male. And this divine contralto, full, yet penetrating, Dame Nature had inspired her to lower when she was moved or excited, instead of raising it; and then she was enchanting. All unconsciously she cast this crowning spell on Alfred, and he adored her. In a word, he caught a child-woman away from its mother; his fluttering captive turned, put on composure, and bewitched him.

She left him, and the moonlight night seemed to blacken. But within his young breast all was light, new light. He leaned opposite her window in an Elysian reverie, and let the hours go by. He seemed to have vegetated till then, and lo! true life had dawned. He thought he should love to die for her. And, when he was calmer, he felt he was to live for her, and welcomed his destiny with rapture. He passed the rest of the Oxford term in a soft ecstasy; called often on Edward, and took a sudden and prodigious interest in him; and counted the days glide by and the happy time draw near, when he should be four months in the same town with his enchantress. This one did not trouble the doctors; he glowed with a steady fire; no heats and chills, and sad misgivings; for one thing he was not a woman, a being tied to that stake, Suspense, and compelled to wait, and wait, for others' actions. As the inveterate Sampson would say:

He had the luck to be a male,
So, like a rat without a tail,
Could do, could do, could do.

Meantime, life's path seemed paved with roses, and himself to march it in eternal sunshine, buoyed by perfumed wings.

He came to Barkington to try for the lovely prize. Then first he had to come down from love's sky, and realize how hard it is here below to court a young lady—who is guarded by a mother—without an introduction in the usual form. The obvious course was to call on Edward. Having parted from him so lately he forced himself to wait a few days, and then set out for Albion Villa.

As he went along, he arranged the coming dialogue for all the parties; Edward was to introduce him, Mrs. Dodd to recognize his friendship for her son, he was to say he was the gainer by it; Julia, silent at first, was to hazard a timid observation, and he to answer gracefully, and draw her out, and find how he stood in her opinion. The sprightly affair should end by his inviting Edward to dinner. That should lead to their inviting him in turn, and then he should get a word with Julia, and find out what houses she visited, and get introduced to their proprietors; arrived at this point, his mind went over hedge and ditch faster than my poor pen can follow. As the crow flies, so flew he, and had reached the church-porch under a rain of nosegays with Julia—in imagination—by then he arrived at Albion Villa in the body. Yet he knocked timidly; his heart beat almost as hard as his hand.

Sarah, the black-eyed house-maid, "answered the door."

THE BOMBARDMENT OF FORT SUMTER.

ON page 285 we publish an illustration of the BOMBARDMENT OF FORT SUMTER by the iron-clads under Admiral Du Pont, on 7th April, and on page 276 an illustration of the SINKING OF THE "KEOKUK" on the following morning. We gave in our last number an account of the affair, but will make room here for an extract from the graphic letter of the Times correspondent. After describing how the Ironsides was disabled by the current, he adds:

In this plight it only remained for Admiral Du Pont to signal to the fleet to disregard the movements of the flag-ship. This he did, and the ships then assumed such positions as were available and they could gain, the whole number being at the mouth of the harbor, between Cumming's Point and Sullivan's Island, and opposite the north-east and eastern face of Fort Sumter, at distances of from six hundred to a thousand yards. While the manœuvres rapidly indicated in these paragraphs are going on, you must not suppose the enemy is inactive. The powerful work on Cumming's Point, named Battery B, opens; the long range rifle ordnance of Fort Beauregard join in; Moultrie hurls its heavy metal; the fifty guns that line the Redan swell the fire; and the tremendous armament of Sumter vomits forth its fiery hail.

There now ensues a period of not more than thirty minutes, which forms the climax and white heat of the fight; for though from the time when fire was opened on the head of the approaching line to the time when the retiring fleet passed out of the enemy's range there was an interval of two hours and a half (from half past two till five), yet the essence of the fight was shut up in those thirty tremendous minutes.

The best resources of the descriptive art, I care not in whose hand, are feeble to paint so terrific and awful a reality. Such a fire, or any thing even approaching it, was simply never seen before. The mailed ships are in the focus of a concentric fire of the five powerful works already indicated, from which they are removed only from five to eight hundred yards, and which in all could not have mounted less than three hundred guns; and, understand, these not the lighter ordnance, such as 32 or 42 pounders, which form the ordinary armament of forts, but of the very heaviest calibre—the finest and largest guns from the spoils of the Norfolk Navy-yard, the splendid and heavy 10 and 11 inch guns cast at the Tredegar Works, and the most approved English rifled guns (Whitworth and others) of the largest calibre made.

There was something almost pathetic in the spectacle of those little floating circular towers, exposed to the crushing weight of those tons of metal, hurled against them with the terrific force of modern projectiles, and with such charges of powder as were never before dreamed of in artillery firing. During the climax of the fire a hundred and sixty shots were counted in a single minute! Some of the commanders of the iron-clads afterward told me that the shot struck their vessels as fast as the ticking of a watch; and not less than 3500 rounds could have been fired by the rebels during the brief engagement.

It was less of the character of an ordinary artillery duel, and more of the proportions of a war of the Titans in the elder mythologies.

While the fleet is receiving the fire from the forts, what, in the mean time, are the iron-clads doing in return?

On the order being given to disregard the movements of the flag-ship, the brilliantly-audacious Rhind ran his vessel, the Keokuk, up through the others, and laid it seemingly under the very walls of Sumter, and within a little more than five hundred yards from it. Close behind him, within six hundred yards of the fort, is the Catskill, commanded by George Rodgers, a soul of courage all compact; and to both of them one could not help applying the exclamation of Nelson at Trafalgar, "See how Collingwood, that noble fellow, carries his ship into the fight!"

Close by is the Montauk, commanded by the heroic Worden; while not far removed are the Passaic, the Patapsco, the Nahant, the Nantucket, the Weehawken, and the Ironsides.

The whole fleet is devoting itself mainly to the face of Fort Sumter presented to it, with the exception of the Ironsides, which, from its position, can do better work on Fort Moultrie, and is pouring forth its terrific broadside from its seven 10-inch guns on that work.

Of the sinking of the Keokuk the Tribune correspondent says:

Almost my first look from the spar-deck this morning fell upon a sad sight. The Keokuk was sinking. She had anchored on the bar during the night. Her crew had been busy ever since last evening trying to keep her afloat by plugging the holes at her water-line. But at daybreak a stiff breeze set the sea rolling, rendering their attempts futile. Captain Rhind hoisted a signal of distress at about 7, but it remained unnoticed until nearly 8, when the tug Dandelion came alongside the sinking craft. Through the strenuous efforts of her captain, Acting Master Barrymore, every soul on board was saved, with a loss, however, of all they had.

The rebels came down to the beach in crowds and watched the operation. They were only five hundred yards' distance, but did not open fire on our people, and were not molested by the gun-boats.

REVIEW BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE CAVALRY OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC—GE

ENERAL BUFORD'S DIVISION OF REGULARS.—Drawn by Mr. A. R. Waud.—[See Page 282.]

REVIEW OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

ON 9th April the President reviewed the Army of the Potomac on the bank of the Rappahannock, where they have been so long encamped. We publish on pages 277, 280, and 281, two illustrations of the scene from sketches by Mr. A. R. Waud. The following account, from the Herald correspondence, will be read with interest:

The event of the season came off yesterday. The grand review, which the army has for days been looking forward to, and in which rival regiments were to vie with each other for distinction, has passed, and with it the "gorge" of war. The unsavory circumstance" was, as in every marches and days of toil put to come; in the future vigorously contending, but anticipated with pleasure by view. Great preparation had been made for the display, and for several days the entire force was supplied with arms, picks, and shovels, leveling the fields. Ditches were filled, stumps and bushes removed, ridges cut down, and quagmires drained, until the Fitzhugh estate wore the appearance of a rose track. Tall stakes, bearing the designs of the banners of the several corps, were planted in the positions to be occupied by the respective commands, and as the troops marched out upon the field the divisions wheeled into line as if by instinct, with no confusion, no noise, save the music of the bands, the tramp of the regiments, and the bright flashing of the officers.

Hours slipped by, and the dark blue masses on the plateau still stood, the banners and numerous horsemen, the relief of drums more bewildering. The artillery came out, and the grass on the hillside under the brightest of Fredericksburg pointed their muzzles over toward the white tents in the hollows, and the little rifle teams were drawn by them briskly, as if proud of the work they did before. Richmond, at Antietam, and over the pontoons down by the river. The sun was now well in the line, the men waited and grew impatient, and the battery horses, to amuse themselves in the cold, kicked each others' mains, and fiercely swished imaginary flies, and still the cortege did not appear. Then the word was passed the corps commanding the fingers of the soldiers, playing and pranks with cap, tugging at the flags upon the tall bending staffs, as if impatient for the fray, and the long troops began to cut one by file to stir themselves into warmth, when suddenly a rocket was sent up from the right flank, followed by another, and then another, while the sullen boom of the guns came upon the left, and announced the commencement of the drama. The cavalcade was imposing: The President, mounted upon a large bay, took the lead, followed by a certain things of generals, colonels, and officers of lesser rank, while the lancers, with their fluttering pennants, and all the paraphernalia, quickly met. Mrs. Lincoln, accompanied by the Attorney-General and Captain Gilmore of General Meade's staff, in a carriage drawn by four spanking bays, and escorted by a squad of hussars, viewed the field from the eminence; but Governor Curtin, with characteristic energetics, booted and spurred, rode bravely at the side of the President, followed by his dashing little aide-de-camp, Cooney Young, in a dress. When the war broke out a month-fiend last came down with the troops from Harrisburg, New Jersey, and with the colonel into the fights. General Kearney noticed him, and made him his target, and all during the struggle on the Peninsula kept him at the front of the division. General Kearney fell, but the bugler remained, and, mounted on new commander's horse, he followed after. How he trumpets for General Sickles at the head of the corps, and sports his sword-belt and bugle-sash's strapped over the back of a veteran. A favorite among the officers, his lot is far from being commonplace, while his future can but seem promising. Steps have already been taken for giving him an education, and an appointment to the military academy is hinted by the friends. Yesterday he accompanied Master Lincoln as inseparably as his shadow, and after the review had passed, into the science of sabre-exercising. Up the line and back rode, and rumble around together, like brothers. Will that future historian be a new one-not?

The artillery were quickly reviewed and passed off the field, when the President turned his attention to the infantry. The troops were drawn up in columns of division, and as the cortege came down the front the banners dipped gracefully, the bands burst out with "Hail to the Chief," and the lines saluted their Colonel-in-Chief. The corps were reviewed separately, though all upon the same field, and as each passed in saluting and being saluted in others rested upon their arms, while the rear ranks came times fell out and dressed fantastic jigs in the cold to the rattle of the bones and the thumps. Guards were stationed around the field to restrain the throng of spectators, and officers, with axes and hatchets, rode fantastically about giving instructions; while General Patrick, as general officer of the day, rode, tested, and dignified as ever, moved from point to point superintending the movements of the troops, and here and there, by an order, easing the fetters of the rank and file. From a knoll near by we held the view was magnificent. Out upon a little swell of upland were the President and his suite, the corps, and the staff, and over all the plain stretched the columns of the army. In the distance were the camps, the white church spires of Fredericksburg, and the frowning batteries beyond; behind us the Federal-united village, with its whitetopped baggage wagons and cannon on the hills. Now and then the sun came out and lighted up the field with fleeting but sensual splendor, and then was succeeded by glimpses of glorious things, visions of splendor, that vanished and seemed as a dream. Over the undulating ground the long rifles and bayonets, and lingered in the folds of the banners, will never be forgotten. Then came the shouts, and over the plain and melted away with the music very far off to fall in echoes upon the hills. Finally the tide of veterans surged onward. The front was lost in the winding valley, and then to the quiet escape, and the rear still rested impatiently on the knoll; while the columns one by one seemed to swing off from the latter, wind round before the President, and lose themselves in the distance. The afternoon was on, and the regiments, like waves at sea, swept after each other as regularly as the waves. The drums kept up their rub-rub, and the trumpets, playing hide and seek, lost themselves among the soldiers; spectators grew tired of the ceaseless tramp, the bugles and flutter of banners, and galloped home to their camps, and the President sat wearily upon his horse, waiting for the review to be over.

At length the last regiment came up, dipped its colors and banner-staff, and passed, vanished over the hill, and the cortege of generals and orderlies cantered leisurely back to head-quarters.

Notwithstanding the order directing the ladies in camp to change their base, great numbers of them remained, and in front of the reviewing ground upon the hill. Here and there an eagerly glimpses of crinoline and satin in the embankment, and occasionally some fair equestrian dashed along the plain to the admiration of young officers and the envy of their less fortunate sisters. Artists were scattered about, pencil and portfolio in hand, sketching the beauties of the scene; navy-fledged poets sought inspiration of the muses and from the classic canteen, and the knights of the quill played round the edges of the eddy, here and there darting in to make up an acquaintance or renew a former one with a friend.

The appearance of the troops was remarkably good. Indeed, that they should look so well only forty-eight hours after the most terrible storm of the season is a wonder, and excited no little comment on the part of spectators. Uniforms were clean, arms bright as new, equipments in splendid condition. Every thing was in the finest style, and our Chief Magistrate could not but have felt a thrill of pride as he looked over the sea of bayonets, the blue coats, and the determined faces.

ONE OF THREE.

"Too!"

The little word should bristle round with exclamation points, for it was the climax to all and woe-der to sound as it fell from the lips of my sisters. And yet I had said little to provoke contempt. They had been talking, as girls will, about marriage: telling what their husbands must be—young, of course; handsome, of course; above all, rich, of course—and I had only said that if I ever married I should not care so much about my husband's being young, or handsome, or rich. These things were good and pleasant, but I could do without them—for what I should like would be to have him a hero; so that I could worship him, and have the pleasure of his courage and strength would never fail me, let fate tax them ever so much.

I had forgotten myself and my customary position in the household when I said this; but the looks and scorn of my sisters recalled my wonderings, and I blushed into painful blushes and embarrassed silence. Long sentences would not have revealed more fully how utterly a sure in their eyes was the folly of my choice, and how rejecting a husband than did that scornful "You!"

I could not understand why they did not like me. I was neither the oldest nor the youngest. One would have thought that to one or other of them I should have been more favored, but neither fraternized with me. Edith, my magnificent elder sister, passed me haughtily by, and made friends instead with Alice, who was but two years her junior. I suppose it was because I was not of their kind. They looked as my mother had done when I refused to wear the largest hoops for girls, and when my father's friends declined. Could do as ready, though Mabel was only fifteen. Tall and lithe, with the slender hands and feet, the small, proudly poised head, and delicate features, they were with scorn, which had been the characteristics of the beautiful Lindsays for many a generation.

I, on the other hand, was a changeful child—all Hunter. My figure was short and a little stout. My face was full, my hair was brown, my hands and feet were not delicate, and I had—they were always telling me so—no pride, no style, no air. I had inherited, and have had to combat a share of motherhood, which would have made her care for me in sickness, or weep for me if I had died, but which could not help her to be proud that very handsome women seldom do have for daughters who in nowise inherit their own charms. My father would have been glad to see in me a feminine likeness of himself, but he too swam with the current. He adored my mother, and loved with unreasoning tenderness all that was hers, and almost like her.

I ought, knowing all this, to have been very miserable; but I certainly was not. To be sure my heart was hungry. I longed with a silent pain for love, but I was not unhappy in my world. It was hard to feel, as I often did, that if I died or went away it would make no especial difference to any one except my mother and father. So, I just tried not to think of it; and with competence and health, buoyant animal spirits and a clear conscience, there is a great deal of life in which a young creature of seventeen, who is not morbid or sullen, can not fail of finding.

But little knowledge sometimes, as I have been just now, at some new proof of the slight estimation I was held in; but on the whole I think I was not less happy in the cheerful home of my sisters.

Just as they were sneering at me, with that quiet lady-like contempt which expresses itself in look and accent rather than words, a neighbor came in—a friend as old as my oldest remembrance, Sarah Gresham. He was twenty-one, just through college, and we all thought he loved Edith. With only a few years between them they had been the close friends always. He fully realized Edith's ideal—was young, rich, handsome, all that she required, in fact. Then, too, he was the only son of the two elements of a hero deep down in his nature, guy and carelessness as it was on the surface. I remembered childish perils in which he seemed to have perished for us. I had seen his eyes flash, his face kindle, when he had spoken of some brave deed of another boy's—"It is necessary for me to go—it is not necessary for me to live." For the strong, true nature of which he was the possessor, I honored him, and looked up to him; though I never had the audacity to think of any vain rivalry with Edith. I could be content with less than the best.

My sisters both turned to greet him as he came in, and Mabel, with the freedom of speech which is the most unbearable cruelty out of places in childhood, told him what I had said—making it sound a little more ridiculous and sentimental, perhaps, than my words had done. Then I had been great friends in our romping boy and girl days; but I had not seen him since he left Edith, and he had not noticed me much of late. He turned to me now, however, with a warm, kindly smile in which sarcasm had no part. He said, generously,

"I like you for that, Maud. Keep to your creed. True courage is the noblest thing in the world. Without it—" and his eyes sought out of place in his words, and he quickly changed the subject, and asked her, anxiously,

"You have heard of the President's c—for three hundred thousand volunteers, have you not? Of course you must have guessed what I should think my duty?"

"Not to go?" and her fair cheek flushed and her voice trembled a little.

"Surely to go."

"But if you should die!" and some very becoming tears just dimmed her blue eyes, and weighed down her drooping golden lashes.

Oh, how well I knew it, that brave look that had kindled his eyes in boyhood when noble deeds were talked of! It swept over his face now, glorifying his handsome features with heroic resolve. It shone resolutely in his earnest glance. His voice rang clear and strong. He quoted the old words, even,

"It is necessary for me to die! It is not necessary for me to live. I might never die in a better cause."

But I—and there Edith stopped, blushing painfully; for, tender and constant as had been his attentions for two months back, he had never yet asked her to be his wife. He made amends now. Taking her hand he led her into the next room, where our father and mother were, and Mabel and I followed them. He went straight up to our parents, and said, in firm tones,

"I have enlisted for the war. I go to-morrow. I love Edith. She has refused me to ask her if she loves me, and to win her for my betrothed bride, if I can."

To see Edith his wife had been, I knew, the dream of both their hearts—but to have her wait for him for years, while her proud beauty should fade, and then to have him come back crippled and helpless, or not come back at all, that would indeed be different. And yet, on the other hand, the war might be short—Northern victory covered with glory, and the wife of Frank Gresham might have the right to be proud of the man who would never have justified. There was no time for hesitation. They read each other's eyes a moment, and then said, with one accord,

"Ask Edith."

He turned to her then, trust and homage in his face such as I could have given to women, and of which—Heaven help us!—not half of us are worthy; and looking at her, with his soul in his eyes, he asked,

"What does Edith say? She knows how I love her."

What she said was not much, but she looked uncommonly charming. She let her hand lie in his, and then rested her head, with a sudden, fond motion. He led her away silently out of doors. It was a brilliant summer day, and no one knew what he said to her, but out of the depths of his full, true heart—what vows were interchanged what fond words spoken. I was glad and proud with an almost painful rejoicing. The union seemed to me so suitable. I had always nearly worshiped that stately blonde beauty of Edith's. She seemed to me like one of the fair women the old Norse heroes loved, and were so ready to die for. And though she would be a fit crown and reward for the knight, I was perfectly content that his knight of to-day.

The last afternoon they were together. At night they were with the rest of us for a while, and then they went out under the summer moon, and passed their last hour alone. The next morning the final parting came. Then Edith provoked me a little. She sobbed, and implored him to give it all up and live for her. He declared it would kill her to part with him, calling him back time after time; and as the very last never giving him a single smile or look of parting cheer.

"Could you not have kept your lamentations till after he was gone?" I asked her, sharply; for I had seen tears in his eyes, and if it is a bad omen when a soldier goes away with wet eyes, and the one he loves best does not say, "God speed you!"

My criticism had a most restorative effect. She put aside her bewailing to tell me that "Much I know about it. If any one should ever love me, it would be kind enough for me to decide then how I ought to part with him." Then she went off again in a paroxysm of tears and tears, mingled with a great many adjectives about her brave, gallant, devoted, noble, loving Frank, until I was glad to escape from the room and run out of doors, and along the path which led from our house to the Greshams', with, I believe, some vague idea of going to see Frank myself before he left, and trying to comfort her. When I was half-way there I met Frank coming back.

"I was just coming on purpose to try and see you, Maud," he said, as he met me. "I want you to say good-by to Edith; and I want you to promise to write me a line, to tell me how she is. She is so delicate, and this parting seems to overcome her so much. I fear she will write to me cheerfully, and tell me that when all is really suffering and I want to know the exact truth. Will you send it to me, Maud?"

It seemed to me that he must be seeing a reflection of his own unselish courage in the shallow nature of his betrothed, and I wondered how, after the scene of the morning, he could have a single fear of her ever suppressing her own grief. Some of it must have been suffering, for his color left him. I did not tell him this thought, of course. I promised him that if his Edith should be ill, or serious, I would write to him, and not hang the strength of her physique, the brightness of her beauty—I would write to him. If any thing should be the matter with her, I would tell him—but I thought to myself that the chances of his hearing from me were very small. Still my promise seemed to comfort him, and he went away at last quite cheerfully.

No matter for the months that came after that. Suffice it that I had no occasion to write to Frank. I—as Edith liked him very much. The fact caught the eye of the fair sex, and we do not refuse to look with pleased eyes at an artificial pond in our pleasure-ground, sparkling in the sunshine, because it is not as deep as the sea. Who shall say that a rebounding, elastic, gutta-percha-like temperament is not a blessing? At any rate, Edith found her account in having such a one. She wore the ring Frank gave her, she wrote to him, she had a room ready for him at her mother's; and when any brave deed of Captain Gresham's was talked of, she smiled at his praises, as well she might, with a serene pride. But her color did not fade, or her appetite fail. She displayed her customary solicitude about her winter bonnet, and made some excellent bargains in silk dresses after hearing a shrewd financier predict the rise in exchange. Altogether, I saw no symptoms which made it my duty to write to Frank.

It was a day in November when a change came to our lives. I was at a front window leisurely sewing, but really watching the Indian summer glories of the landscape. My eyes followed the swift vivid touches the sun gold paint over the hills, tops, and then came back again to rest upon the path by which Edith's lover went away. I saw his mother leaning her forward upon her gentle, yet tottering footsteps. I knew what I saw but that something must have happened to Frank. He was her only son, and she a widow. She went out silently, and hurried down the path to meet her.

"I am so glad to see you first, Maud," she said, as I drew her weak arm through my young strong one. "My boy, my Frank, is ill, dying perhaps. It is some horrible malignant fever caught among the marshes. They sent me word, and I am to tell Edith. I fear for the effect of my news upon her. I shall start for the Washington this afternoon. I must see my poor boy before he dies."

I too trembled for the effect of the news upon my sister. But when the carriage came Edith would be stirred to its depths at last, and whence was to come her strength to cope with bitter trouble, she who had lived all her life on the roses, and into the lilies of life?" I told her the sad tidings myself gently as I could; but when I saw her mother's pale fall, and heard her weak self-compassionate exclamations, my heart hardened against her. I think Mrs. Gresham's did also, for she said, a little sternly:

"I must go home again at once. I have some preparations to make, and the train will leave in three this afternoon, just four hours from now. If you are ready to go with me you can join me at the station."

I went home with the poor, heart-broken mother. Edith did not need me. There were enough others to soothe the sorrow of her love, and I could not be the one whose anguish was deepest go back alone. I was with them at the station when I went home. I expected, yes, I honestly did expect to see Edith busy with her preparations. I was not prepared to find my mother and my sisters sitting together quietly in the library, with no change in their accustomed pursuits, except that instead of embroidery Edith had a cambric handkerchief which she threw down and then to her eyes. I was indignant, and I suppose my voice betrayed me.

"Edith, you are not getting ready, Edith?" I asked, sternly. "You will have none too much time."

My mother answered me.

"Edith is not going. We all counseled her not. If Frank were only wounded it would be different, but that horrible fever! She would be sure to take it, and it would to the merest throwing away of life. There are nurses there who can do a great deal more for him."

"Did you forbid Edith to go?"

"No, as I said, we advised her."

"Very well, if you did not forbid her, you must not forbid me. I am going. What she will not take for her self I will dare for my friend. Mrs. Gresham is old and feeble, and could not tend him night and day. As for me, I am young and strong, and I know my confidence enough to believe I can do more and better for him than any hired nurse."

"I do not want you to go, Maud, more than I say more than Edith," my mother said, in a tone of expostulation.

I answered, bitterly.

"I have not waited until to-day to learn that my life is not of much value to any one besides myself. I am young, mother, and if I am taken by a God-speed from any of you I can not help it."

"You will not go without a blessing, my good brave little girl!"

It was my father's voice which spoke. He had come into the room unnoticed, and heard my words. I think he understood me better than any of my wife, his own, and his heart warmed to me in that hour, as perhaps I had never done to any before. For he aided me in the few preparations I had to make, and at last he took me to the station. Edith and the two Mrs. Greshams—the mother and my younger sister had parted with me with unwonted tenderness, perhaps they thought they should never see me again. I believe that little sullen, and her good-by kiss had no warmth in it. I suppose she had an uncomfortable feeling that I was filling the place she ought to fill, and disliked me for it, without the courage to assert her right to go in my stead.

"Poor Frankham's face brightened a little when she saw me, but she only said,

"How is this, dear? It was Edith whom I expected."

"They were afraid for her to go. They thought she might take the fever; and I suppose she was a little afraid for herself."

"And you?"—Mrs. Gresham's blue eyes searched my face—"you were warranted fever-proof, I suppose?"

"I had no fear. My life is not worth so much that I should hesitate to risk it in a good cause."

I knew that she was glad to have me with her by the way her fingers closed over mine; but she did not say so. She and my father, whom I had been looking after my trunk, came up for a last good-by. He held me a moment in his arms, and kissed me.

"God keep you for me, my own child. If I have ever seemed cold or neglectful to you, forgive me in this hour. I shall think of you and pray for you night and day till I see your face again."

Then the cars started, and after a minute I could no longer see him on the platform, looking with dim eyes after me. I was going to Frank—to nurse him privately.

I can never remember much about that journey. We did not talk much, or eat, or sleep. I seemed in a trance, and something was whirling me on, on. We got there at last. Poor Mrs. Gresham was white with weariness, but she did not know it. She must see her boy. He lived still; so a hospital surgeon told us—a kind, good man, who had charge of his case—but there was not much hope. Three-fourths of the poor fellows that had been taken as he was were dead; but he held yet, and while there was life there was certainly a chance for him.

"Will he know me?" Mrs. Gresham asked, plaintively.

"Just now I think he will. Some of the time he is out of his head, but he knew me five minutes ago."

"Will the excitement of seeing me do him any harm?"

"Surely not. I tell you frankly he is too sick for any thing to excite him. There is nothing he wouldn't take coolly now. This way."

And so he led us in.

Was that frail—that ghastly frame worn to a skeleton—that haggard face spotted with fever? I wonder if his own mother would have known him if Dr. Austin had not stopped at his bedside and called him Captain Gresham?

"Mother," said a voice—his voice still, but oh! so changed and hoarse, "I knew you would come. I expected you to-night. But—"

He did not finish his question; but I saw his wistful, searching eyes, and I knew he longed, yet feared, to ask for Edith. So I stepped out of the shadow and said softly—

"I came in her stead, Frank."

"Is she dead?" he cried, lifting his weak head from the pillow, and clutching my fingers in his skeleton hand with a strange, deathly energy. His mother answered him:

"No, Frank. She is alive, and I suppose she would like to keep so. She was afraid, and they were afraid for her, that she would take the fever."

I hope I shall never see again such a smile as curved his thin lips. It was too awful. Scorn, pity, hate, and a murderous love, which God only knows that he despised himself for feeling, were all expressed in it, and the worn-out frame quivered to the finger tips with a keen pang he was too weak to show. He looked at me.

"If you poison us we do not die?" he muttered; then said aloud, smiling bitterly, "So they did not fear for you, Maud?"

"Maud did not fear for herself; I think that was the difference," his mother answered; unwisely, it may be, but she was sorely tempted, and perhaps to know what was in her thought about the matter did not really harm him.

"No, I suppose not," with a bitter gloom shadowing yet more the ghastly face. "Maud was not a beauty like my Edith. I do not blame my fair betrothed. There is danger; and that bright skin, those shining, those bagfuls of golden hair,—they are not meet for worms to feed on. Husk! Did you say orders have come to march? I don't know! I've been here much longer, with this white poison fog creeping up about us, we should all be dead. Mother, will you? It is hard work getting up; my bones are still."

"He is out of his head now," Dr. Austin whispered. "He will come soon; just as soon as Mrs. Gresham, you can be of no more use to-night. You must go to bed, and keep your strength for to-morrow."

She hesitated at first, but he was positive, and made her go—using the argument that he wished to husband her strength for the time when they need her more, in order to have her of the utmost possible use to her son. As I passed him in going out he whispered:

"Come back, if you are not too tired, when you have seen her safely for the night. Come, if you won't out to do any good, but I may want you."

How long the time seemed till I could steal away from her, on pretense of going to my own room to sleep, and rush back to the hospital! Dr. Austin was at the door.

"Captain Gresham's sister?" he said, inquiringly.

"No; my cousin Hunter. I am the sister of the lady Captain Gresham is engaged to marry. I came with his mother to help her in the journey, and to be of what use I could to him."

I thought it best thus to make my position clear in the first place. He nodded approvingly.

"You are the greatest use. Captain Gresham needs tenderer and more constant nursing than most of our poor fellows are likely to get, now the hospitals are so full. There should be some one with him every moment. You have a good hand and steady nerves; I think you will do. His mother will be of no light duty. She will not be with him nights, and she says, it would be making you both very useful. You have only to follow the directions I shall give you, and send for me if there is any serious change. But"—and he looked at me with those searching eyes of his—"you are too tired to sit up to-night."

"Not at all. I do not need rest, and I am in no mood to take it. I should much prefer to be employed."

"Yes; I suppose you would not rest much if I sent you away."

I followed him again to Frank Gresham's bedside. I thought at the first glance he was dead. Then I saw the clothes stir slightly above his chest.

"Is he asleep?" I whispered.

"No; only worn out. He had a sort of paroxysm after you left him. Now he may lie in this lethargic state for hours. You have only to sit by him and watch me. Drop a teaspoonful of this liquid between his lips once in half an hour, and let me know if any thing happens."

He went away, and left me sitting in the dimly-lighted hospital beside Frank, my old friend. Practically we were alone, for every one else in the great room was absorbed in their own sufferings or their own duties, and we had our little nook quite to ourselves. I sat there and wondered if I should be alone with him when he died; and if, by close watching, I could see his soul go! I wondered if Edith's dreams were sweet and her slumber peaceful, in her far-away couch of ease! I would not have changed places with her—not even for the dearest of all that blends beauty, and all the love with which Frank Gresham had loved her. I wondered if there was any slight chance that he would ever live to love her again! And then the half hour was up, and I dropped the medicine between his purple lips.

Two weeks flowed that night, of such suspense as only those know who keep watch beside a bed where life and death are struggling together. Every night, all the night through, I sat by my charge. Day times Dr. Austin persistently sent me away to sleep, and to breathe purer air, but with the night I was back again.

All this time he had not once again spoken of Edith. Of course he had thought of her, but whether with tenderness or reproach I had no shadow of indication by which to guess. She had written several times during his illness—affectionate words, but which seemed to me utterly hollow and superficial. I read him each one, and the smile that crossed his lips every time I could not understand.

There came a night at last when I had no longer any hope. He was worn almost beyond to me, beyond the possibility of longer endurance; and now a fierce, secret, withering pain began to search every fibre of my heart. Edith had forfeited that hold he had once had over him, for just at midnight he reached out his hand and touched mine. He spoke, but something of the old melody thrilled in the changed tones of his voice.

"Dying or not, I know better than living ones, Maud. I know now, lying here, that I never ought to have sought your sister's love. I do not blame her, poor girl! because she has failed me in my bitter need. It is Bible wisdom that we should not ask grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles. I ought to have known better, but her beauty blinded me. It was only heavenly fair that I did not look beyond to see how little her nature had in common with mine. It was not her fault that I asked what I was not, and timid—only fire and ice can not mingle. And yet I—no matter. Give her my blessing, Maud, a dying man's blessing. Ten days ago I was not dying, I hated her. I do not hate her now. You have been good to me, Maud. I will remember you. Will you—dare you kiss me good-by, with this fierce fever scorching my lips? I should like to carry your kiss with me, if you dare give it."

I bent over him—was it wrong when I thought he was dying?—and my lips clung to his with—is what a sudden, mad, unreasoning joy? Oh! What he might have been to me I had never known till then. All the longing which, through lonely, neglected years, had filled my heart seemed to find utterance in that kiss. Did he understand it? He only said,

"There is another world, Maud."

"Shall I call your mother?" I asked; for it seemed to me his face was growing gray and was not still, but darting to move, and slipping my fingers fearfully now and then over his pulse to see if it was beating. I knew that there had been two hours, and it seemed to me that I could still feel a faint stir under my fingers. I knew I ought to call his mother and Dr. Austin, but I was hard to draw my hand away from the grasp that still held it; and there was something perilously sweet in the thought of being alone with him for the last time. I thought once or twice—could I help it?—that I should have died if he had been my lover and not Edith's; and once I remembered with a secret thrill of joy that doubtless I had drunk the fever in that kiss which he had given. I wondered if he knew it and had thought of it when he said there was another world.

Also to a half-hour this morning came and Dr. Austin with it. He stood at the bedside and touched the still face upon the pillow; bent his head to the lips, and then put aside the medicine with a repulse under them. I thought I was too well prepared for the worst for any thing like alarm; but the manner startled me, and my words almost shocked me as I asked—

"Is he dead?"

"No, Maud. He sleeps, and with such tending as you and his mother give him he will get better."

I did not know that I was glad or sorry, cold and firm—but I know I must be alone. I commanded my voice to say, in my usual tones,

"Then perhaps you will call Mrs. Gresham, and I begin to know now that I am tired."

"I should think you were. I have let you half kill yourself. I am sure you don't come back till to-morrow morning."

I smiled.

"Of course I shall watch to-night as usual. I know enough of illness to be aware that such a convalescence is critical and needs close watching."

"Come if you do, so close as that. I stay with Captain Gresham to-night myself. I am resolved to be mistaken."

I found he was in earnest. In the afternoon a message came that, as Dr. Austin was going to a distant hospital on the following morning, I must come to the hospital for a few moments now if I liked.

I went and found our patient, oh so pale and changed and wretched-looking, but better, as even my inexperienced eyes could see. His mother was with him. When I came she cried, and told me that I had saved her boy's life. Dr. Austin said he was owing to my care that he had not died. How could she thank me? What could she ever do to let me know how grateful she was?

"But now I fear Maud's turn for needing care will come," said Frank Gresham's hollow voice. And then as I bent over him he whispered, so that no one else heard it—

"I believe I was mad, last night, Maud. I felt sure I was going to die, and I did not care if you did. Forgive me. I shall never forgive myself."

I forgave him easily enough. I did not think I had caught the fever. I did not feel its poison current in my veins. My blood flowed healthfully, and my heart beat with a tranquil pulse. But I did caught it, if I should die—ah, it would not be so sad. There are things in this world harder to bear than death, and I thought such might await me when I went home.

It was a month before we were able to move our patient. His illness had carried him into the very valley and shadow of death, and the steps by which he climbed up again were slow. I did not devote myself wholly to him. There were others in the hospital who learned to know me, and I think found my services useful. They were soldiers, however, from any more night duty, and seldom saw Captain Gresham except in the presence of his mother. He did make me his debtor, however, and I read him letters from Edith, full of felicitations on his recovery, and expressions of sympathy and affection. I offered to answer them for him, but he refused. He would wait, he said, until he could write himself, which he should see her. Once she wrote offering to come to Washington. He smiled when I read him the proposal.

"I suppose you write to her?" he asked.

"Certainly. Ever since I have been here I have sent a bulletin of our progress almost every day."

Then perhaps you will not object to give her a message from me. Tell her I thank her, but we had better put off our meeting till I can come home. I could not bear to expose her to the infected, hospital atmosphere. She is too lovely to run any risks."

I wondered if any satire was latent in this remark. I wrote home precisely what he said; and I suppose Edith accepted her quietus in it, for she wrote back, with cheerful acquiescence, that she would do whatever dear Frank thought best.

He never alluded to what he had passed between us on the night when we both thought he was dying. Sometimes I half fancied it had all been a dream, and that I had with me days by day, constantly recurring and asserting its right to a place in my memory.

Before we left Washington Dr. Austin asked me to marry him. He was not only a good man, but a true lover. Frank, who loved him enthusiastically, had told me many tales of his unselfishness and bravery. He was all that I had once said I wanted in a husband—possessed whom strength and courage would never fail me, let fate tax them ever so much. And yet—why was it?—I did not like Dr. Austin. I liked, and he accepted my decision like the noble man he was.

"You have never given me reason, Miss Hunter, to think you cared for me," he said, in answer to a fear of mine—"not the slightest. My only ground for hope was that I loved you so well; and I shall not cease to love you because you can not return it. You are my friend, I know. If you hear that I am gone, some day, I think you will drop a tear for the memory of a man who loved you enough to live or die for you."

I could not help the tears which blinded my eyes as his words. Indeed, as he walked away from me, that I could have loved him, and so have found rest in that devotion! Then a sudden fear crossed my tender mood which I an half ashamed to confess, it was so weak—what would my sisters say if they could know that one man had offered to marry me?

The traces of the horrible fever had all left Captain Gresham's face before we carried him home, all save a paleness which, it seemed to me, made him handsomer and more interesting than ever. His mother, who had been with her son but a day before I left the room, I saw her glance of scrutiny, and the smile of satisfaction which followed it. "I have sent out before I start to-day," he said, and heard them address a single word to each other. It was as if all love longing which had arrived had been before. Mrs. Gresham had begged me to remain with her, and assist her to get a little settled down in her new home. But the fatigue of the long, hard journey, added to all she had passed through before, had told sadly upon her strength. Of course we had sent word to her sister and my parents the first thing in the morning. Edith had returned with the messenger in high health, radiant beauty, and a most loving letter to me. How I longed to know, as I went out of the library and sat down alone in the parlor, whether her presence would have the old effect on me! I would be happy, should she had foiled him in his hour of trouble, become to him a thing of scorn and mockery, and cease to think his love had been a mistake?

I did not hear any footfall, and I sat leaning my face on my hands, when some one spoke my name, per not very gently. I looked up. Edith stood there, her whole being kindled to a white heat of passion of which I had not dreamed. Was it wounded love or injured pride? How the color glowed on her cheek—how her eyes gathered to one point! Her beauty was terrible. Her words were fierce, but low:

"You have played your game well, sister Maud. Sickness and nursing proved trump cards. I never liked you—I do not like you now. But I must have grace when I come to die—you have played your game well. Frank Gresham went away my worshiper; he has come back yours. It was a terribly underhanded way to gain his love, and it is worthily accomplished."

"It was at least one for which you were not ready to make much sacrifice," I retorted, stung to the taunt by her insolence.

"No, I was not ready to risk life and loveliness in a pestilent hospital, because but his wife or sister ought to have filled. Besides, I did not know of what weak material my lover was made, and how dangerous it would be to be out of his sight when another woman was in it. It is as well. If I had gone to Washington I might never have escaped the misery of marriage with a man who has proved himself fickle and beyond words false."

She swept out of the room, and without consideration, urged on by I know not what impulse, I went to Captain Gresham. The moment I had opened the door I knew that in his presence I remembered that she had said that he loved me, and was fiercely angry at myself for going to him. But it was too late to retreat, for his eyes were on me. He, at least, looked far from miserable. He smiled as he said, in the old clear tones I had once thought never to hear again,

"Your sister has refused to fulfill our engagement, miss Maud."

"Did you ask her?"

"Certainly I did, but not till I had told her a few plain truths, which did not seem agreeable."

"For instance?"

"For instance, that I thought, if she had ever had one spark of true love, honest, worthy love for me, it would have been she, not you, who would have come to me at Washington. I had idealized her before she was kind in discovering to me my mistake. I told her, moreover, that I loved you, and, if she chose to marry me, I never should. In that case, though romance between us was over, I promised to make her a kind and faithful husband."

"And you would have married her?"

"Certainly, if, knowing all, she had chosen me by my wife. She had my promise."

How I liked the look in his eyes which enforced his words! I had never seen a man to whom honor was above all, that man was Frank Gresham. He was silent a moment, and then he said,

"She refused my offer scornfully, bitterly. My past with her is all over. I am free now to tell you what I have longed to say every day for the last four weeks. I love you, Maud, with a very deep love of my heart. Will you share my life?"

I did not think it necessary to tell him that I loved him. I made sure that he must have known that. I said, instead, the first thing that came into my mind:

"They will condemn me, Frank, all of them. They will say I went on to Washington to supplant Edith. I shall be called unwomanly and unsisterly."

All the more reason then that my love should shelter you. And you are not free from misconception. Not for what I have done to-day, however. Feeling as I now do toward Edith, it would have been simply ungenerous to act and my own soul be smartized her without telling her. But I was very wrong in the first place. I ought not to have been alone with you. I should have walked longer, heard more cautions. I can never cease to blame myself for my rash indiscretion. But I think no one who knows you can ever doubt that you came to me out of pure friendliness—to help and comfort me and my mother when your sister would not come."

Then I told him all Edith had said, and he tried to convince me that in no one else could she see what I had done with her eyes; and so he comforted me, and made me lighter of heart at last.

"But there is one thing you have not told me," he said, holding my hand when I was going away, "and that is when you began to love me. How long has it been, Maud?"

I saw he would not let me go without his answer, so I told him the truth.

"All my life, I think, but I did not know it till that night when I thought you were dying."

"And you married Austin for me?" He was a noble fellow. I don't see how you could help loving him."

"How old you know?"

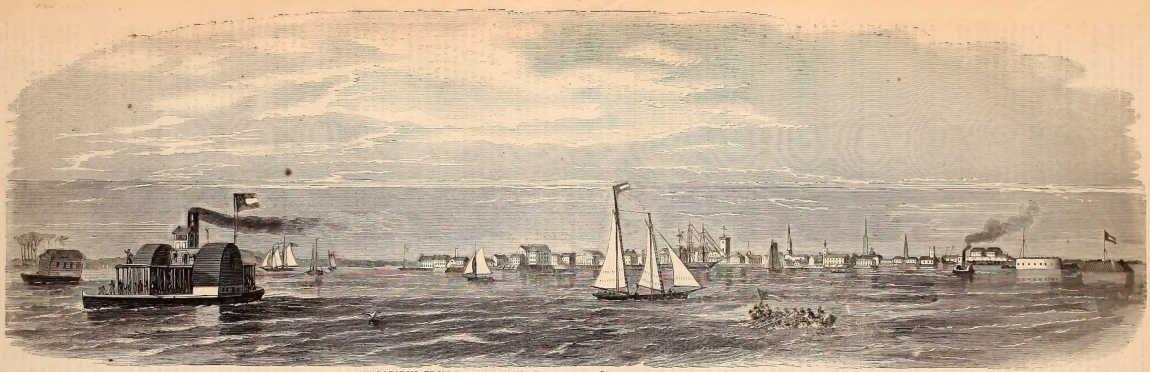
"He told me, Maud, of my love and my hopes."

He was growing demonstrative, and I got away from him. I did not seem right to let him love me. I could not divest myself of the idea that he ought to belong to Edith. I longed for counsel. Such opportunity I found it. That night I went out my father was waiting. I would not let him go back to Washington, but I had him with me. I did not blame me. He gave me his consent and his blessing, and promised to make it all smooth for me at home.

I think he had hard work at first; but after a time he managed to persuade mother and Maud to congratulate me. I had not dared to write one word to my cousin out of the family. Then he compromised with Edith by giving her unlimited spending-money, and promising that Maud should pass the rest of the season with our aunt in New York. When she had gone away I went home, and Frank, my acknowledged lover, came to me from away from me.

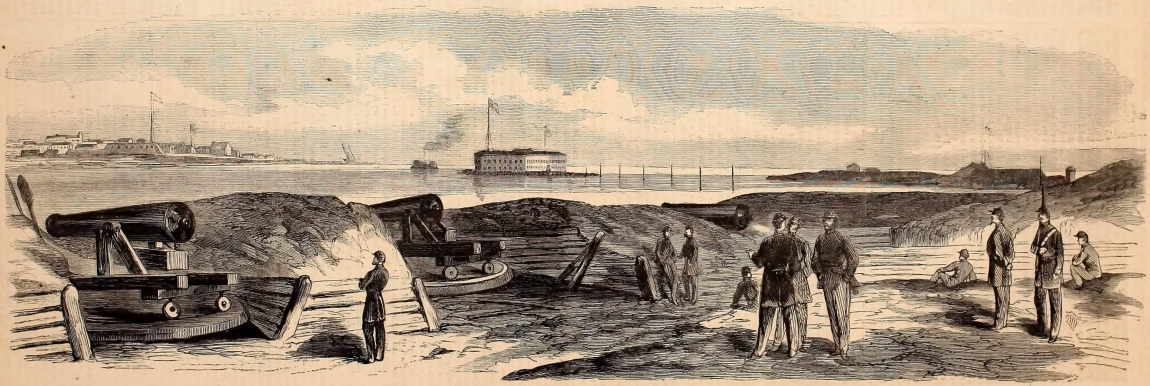
Last week he came to me with news that his leave of absence had expired, and as he was well enough now, he must proceed at once to report himself at headquarters. Whatever reasons prevented my heart I tried not to show it, and answered him cheerfully.

"But I want to leave my wife behind me," he resumed. "My mother would be happier to have you there, and if I am wounded there must be no question as to my right to come to you."



"As I came before, I think you need not fear what I should do now," I said.

"I do not choose to run any risks. Had you not rather I would think of you as mine for life and wish for it? Or had you not rather they should call you by my name?"



That thought decided me. Then, too, I was not sorry to be permanently away from home before Edith returned.

We were married, quietly indeed, with no pomp of feasts or bridesmaids, no radiance of satin raiment. It was not a time for mirth when we, who were made one to-day, were to part to-morrow; but even with that future near at hand I was a happy bride.

What shall I say of our parting? If I wept it was not till I had no the last of him. No tears touched his lips with my kisses—no moan broke discordantly in my benediction. He is gone. I wait for him. I shall wait, God knows best how long. But when two souls are made one it is not in the power of the universe to divide them. Hence all partings, all sorrows, must be but for a night, and through them shines the sure joy which "cometh in the morning." so although that morning break with a glory not of this world.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF FORT SUMTER, APRIL 7, 1863.—FROM A SKETCH BY AN EYE-WITNESS.—[SEE PAGE 277.]

CONFISCATION OF ANGLO-REBEL COTTON.

THE design on page 273, from a sketch by Mr. Theodore R. Davis, illustrates the SEIZURE AND HANDLING OF COTTON IN THE SOUTHWEST. With the sketch Mr. Davis sends us the following letter:

"AMERICAN HOUSE, WASHINGTON CO., MISS.,
159 MILES ABOVE VICKSBURG,
Monday Night, March 30, 1863.

"General T. E. G. Ransom, one of the youngest Brigadiers in the army, and an excellent and a gallant officer, who has been severely wounded several times, having learned some weeks ago that a large amount of cotton, pledged to the British Government at seven cents per pound, by the sole distant Confederacy, was hidden near the American Bend, determined to make an effort to rescue it, and at once set about forming an expedition for the purpose.

"Rapid as were the General's movements, he did not succeed in reaching the place before more than half of the staple was burned by the guerrillas; but the remainder, something over three thousand bales, he has secured to our Government, and has been engaged for some days past in hauling it in, and putting it on board of the transports as I seen in the sketch.

"The cotton was marked "C. S. A.," and with the rebel and British flags, as is shown in the upper centre of the picture. The left corner represents a huge pile of the staple covered with tar and with boards, to protect it from the inclemency of the weather. The right corner reveals the negroes hailing the "free soil" from the steam launch and cane-brakes where it was concealed; and the main sketch exposes the shipping of the floculent fibre on board the United States and other steamers lying at the shore.

"The poor contrabands toiled most energetically to bring in the cotton, and were very instrumental in discovering it, hoping by their fidelity and labor to obtain their freedom, for which they manifest a most artent longing.

"Alas for their vain hopes! After all the service they had rendered they were not allowed to go aboard of the boats, General Grant having issued a special order prohibiting their removal, because no provision has been made for them at Young's Point.

"The disappointment and distress of the negroes were painfully apparent when they were made this unwelcome discovery, and as they stood in crowds—men, women, and children—along the levee, with sorrow-stamped faces, their grief was pitiful to witness—all the more so because they did not murmur or complain.

"Scenes was right: Small griefs are loud; great woes are dumb. D."

SUFFOLK.

THE view of SUFFOLK, Virginia, which we publish on page 276, possesses some interest just now in connection with the attack of the rebels under Longstreet. The place has been fortified, and is held by a considerable force of Union troops under General Peck, who, it is said, feels satisfied of his ability to maintain himself. Suffolk is a small, filthy town of great antiquity, small population, little trade, and a great deal of Virginia dirt and Virginia pride.

CHARLESTON FROM THE INSIDE.

WE publish on page 284 two illustrations of CHARLESTON, from sketches made for a London paper by Mr. Vizetelly, who is now in Secessia. Mr. Vizetelly has a high opinion of the strength of the various defensive works which protect Charleston harbor, and considers Forts Johnson and Moultrie almost impregnable. The open battery, without casemates or adequate traverses, does not, however, impress one with any great idea of power; and we doubt not, when our iron-clads renew the attack that they will find Fort Sumter and the other works pervious to iron argument.

Mason & Hamlin,

Manufacturers of Cabinet Organs, Harmoniums, and Melodeons, take pleasure in referring to the numerous professors generally as to the superiority of their instruments, which they claim to be entirely free from any in the world. They have had the honor of receiving the only GOLD MEDAL ever awarded to any organ in this country, and though constantly exhibiting their instruments, have declined all competition, failed to carry off the first prize. M. & H. are singularly free from objectionable features in their Cabinet Organs, which are winning golden opinions from the highest sources. Among the distinguished organists who pronounce them the best instruments of their class in the world are Mr. Morgan, of Trinity Church; of Rev. Messrs. Ward Beecher's Church; Wels, of Chris Church; Margrath, of St. Paul's; Marshall, of Calvary Church; Berg, of Zion Church; William Mason, and many others. Prices of Cabinet Organs, $70 to $600; of Melodeons, $50 to $100, with six to twelve stops, $200 to $500 each. Warerooms, Nos. 5 and 7 Mercer Street, New York. Address MASON BROTHERS.

HUBBARD BRO'S
IMPORTERS and MANUFACTURERS OF WATCHES
NEW YORK.

Have the pleasure of announcing to their numerous Friends and Patrons in the Army, that they are prepared to fill orders and transmit parcels to any point within the rebel cars and pronquilotte. Watches so forwarded are returned, we take upon ourselves all risks of Transportation, and guarantee a safe delivery.

Improved Solid Sterling Silver Lever, ENGLISH LADIES SIZE, in good running order and warranted accurate timepieces. This is an entire new pattern, made expressly for American Army and Navy use. They are manufactured in a very handsome manner, with Asphalt centres, and are certified to keep good time, all in all, they are a most desirable Watch. Frank Leslie's Illustrated News of Feb. 21st, '63, says: "HUBBARD BRO'S TIMEKEEPERS are becoming proverbial for their reliability and accuracy. They are particularly valuable for officers in the army and travelers." The price is SEVENTY-FIVE DOLLARS ($75), and they are sold at a much lower rate east of ordinary English Levers, while they will readily retail for a larger price. Postage, per case, $1 84.

RAILWAY TIMEKEEPERS, for Army Speculation.—The Army and Navy Gazette of Philadelphia, in its February Number, says: "This importation of the HUBBARD BROS., of NEW YORK, fills a long-felt want being a handsome and serviceable Watch at an extremely low figure." Superior in style and finish! Indesirable for rapid raising gazettes and Steamboat men.

MAGIC TIME OBSERVERS. the Perfection of Mechanism.—A REVIEW.—The OPERA GLASS, OR LADY'S OR GENTLEMEN'S WATCH COMBINED.—The following notice from the correspondent of the New York Illustrated News, the leading pictorial paper of the United States, in the issue of Jan. 10th, 1863, on page 141, voluntarily says: "We have been shown a most pleasing novelty, of which the HUBBARD BROS., of New York, are the sole importers. It is called the MAGIC TIME OBSERVER, and is a Hunting and Open Face Watch combined. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timekeeping watches that we have ever offered. It has within it and connected with the watch its own watch-guard attachment, rendering a key seriously unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of Sterling Silver, the outer case of which is gilt. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timekeeper." Price each, engraved, per case of half dozen, $104 00. Sample Watches, in neat morocco boxes, for those preparing to buy at wholesale, $35. If sent by mail the postage is 36 cents. Retails at $100 and upwards.

☞ We have no agents or circulars. Buyers must deal with us direct, either from this advertisement or Illustrated Cash in Advance. Remittances may be made in United States money, or bank drafts payable in any of the cities. If you wish goods sent by mail, enclose the amount of the postage with your order. Address all letters to full.

CONSTITUTION, vs.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

Here the state of the Constitution that determines the character of local diseases—a local disease may be defined as the cause of bringing on a proportional constitutional derangement. The importance of

BRANDRETH'S PILLS

in either case is hardly to be estimated. The organs of the stomach and bowels almost seem supreme in aiding a reaction to health with their assistance.

TWENTY YEARS EXPERIENCE

FROM THE PEN OF

DR. B. MERRITT.

New Brunswick, Jan. 5, 1857.

I am now 69 years of age. 15 years of my past life I spent in the ministry. For 20 years I have used Brandreth's Pills as my family medicine, and I wish no other. During these 20 years I have never had an occasion to call in a physician to my family, save in the sickness of my wife with childbed.

D. N. MERRITT,

Associate publisher of the Methodist Protestan.

DR. THOMAS R. HAZARD, of Portsmouth, R. I., says: "That twenty-seven years' experience with the medicine confirms his belief that in very few cases would the Physician's services be required if Brandreth's Pills were promptly used in the early stages of disease."

MR. D. J. TENNEY, the well-known jeweler of New York, now residing at the Astor House, was cured of dyspepsia and costiveness of many years standing by

Just Tribute to Merit.

AT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, LONDON, July 11th, 1862,

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners, the composition of all prominent manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Prepared Corn Flour" of the rest other countries notwithstanding. The food and luxury of the million, without a single fault. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Makes Puddings, Custards, Cornflour Blanc Mange, &c., without isinglass, milk few or no eggs, at a cost scrimishing the most economical. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Cakes. It is also excellent for thickening cream sauces, gravies, Soups, Ice and meats, crepe, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. A little more will produce a delicious Cream for coffee, chocolate, tea, &c. Put up in 1 pound packages, under the trademark "Maizena," "Maizena," "Maizena." A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Manufactured at Glen Cove, Long Island.

AYER'S

Cherry Pectoral

For the Rapid Cure of

COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,

BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH, CROUP,

ASTHMA, and CONSUMPTION.

This remedy has won for itself such notoriety from its cures of every variety of pulmonary disease, that it is entirely unnecessary to enter into any statement of its virtues in any community where it has been employed. So wide and thorough are the knowledge and experience of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons publicly known who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs by its use. Nor is it in these cases only that it performs the marvelous cures by which it is distinguished. Its penetrating medicine of its kind is too apparent to escape observation, and hence there is scarcely a village in the land which neglects what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs which are incident to our climate. Let but the first symptom of a tickle upon the lungs, but for the milder varieties of Colds, Coughs, Hoarseness, &c., and for Children, it is the pleasantest and safest medicine that can be obtained. During the long fevers that sometimes use themselves sensible, we need no more than assure the people its quality to keep it in their houses, and it will ever be found that the genuine article is sold by all Druggists and Dealers in medicine everywhere.

1,200,000 Acres, in Farms of 40, 80, 120, 160 Acres and upwards, in ILLINOIS, the Garden State of America.

The Illinois Central Railroad Company offer, ON LONG CREDIT, the beautiful and fertile PRAIRIE LANDS lying along the whole line of their Railroad, 700 MILES IN LENGTH, upon the most Favorable Terms, for enabling Farmers, Manufacturers, Mechanics, and Workingmen to make for themselves and their families a competence, and a HOME! They can call THEIR OWN, as will appear from the following statements:

ILLINOIS

Is about equal in extent to England, with a population of 1,727,666, and a soil capable of supporting 20,000,000. No State in the Valley of the Mississippi offers so great an inducement to the Settler as the State of Illinois. There is no part of the world where all the conditions of climate and soil so admirably combine to produce those two great staples, CORN and WHEAT.

CLIMATE.

Nowhere can the industrious farmer secure such immediate results from his labor as on these deep, rich, loamy soils, cultivated with so much ease. The climate, from the extreme southern part of the State to the Terre Haute, Alton, and St. Louis Railroad, a distance of nearly 500 miles, is well adapted to Winter

WHEAT, CORN, COTTON, TOBACCO,

Peaches, Pears, Tomatoes, and every variety of fruit and vegetables is grown in great abundance, from which Chicago and other Northern markets are furnished from four to six weeks earlier than the more immediate vicinity. Between the Terre Haute, Alton, and St. Louis Railway and the Kankakee and Illinois River, a distance of 129 miles on the Branch, and 136 miles on the Main Trunk), lies the great Corn and Stock raising portion of the State.

THE ORDINARY YIELD

of Corn is from 50 to 75 bushels per acre. Cattle, Horses, Mules, Sheep, and Hogs are raised here at a small cost, and yield large profits. It is believed that no section of country presents greater inducements for Dairy Farming than the Prairies of Illinois, a branch of farming to which little attention has been paid, and which must yield sure profitable results. Between the Kankakee and Illinois Rivers, and Chicago and Dunleith (a distance of 56 miles on the Branch and 147 miles on the Main Trunk), Pleasant Hill, Spring Wheat, Corn, &c. are produced in great abundance.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

The Agricultural products of Illinois are greater than those of any other State. The Winter Wheat crop of 1861 was estimated at 35,000,000 bushels, while the Corn crop yields not less than 140,000,000 bushels, besides the crop of Oats, Barley, Rye, Buckwheat, Potatoes, Sweet Potatoes, Pumpkins, Squashes, Flax, Hemp, Rice, Clover, Cabbage, &c.

PRICES AND TERMS OF PAYMENT—ON LONG CREDIT.

" in seven years	100 00

Address Land Commissioner, Illinois Central Railroad, Chicago, Ill.

Tobacco, Sorghum, Grapes, Peaches, Apples, &c., which go to swell the vast aggregate of production in this fertile region. Over Four Million tons of produce were sent out the State of Illinois during the past year.

STOCK RAISING.

In Central and Southern Illinois uncommon advantages are presented for the extension of Stock raising. All kinds of Cattle, Horses, Mules, Sheep, Hogs, &c., of the best breeds, yield handsome profits; large fortunes have already been made, and the field is open for others to enter with the fairest prospects of like results. DAIRY FARMING also presents its inducements to many.

CULTIVATION OF COTTON,

The experiments in Cotton culture are of very great promise. Commencing in latitude 39 deg. 30 min. see Morton on the Branch, and Assumption on the Main Line), the Company own thousands of acres well adapted to the production of this fibre. A settler having a family of young children, can turn their youthful labor to a most profitable account in the growth and favorable curability of this plant.

THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD

Traverses the whole length of the State, from the banks of the Mississippi and Lake Michigan to the Ohio. At its same importe, the Railroad runs through the centre of the best lands, and in other side of the road and whole length lie the lands offered for sale.

CITIES, TOWNS, MARKETS, DEPOTS.

There are Ninety-eight Depots on the Company's Railway, giving access to very many cities, Cities, Towns, and Villages are situated at convenient distances throughout the State, and the most desirable assortment may be found as readily as in the oldest cities of the Union, and a new home on it as early as the first settler in a new province.

EDUCATION

Mechanics and workingmen will find the free school system encouraged by the State, and endowed with a large revenue for the support of schools. Churches may soon live in sight of the school, the college, the church, and grow up with the prosperity of the leading State in the Great Western Empire.

Address JOHN WILSON, Land Commissioner, Illinois Central Railroad, Chicago, Ill.

American Watches
For Soldiers
AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being rather manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for jockeying and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE VERY SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AN ACCURATE AND RELIABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, as at low a price as is asked for the fancy-named Ancres and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Boston, Mass.; which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

ON PICKET DUTY IN THE SWAMPS OF LOUISIANA.—[SEE PAGE 303.]

A WARNING.

We will remember it—England's "neutrality"—
We who have witness'd her cowardly craft;
Friendly in seeming, a foe in reality,
Wiping her eyes while she inwardly laughed.

We will remember when round us were lying
Thousands of gallant men, wounded and dead,
Rebels on all sides our gateway defying—
"Down with our Rival!" was all England said.

We will remember her sham aristocracy,
Cheerful and jubilee over our fall;
Hoping when Treason would stifle democracy,
Turning a deaf ear to Liberty's call.

We will remember her writhing emotion,
When her starved workmen were gasping for breath,
While stars of gratitude on next year the motion
Her ship-yards laden with weapons of death!

We will remember the Rebels making,
Riddled with balls "across England" and sent;
We will remember her laughing and winking,
Feasting arch-traitors on board of the Trent.

We will remember it when we are stronger,
When once again we stand gazed and erect;
Her neutral mask shall shield England no longer,
By her foul deeds she'll know what to expect!

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION AND THE PROSPECT.

THE great question, ever since this war began, has been one of money. Every one who knew the American people was from the first aware that they would fight, and fight without counting the natives, a large army could at all times be mustered from the ranks of the needy European immigrants who come here in search of living. But the doubtful point at the commencement of the war, and for a long time afterward, was, whether means could be obtained for the prosecution of a great war. When the traitor Cobb resigned the United States Treasury Department, the public credit stood so low that Government could not borrow $10,000,000; and leading banking houses shortly afterward refused to abide by their bids for a United States loan, on the ground that the accession of South Carolina had dissolved the confederacy known as the United States. The interest on the public debt due January 1, 1861, could not be even paid but for special temporary offers of money from New York bankers, who deemed the risk they ran great enough to warrant them in exacting twelve per cent per annum for the money they lent, in an easy six per cent. money market. Foreign opinion unanimously pronounced against our financial future. As we had quite a million railway shares and leading bonds to England for sale, it was easily decided by British politicians that we could not conduct a war without British capital; and leading journals confidently announced that if England would steadfastly refuse to lend us money we should be forced to make peace in a few weeks. Thus at home and abroad the very poorest opinion was entertained of the financial strength of the nation. It is probable that no financier ever undertook the management of a more discredited and seemingly hopeless concern than was the United States Treasury when it passed into the hands of SALMON P. CHASE, on 4th March, 1861.

Over two years have elapsed since then—two years of increasing war, waged on a scale previously unknown to history, and at a cost compared to which previous wars were mere guerrilla skirmishes. For at least a year we have kept four armies in the field, each of them greater than the average force of the armies with which Marlborough, Washington, and Napoleon waged war; and three naval squadrons, each of them superior in power, and tonnage to the fleet with which Nelson ruled the seas, and the western powers of Europe, at a later day, so imposingly assembled at Sebastopol and Cronstadt. Yet two years of war have not been years of uniform success for the national cause. Our defeats have been almost as numerous as our victories, and during nearly half this period the prospect, to men of weak nerve, has seemed doubtful and gloomy.

It is a fact, however, that, notwithstanding the bad credit which the nation enjoyed when the war broke out, and the enormous expenditures which have been incurred in its prosecution, we have paid every dollar of the expense without borrowing from abroad, and our credit stands better now than it ever did since the old days of peace. This is a fact so astounding, in view of past history and the present prospect, that the mind can hardly realize it without reflection.

When the war broke out the public debt was, in round numbers, $90,000,000. It is now, at the end of April, as nearly as possible, $1,000,000,000. Of this sum, rather over one-third consists of circulating notes of Government, paper-money, which the people hold and use, and which has become so popular as to exclude, in many localities, the old bank-notes; rather less than another third is funded debt; and the balance is certificates of deposit and indebtedness, payable either on call or within twelve months—a form of indebtedness apparently liable to become troublesome, but in reality, as is well understood by persons familiar with what statisticians call the law of averages, about as permanent, in ordinary times, as any funded debt.

If the war ended now, the United States, with a population of over 30,000,000 and a gross revenue of about $300,000,000, would find themselves encumbered with a debt of $1,000,000,000. If the war lasts another year the burden will be swelled to $1,400,000,000. If it last two years, to $2,225,000,000. Assuming that it does last two years more, the following table will show the relative position of the United States and some of the leading countries of Europe:

Countries.	Debt.	Population.	Revenue.
Great Britain..	$4,000,000,000	29,000,000	$270,000,000
France.....	1,375,000,000	40,000,000	300,000,000
Austria.....	1,000,000,000	35,000,000	125,000,000
Russia.....	1,100,000,000	65,000,000	165,000,000
Spain.....	1,000,000,000	15,000,000	60,000,000
United States..	2,250,000,000	30,000,000	300,000,000

It will thus be seen, that after having waged the most tremendous war ever known in the world for two years more, the United States would still have, in 1865, a lighter burden to bear, in proportion to their population, than Great Britain or Spain, and that the revenue, upon which public credit rests, would be in excess of that of every foreign nation except France. In point of fact, in view of the resources of this country, the enormous amount of capital on hand, the undeveloped fields for enterprise and capital, and the universal prosperity in ordinary times of the American people, a debt of $2,225,000,000, in all probability, be borne more lightly by citizens of the United States than one of $5 a head by citizens of Europe.

When the history of this war comes to be written, no part of it will attract more attention or command more admiration than the chapters which relate to finance. On no one hand, indeed, the future historian will be as extravagant in applause of Mr. Chase as some of our newspapers are noisy in censure. He is not entitled to previous financial Minister—not even Necker, Pitt, Morris, or Hamilton—ever achieved so much with so little capital to start upon.

If any one had predicted, in July, 1861, that after two years' war, at an expense of $900,000,000, citizens of the United States would offer money to Government on the basis of rates of interest, he would have been set down as a fool. Yet the fact is that people are carrying their money to the Sub-treasuries, and begging Government to take it at six per cent per annum for the money for ten years, and at five per cent. for the money for one year, and the subscriptions to the Bonds known as five-twenties, the poorest bond ever offered to the people, are coming in actually in excess of the capacity of the Treasury Department to supply the Bonds. People have to wait a fortnight after paying their money to get the Bonds. The magnificent voluntary spontaneous tender of millions daily by the people of the United States, how pitiful do the famous negotiations of Hamilton, Talleyrand, and Napoleon the Third appear! If public men must be judged by success, in the cabinet as in the field, Mr. Chase will have few rivals in history.

The issue of paper-money, which commenced last year, has been the subject of much discussion at home and abroad. Every one knows that Government here and in Europe pronounced it a fatal error, and predicted that the "greenback" would be as worthless as the Continental assignats and the Continental Money. Even the friends of the issue only justified it on the ground of inexorable necessity, and did not deny that it involved enormous risks and dangers. But now, after a year's trial of the system, an impartial judge must decide that it has worked well, and that the issue of paper-money has not hitherto been no proportion whatever to the benefits which it has conferred. It has increased the cost of living, and the wages of labor, in the form of use, necessity, and luxury. But it has simultaneously increased, and to a much greater extent, the capacity of consumers to pay for these articles. The poor man can still purchase his tea and his sugar and his coffee and his clothes, his labor commands much higher wages, and all the articles he produces, by agricultural or mechanical labor, fetch a higher price. Never has there been a time when labor was so to great demand throughout the country as now, or even at a time when an industrious, frugal man could live better on his wages, and save more, notwithstanding the high price of all articles of consumption. The effect of paper-money on the rate of labor springs directly from the effect of the issues of paper-money; which, coursing through the country like another rains through parched fields, have given new life to the land, developed agriculture and industry, generated enterprise in regions which were dormant, and enormously increased production and trade. The only check needs to glance at the monthly returns of railway traffic—which show an average increase over last year of nearly 50 per cent.—to perceive how prodigious an impetus these paper-money issues have given to the industry and activity of the country at large.

Another striking evidence of the substantial benefit which these paper-money issues have conferred upon the country, and especially upon the working classes, may be discovered in the progress of immigration from Europe. The immigration this year will be largely in excess of that of any previous year. The agent of a leading line of steamers states that he is receiving more money for passages from Liverpool to New York than he ever received before; though the money being paid here costs the party who pays it $7½ per £1 sterling, instead of $5, as formerly. Our Irish citizens certainly have no fears of the future of this country, and are better able than ever to help their friends to come here.

As to the collapse of the currency, so confidently predicted by foreigners and Copperheads, we are inclined to think that the March panic in gold has modified their views on this subject. The premium on gold at 170 when it fell to 138, without any Union victories or other palpable cause, have the best of reasons for entertaining a good opinion of the currency. They are not likely to be tempted again in the same scrape. Gold may and probably will rise again, as the tide of speculation ebbs and flows. But when it reaches the neighborhood of 170 he will be a bold man who will care to hold any of the precious metal overnight. Paper-money may be a very bad thing, and the currency may, according to all law and precedent, be bound to depreciate. But after the catastrophe of March we think that not even the most daring of the children of Israel will be ready to force its rise in gold when it approaches the point from which it so lately fell like the stick of a rocket.

The philosophy of Mr. Chase's issues of paper can be readily discerned. In European countries, where commerce was sluggish, industrial enterprise dull, and there were but few undeveloped resources, issues of paper depreciated rapidly because there was no legitimate channel for their employment. This country, on the contrary, has always been marked by a feverish activity in mercantile, industrial, and agricultural circles. Every body here is a worker and a producer, and money hitherto has found its work and his production limited by a want of money. Mr. Chase's issues have supplied the deficiency, and the money which in Austria or Turkey or South America would have accumulated idly in bank, and sunk in value from the want of demand for it, has here been greedily sought after by men who had mills to erect, ships to build, steam-engines to make, land to open, factories to start, railroads to extend, canals to dig, commercial houses to establish, and all manner of lucrative enterprises to found or further. On an aggregate paper and specie currency of perhaps $350,000,000 we produced wheat, and many of our most valuable resources undeveloped; and neglecting, for want of money, opportunities which were sure of yielding a handsome reward. A currency of $1,000,000,000 will insure the rapid development of those resources and those opportunities, and the profits made reaped will in large part be invested in Government securities, and will thus strengthen the Government credit, and protect the paper-money issued by the Treasury from depreciation.

THE LOUNGER.

THE ACADEMY EXHIBITION.

At the National Gallery we learn through the sentry at the door that it was useless to make criticism upon No. 240, Parson's Bridge of Sighs. "What!" said one spectator; "Bridge of Sighs? Where's the water? Here you are over town in Venice?" he asked of his companion. "Never," replied the other. "Well," continued the first, "it's what is about as much like the Bridge of Sighs as it is like your hat." In No. 254 Mr. De Haas has a quiet, characteristic view in Rotterdam. It recalls the river-views in Dickens, and Hood's poem written from Rotterdam to the girl he left behind him, and a set of Mr. Hennessy's delicate and suggestive pictures which hold the eye and mind with a vague spell of gentle interest. No. 265, The Balcony, is a bright picture by Mr. Frank Hall. Mr. Hall's secret sympathy with the characteristic aspects of Spanish life give a value to every study of his which is not its intrinsic merit. In this little work the olive skin, the brilliant eyes, the fan, the mantilla, are, of themselves, Spain. No. 270, A Love Story, one of Mr. Hennessy's subdued and effective sketches. No. 278, a cluster of golden grapes, admirably done, firm in form and transparent in color, by Mrs. H. F. Gray. It is no technical "good-for-a-lady" work, but an honest study skillfully painted. Mr. G. C. Lambdin, in 285, paints a page from nursery life, Cherries are Ripe, pray the Lady one. It has the sweet sentiment that characterizes all his works.

Some thirty or forty small pictures of various subjects and excellence, but all showing care, and feeling, and fancy, intervene between the Lambdin and No. 323, Gathering Fagots, by W. J. Hennessy. This, and its pendant, No. 324, Pruning Fagots, and No. 331, The First Day Out, are characteristic specimens of this artist. They are all very small works, but there is a viking tenderness and breath of feeling in them. The somber tone of No. 323 is harmonious with the simple pathos of the subject: a poor old woman with her back turned, painfully stooping, and feebly picking up sticks at the edge of a wood, while the chill evening comes on. In 334 the old woman, not so poor and forlorn, sits by a dormer window in an attic, and reads her Bible by the last lingering sunlight, which strikes upon the wall behind her; while, in No. 361, the aged, wrinkled grandam holds up by a handkerchief the tottering child, who is for the first time stepping from the floor. These are little works of peculiar promise—as all talent is promise. The color is not without crudity, and the painter has studied Frere, but he has studied him from sympathy, not from a fascination which results in mere imitation. Nos. 323, Reading the Lesson, and 366, Going Home to the Farm, are two of the character sketches for which Mr. Staigg is well known. They are simple, expressive, easily and skillfully done, and full of sentiment. Mr. Gray, in No. 335, seizes the musical picture of Clarke's Organ of the American Flag, and translates it into spirited form and color. There is a fine shading movement in the erect figure of Freedom, which echoes the ring of the famous lines. Near by, in No. 331, Mr. Kensett exhibits a Reminiscence of Lake George, whose transparent tranquillity is spell of dreams to the spectator. Eternal summer calm broods upon the place where this picture hangs.

The small room is full of small works, many more of which will yet doubtless call for mention and praise. Meanwhile, let us remember how much patient labor and close study are represented in pictures which do not greatly impress us, or which seem to be positively poor; and especially ought we critics, who stand before them with the dreadful pencil in our hands—especially ought we to remember that nothing is easier than to ridicule a work which is really excellent, and give a pang to the generous, toiling heart at least, which all the pleasure of a criticism can not excuse. The office of a critic in the Gallery is not to shine at the expense of the painters and their pictures—for their criticisms are but the words of the impressions produced by a momentary glance at works that have been carefully wrought. How many of us have studied as the artist has the aspect of Nature which we censure in his work? How many of us understand the mysteries of the craft of which we speak so learnedly? Of the many passages who discourse upon the Exhibition this one confesses that in the course of any academy of engravings fiction in the pictures is lost in his admiration of the long and brilliant record of study, patience, and skill which is spread upon the walls. Many of these works are the witnesses of an inspiring self-sacrifice and devotion, if not of genius or superior talent. They are evidence of character, at least, if not of capacity. So if you do not find a work you cause for you may get something else as Valuable.

We hope to take another turn through the rooms, for we remember several pictures of which we have not spoken.

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR.*

KINGLAKE'S history is the most humiliating book for England. He calls it the Invasion of the Crimea, but it is his own shame. It is a story of the invasion and conquest of British honor. Exposing with elaborate detail and relentless precision the folly which Lord Raglan's letters and a few other conspirators possessed themselves of France in the night, deluding him as a charlatan and envoy, who will be presently seen a man whose conduct and career outraged the self-respect of every gentleman in Europe—he proceeds to deal with the more terrible theme of the betrayal of England tied to the conquering car of this contemptible man, and the honor of the proud English nobility not revolting at his success in cheating Windsor Castle with all the customary ceremonials of an equal monarch—good friend and brother.

With a blush of shame that glows upon every page, this English gentleman describes the wily policy by which the British Cabinet was bamboozled by the French adventurer. He tells of the bloody blow which Louis Napoleon struck in Paris, how he caught laugh in Queen Victoria; how France awoke on the 3d December, 1851, to find every famous general of her armies, every distinguished statesman of the country, imprisoned, and a half dozen men masters of her destiny; and then his reluctant but indignant pencil traces the outline of the scene in which with that same spirit had Louis Napoleon welcomes the proud British people to Boulogne Somerset, at the Tuileries, and presents him, the closest friend of Wellington and beloved British soldier, to his own accomplice in perjury and massacre, St. Arnaud, Minister of War.

At this point the fiery indignation of the historian breaks forth into a denunciation of the citizens of France who do not know the man who has masqueraded his way to the Tuileries apostrophizing the English gentlemen in whose company he is guest at the Tuileries with the consent of Britain.

Mr. Kinglake's theory of the Crimean war is that it was a necessity which should have been and would have been peacefully settled by the concert of the four great powers, but that the Czar's nation was obliged to divert the eyes of France from itself, and therefore forced England into a separate alliance, and make war unnecessary; by the unsalacy of this talent over that of the British Cabinet; that there was no reason whatever for such an alliance, and that the consequences were an unnecessary war and the obsequious subservience of Great Britain to the necessities of a French adventurer.

A more splendid work for an Englishman to read and ponder we can not imagine. And a more lucrative work for an American to read, who has for two years been hearing John Bull denouncing our war as unnecessary, foolish, wicked, and hopeless, it is impossible to imagine.

The work has excited a profound interest, and can not fail to have a very strong and permanent influence upon English opinion. It is written with great earnestness, picturesqueness, and vigor; and the episodical account of the French coup d'état is the most vivid and complete in our language.

FIGHTING AND TWADDLING.

BECAUSE you can't make a pooch-tree out of a quince-tree, is there any reason why you should not get it to bear the best quinces possible? If the Lord has made the African race and all colored men so essentially and utterly inferior to the pale races, is there any harm in helping them to do all they can do? Because a man shows no symptom of rivaling Newton or surpassing Shakespeare, must he therefore be degraded, despised, and outraged, and what capacity the Lord has given him be hopelessly extinguished? Why, good Sir, who are so busily declaring that colored men were made to be kicked and cuffed by white men, suppose that we all got our deserts how would you and I fare? If what you call superior capacity is to relegate all inferior capacities to contempt and permanent deprivation of common human rights, you and I are in a bad way, for there are plenty of people who are in every point our superiors.

The Lord has made negroes to be slaves, declare the slaveholding doctors, and you must not try to make soldiers of them: you can not do it if you would, and if you could they would be good for nothing. That was a pretty enough argument until the facts knocked it to pieces. For in no engagement in which the colored soldiers have taken part have they shown themselves in any way inferior to the best. Here, for instance, by the recent arrival from New Orleans, we learn that one hundred and eighty of the Louisiana black Union soldiers routed a force of three hundred rebel cavalry and a company of infantry. The black Louisianians, late slaves and others, took a set of colors from the retreating white chivalry. You may read it in the correspondence of a paper which editorially assures us that no colored soldiers can be raised, and that when they are raised they will not fight! Let us know the place where they have had a chance and have not fought.

But while those who do fight fight well, there is no better proof of the common sense and common humanity of the colored men than that they are in no great haste to flock in multitudes and fight for those who studiously insult and despise them. We should think him a pretty poor Yankee who was very anxious to take up the cudgels for a man who incessantly told him that he was the scum and offscouring and lees and nasty refuse of creation, and who took care that he should be believed by spitting in the Yankee's face, and kicking him, and knocking him down, and insisting upon his working forever without wages. If, despite all this, the Yankee should take up arms and fight for his abuser, we should say either he is the best and most heroic of men, or he is the meanest-spirited dastard that ever lived.

FROM A DIARY.

It was a good meeting this afternoon in Madison Square, although the air was chilly and the sky threatening. Scott made a capital figure-head; but how utterly factitious the enthusiasm for the old gentleman is! In consideration of his unquestioned services we agree to treat him as if we thought him a great man, for somebody must play that part. No king in the world looks so well as Scott did, dressed in full black with a broad blue ribbon, and bowing his towering white head to the crowd. I was standing in the crowd listening to John Van Buren, and observed near me Jones, who was attending in the next crowd to the speaker at the next stand. Jones I have long known as a man of moderate, sensible views, as becomes one who has large interests at stake. Smith was near him, one of the Hartington breed of loyal men.

"Hallo!" said Smith, "nobody's making a speech here worth hearing but John Van Buren."

"I am very well content," replied Jones.

"Who is that?" asked Smith.

"Jobson," answered Jones.

"Pshaw! a d—d Abolitionist," sneered Smith.

"Yes," said Jones, in an audible voice, and turning his great square shoulders so as to confront the other, and looking him straight in the eyes—"Yes, and every man here who is not a d—d Abolitionist is a d—d traitor."

Smith stared blankly, but said nothing more.

Certainly no phrase ever did so much service as the one by which Smith described Jobson. I was dining at S.'s the other day, when F. turned round to J. at the table, and said, half bitterly:

"I will take a hundred shares if you will only kill off these —— Abolitionists and stop the war."

J. burst out into a loud laugh. "Don't you think it a little late in the day to talk such rubbish as that? You've used that phrase all your life, and you haven't the least idea what you're talking about. There isn't a man at this table who can tell what an Abolitionist is, except that he is a man who hates slavery, which is only another way for saying that he is a man. And as for bringing on the war, why, I remember, my dear F., when Yancey came to the Cooper Institute in the last campaign, and gave fair warning that if he and his party didn't succeed they'd raise Ned: and the next day you gave a hundred dollars to the side for which he spoke. You gave a good many other hundred dollars during the canvass, and each one was a premium upon rebellion. Yancey went straight home and said, 'They're all right at the North. F. has given a thousand dollars for our success. Whatever we do he'll wink at it.' You're a pretty man to talk about stopping the war by killing off other folks. If you and your kind had said to Yancey and his kind, 'None of that talk! We're not going to roast our pig by burning the house down,' he would have shrugged his shoulders, gone home, and said, 'We can't count upon 'em,' and there would have been no war. No, my dear F., when Jeff Davis and Toombs and the rest began to secede, it wasn't Garrison or Wendell Phillips they relied upon; it was you gentlemen in New York and elsewhere who had given them reason to suppose that they might rely upon you. And as for ending the war by killing off, you had better apply the method to the smaller number, not to the greater. It would take you a dreadfully long day to count the d—d Abolitionists."

F. smiled good-naturedly, and replied, "Why, I really believe you are one of them," in such a cheerful tone that it was perfectly clear he was. And I, who remember a score of years of dining out in New York, can not be enough amazed at what I constantly hear and see.

BROADWAY.

BROADWAY is clearly doomed to have a railroad; but whether it shall be for Mr. George Law's profit or for that of the city are questions in dispute. What special services Mr. Law has rendered the city or the State that he should prevail against the strongly-expressed wishes of the powerful proprietors upon Broadway and the general sentiment of the city does not appear. In what way his supremacy over Broadway is to lighten the taxes is also not evident. In fact, who is to gain by the enterprise, except some stage companies, the Legislators who have received money, if any have received money, and Mr. George Law, are questions that remain open for answering.

It is the universal impression, which may be a universal mistake, that neither the necessity of the street, nor the desire of the property owners upon it, but the lobbying of Mr. Law, has carried his bill through the Legislature. On the other hand, the grant to the Harlem Company under their charter secures an income to the city. Every citizen, of course, gives his sympathy and interest to the Harlem project. Doubtless, whichever prevails, the traveling public will be equally accommodated and the road equally well laid. But it is a good thing to lighten taxes at the same time, and it is a bad thing to know that the convenience of the city of New York is at the mercy of any man, however rich, however much of a public benefactor, however eminent and honorable, he may be.

IN RE THE EMPEROR OF CHINA'S NAVY.

ONE of the most faithful and influential friends of this country in Great Britain writes to the Lounger as follows:

"I am not surprised that you should be irritated at the ship-building for the Confederates in British yards; it is shameful and unworthy of British merchants, and our Government has, in my opinion, shown culpable remissness in putting the law in force. I do not, however, believe that there has been on the part of the Government any intentional violation of neutrality. I am happy to say that the feeling in this country on the subject among all who favor the North is exceedingly strong, and, I presume, has already found expression in adequate terms at a meeting which was to have taken place at Manchester on Monday, but of which I have not yet seen the report. Indeed I have no doubt that the Government are now resolved to do their duty firmly, and as an earnest of this I refer you to a dispatch of Lord Russell's in the Daily News which I send you, on the Peterhoff question; this, I think, should give satisfaction. I wish also to call your attention to a speech by the Duke of Argyle, made a few days ago at Leith."

It was at the meeting mentioned by our correspondent that Professor Goldwin Smith of Oxford made an admirable speech to the effect that, whenever Great Britain declines to enforce a municipal law of her own which is contravened to the injury of a friendly power, it is the indication of an unfriendly spirit upon her part. Whether the unfriendliness is positive hostility must be determined by the circumstances.

That Great Britain, however, does not wish to have it so regarded is clear enough from her awakening activity to detain the cruisers of his Majesty the Emperor of China.

ANTI-STROPHE.

THERE is always a prosaic as well as a poetic view of any subject, even of royal weddings, as this good-humored parody of Tennyson's nuptial ode shows. It is a contribution to the West Philadelphia Hospital Register:

THE LAUREATE'S ODE.

AFTER TENNYSON.

Welcome thee! Welcome thee! Welcome thee!
Alexandra!
Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen are we:
Dane of the feminine gender is she,
Alexandra!
Welcome her fog! Welcome her sleet!
Welcome her little boys out in the street!
London's mire and mud, stick to her feet;
Muddy her, muddy her, muddy her—Greet!*
Up umbrellas up! Break cloud that lowers;
Anoint her fair head with plentiful showers;
Welcome her, welcome her, welcome her Dow'rs!†
From the top of her head to her heel she is ours,
Alexandra.
Blow trumpet and bugle, and cornet and fife:
Crowd, men, and crush women out of their life,
And flutter and sputter and mutter and blare;
And thunder and blunder and wonder and stare!
Fat Britons, uncover—leave every poll bare,
Wave out the bandanas in the moisty March air!
Pull at the bell: pull, till all your arms tire,
Shout, scream, and run as you would to a fire,
Anglo Saxons; ne'er mind how much you perspire,
Welcome her; welcome her; family and sire!
Thunder!
Alexandra.
Sea King's Daughter, a Wale'ess must be,
A palpable truth as A, B, C, D.
John Bull's as happy as happy can be:
Happy, happier—happiest she!
Alexandra.

TWO VIEWS OF DIXIE.

THE London Atheneum, one of the most amusingly anti-American periodicals in England, can not bolt all the stuff that is served up to John Bull in the cause of the "Confederates." A certain Hudson, "Juris utriusque Doctor," has published in London a book upon The Second War of Independence in America, translated by the author from the second revised and enlarged German edition. The point of the performance is that slavery is happiness, slaveholders patriarchs, and the South heaven. It is not a new tune, but it jars upon the Atheneum, which thus disposes of a very silly book:

"No unprejudiced reader will refrain from laughing at this flattering picture of life in Dixie's Land, where there is actually no literature whatever superior to pro-slavery journalism, no science higher than that 'social science' which left the New Orleans jail what Mr. Russell found it, no politics apart from a fierce determination to keep black serfs in firm bondage—where refined taste expresses itself in deep drinking, 'elevated social intercourse' is tempered by dueling, and appreciation of what is noble manifests itself in incessant calumny of England and the English. When the Southerners were being injured by the misrepresentations and fictions of abolition enthusiasts, we did our best to expose the falsehood of statements which were misleading our countrymen; and now that pro-slavery cant is making itself heard with corresponding influence, and aims at depreciating the labors of the philanthropists whom Clarkson and Wilberforce led on to victory, we are equally prompt in giving it its right name. We can assure Southern writers that the tone which has of late become prevalent among them will fail to achieve its object, as far as English opinion is concerned. It is true that just now there is a fashion in England with careless and frivolous people to profess admiration for 'the patriarchal character' of American slavery, but it is the folly of 'a season.' It will soon die out, and in the mean time it will not touch the strong hatred of 'the peculiar institution' which lives in the heart of our race."

* This true Tennysonism has a beautiful and significant meaning, which the reader may possibly discover by turning back 125 pages.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A HEART THAT CAN FEEL FOR ANOTHER.—"I give and bequeath to Mary, my wife, the sum o' one hunder pounds a year," said an old farmer. "Is that written down, measter?" "Yes," replied the lawyer; "but she is not so old—she may marry again. Won't you make any change in that case? Most people do." "Ay, do they?" said the farmer. "Well, write again, and say that if my wife marries again, I will give and bequeath to her the sum of two hunder pounds a year. That'll do, won't it, measter?" "Why, it's just doubling the sum she would have if she remained unmarried," said the lawyer. "It is generally the other way—the legacy is lessened if the widow marries again." "Ay," said the farmer, "but him as gets her'll desarve it."

"Why don't you wear your ring, my dear?" said a father in a ball-room to his daughter. "Because, papa, it hurts me when any one squeezes my hand." "What business have you to have your hand squeezed?" "Certainly none; but still, you know, papa, one would like to keep it in squeezable order."

A cockney tourist met a Scottish lassie going barefoot toward Glasgow. "Lassie," said he, "I should like to know if all the people in these parts go barefoot?" "Part on 'em do, and part on 'em mind their own business," was the rather settling reply.

At the battle of Trafalgar a generous British sailor, seeing a brother tar bleeding profusely from a severe wound, ran to his assistance. He had no sooner raised him from the deck than the wounded man said, "Thank you, Jack, and I'll be glad to do the same for you before the fight is over."

Jones and Brown were talking lately of a young clergyman whose preaching they had heard that day. The sermon was like a certain man mentioned in a certain biography, "very poor and very pious." "What do you think of him?" asked Brown. "I think," said Jones, "he did much better two years ago." "Why, he didn't preach then," said Brown. "True," replied Jones; "that is what I mean."

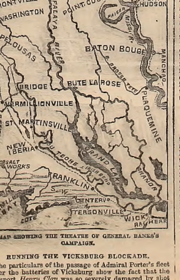
An actor named Priest was playing at one of the principal theatres. Some one remarked at the Garrick Club that there were a great many men in the pit. "Probably clerks who have taken Priest's orders," said Mr. Poole, one of the best punsters, as well as one of the cleverest comic satirists of the day.

One of the Kembles made his first appearance on the stage as an opera-singer. His voice was, however, so bad, that at a rehearsal the conductor of the orchestra called out, "Mr. Kemble! Mr. Kemble! you are murdering the music!" "My dear Sir," was his quiet rejoinder; "it is far better to murder it outright at once than to keep on beating it like you do."

An angry woman, in order to be revenged on her husband, ripped the tick off the bed, and sent all the feathers afloat in the air, and then rushing to the balusters of the stairs, and breaking her arm upon them, she exclaimed, with insane energy, "Now, you scoundrel, you must pay a surgeon."

"Well, Jane, this is a queer world," said Joe to his wife. "A sect of women philosophers has just sprung up." "Indeed," said Jane; "and what do they hold?" "The strongest thing in nature," said he—"their tongues!"

That was a pretty conceit of a romantic husband and father whose name was Rose, who named his daughter "Wild," so that she grew up under the appellation of "Wild Rose." But the romance of the name was sadly spoiled in a few years, for she married a man by the name of "Bull."



DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC IN MOTION.

IT is announced that General Hooker commenced a movement on Monday morning, 27th ult., at daybreak, and that at sunrise heavy masses of artillery and other troops were crossing the river.

GENERAL BANKS AT WORK.

A severe battle was fought on Friday, the 17th ult., at the Vermilion Bayou, Louisiana, in which, after a hard contest with the rebel batteries and a strong force of infantry, our troops gained a complete success, driving the enemy from his position, capturing his guns, and taking fifteen hundred prisoners. In addition to this the batteries at Bute la Rose were silenced by our fleet, the valuable salt-works of Petite Anse, which supplied the whole interior with this indispensable article, were captured, and a number of the rebel boats were destroyed, during the expedition of General Banks into the Bayou Teche region. Thus the finest portion of Louisiana is at the command of the Union forces, and the rebellion in that quarter is tottering.

MAP SHOWING THE THEATRE OF GENERAL BANKS'S CAMPAIGN.

RUNNING THE VICKSBURG BLOCKADE.

The particulars of the passage of Admiral Porter's fleet under the batteries of Vicksburg show the fact that the transport Henry Clay was so severely damaged by shot that she sunk, and that all hands made for a flatboat as the boat was going down. The pilot floated down the river nine miles on a plank, and was picked up opposite Warrenton. There are eleven gun-boats below Vicksburg now, including three under Farragut. The Navy Department has received an official account of the running of Admiral Farragut's fleet by the batteries at Warrenton, and his conflict with the batteries at Grand Gulf.

ANOTHER FLEET PASSED.

On 24th six more transports were successful in running the blockade—the Tigress, Empire City, Moderator, Anglo-Saxon, Cheesman, and Harrison. The Free Stone and A. D. Hine took two double-deck flatboats through the Duckport canal. These boats are capable of carrying one thousand men each. Transports now run by Warrenton without difficulty, the batteries being silenced.

CAPTURE OF TEXAN RANGERS.

The Texan Rangers of General Van Dorn's Legion were attacked on 27th at daybreak, eight miles out from Franklin, Tennessee, by General Gordon Granger's cavalry, 700 strong, under Colonel Watkins, of the Sixth Kentucky cavalry. The enemy were surrounded and defeated. Nearly two hundred prisoners were taken. Among them was Colonel Brooks, commandant of the rebel camp, and several officers. The camp and equipages of the enemy were destroyed, and about three hundred horses and mules were captured.

THE EXPEDITION TO CELINA.

A dispatch was received from General Wright, at Louisville, on the 22d, to the effect that the expedition to Celina was entirely successful; that our troops destroyed the town, one hundred thousand pounds of bacon, ten thousand bushels of wheat, ten thousand bushels of corn, one hundred barrels of whisky, one hundred barrels of flour, a considerable quantity of sugar, coffee, tea, malt, and other stores, and forty boats, which had been used in transporting goods from Brentsville and other points on the Cumberland. The rebels report a loss of ninety killed; but Colonel Graham, commander of the expedition, is of the opinion that the number is greater. We had one wounded and one missing. General Wright claims it as a perfect success.

THE LAST OF THE "QUEEN OF THE WEST."

The Richmond papers of 22d, in their dispatches from Port Hudson, confirm the news of the attack upon the Queen of the West at Grand Lake by our gun-boats, and the capture of her officers and crew. The Queen, it appears, got aground and was blown up by a shell from the Calhoun. The Diana, which was assailed about the same time in the Atchafalaya River by the Union gun-boat Clifton, was burned by the rebels.

THE REBEL ATTACK ON CAPE GIRARDEAU.

The attack upon Cape Girardeau, Missouri, by the rebels, under Marmaduke, has not only proved a failure but a severe defeat for the enemy. After a fight of three hours with General M'Neil they were gloriously repulsed. Reinforcements of men and gun-boats reached M'Neil during the fight. At last accounts the enemy were retreating, and M'Neil was in pursuit.

MORE REBEL RAIDS.

Reports have been current that the rebels, in considerable force, have been committing depredations in Western Virginia, on the line of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and even threatening again to invade Pennsylvania—either Wheeling or Pittsburg being the point aimed at. These reports seem to have for a basis the fact that considerable force of guerrillas, under Jenkins, appeared at Morgantown, Virginia, on the Monongahela River, and near the State line of Pennsylvania. It is not probable that they intend coming any further North. Other detachments of rebels appeared at the same time in other parts of Western Virginia, near the railroad line; but prompt measures, as we learn from the Wheeling Intelligencer, were taken to intercept them, and it is not believed that they have been able to effect much.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE PIRATICAL BUSINESS.

AT latest dates the English Government was still engaged in efforts ostensibly directed against the fitting out of rebel war vessels in the ports of the kingdom. Although the Alexandra was seized by the officers of customs at Liverpool, a number of men still continued at work on her, making her ready for sea, until they were turned off the vessel by the Government officials.

THE NEW ANGLO-REBEL PIRATE.

The Japan, or Virginia, was built at Dumbarton—not at Greenock—Scotland, and ran out from the Clyde on the 3d of April. The order for her arrest arrived from London on the 4th—the day after her departure.

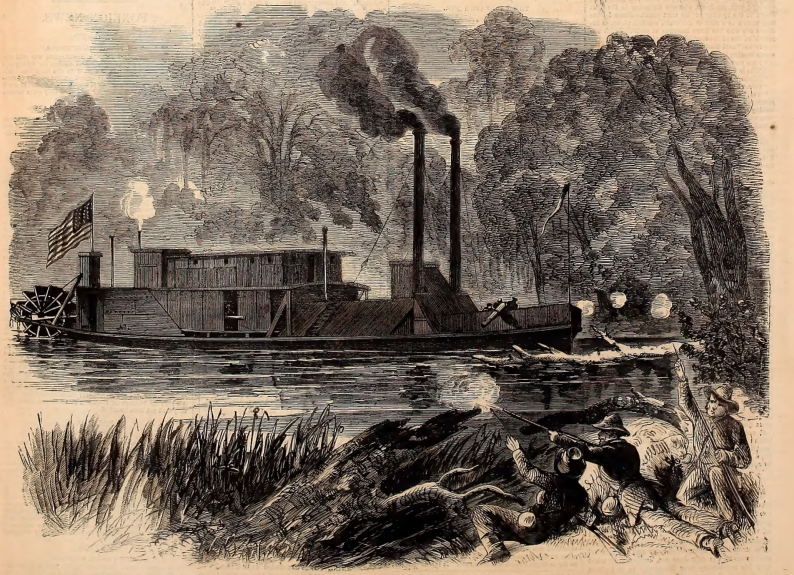
LOSS OF THE "ANGLO-SAXON."

The Montreal Steamship Company's steamer Anglo-Saxon, Captain Burgess, which left Liverpool on the 16th and Londonderry on 17th April, for Quebec and Montreal, was wrecked four miles east of Cape Race on Monday the 27th of April, during a dense fog. The Anglo-Saxon carried the Canadian and United States mails, and had on board three hundred and sixty passengers and eighty-four of a crew, making a total of four hundred and forty-four persons. Three of her passengers reached St. Johns, Newfoundland, at four o'clock on Monday evening, and reported the disaster, adding that the vessel had broken up after striking, when they lost sight of her, and that a great number of her passengers had perished. The news yacht, stationed off Cape Race, set out for the wreck immediately after the receipt of this intelligence. The steamers Dauntless and Bloodhound also steered for Cape Race. Seventy-three persons escaped from the vessel by means of ropes and spars, twenty-four were taken off in life-boat No. 2 belonging to the ship, and the Dauntless succeeded in picking up at sea ninety others who had got off in two boats. Among these were the Hon. John Young, his wife and seven children; the first and fourth officers and fourth and fifth engineers of the Anglo-Saxon; the purser, first and second engineers, and surgeon of the ship were also saved, as was Lieutenant Sampson, of the Royal Artillery, a passenger. The commander of the Anglo-Saxon, Captain Burgess, was supposed to have been lost. Seven persons embarked on a raft from the wreck, and this raft, with the ship's boats Nos. 4 and 6, were missing when the dispatches left St. Johns. The deck of the Anglo-Saxon broke up in an hour after she struck, and nothing but her mizzen-mast was standing. Several persons clung to the fore-rigging until the main-mast fell, but no assistance could reach them. Guns were duly fired at Cape Race, in order to attract the attention of the missing boats. On the 28th the weather on the coast was fine and clear, but they had not been heard of.

POLAND.

THE INSURRECTION.

The Polish insurrection is still in great vigor and activity. The Czar of Russia has so far yielded as to offer a general amnesty to all the Poles who return to their allegiance by the 13th of May. England, France, and Austria have addressed separate notes to Russia, conveying a friendly "warning" to the Emperor on the subject of reforms for Poland. Cronstadt has been placed in a state of defense, and the Russian army is to be increased. It is said that Russia was to direct her attention toward Sweden for some offense taken respecting the Polish question. Serious eventualities were likely to ensue. Napoleon had, it was said, inquired if Italy could take a military part under certain circumstances, and had had an assurance to the effect that the King could furnish sixty thousand men.



MEXICO.

NEWS FROM PUEBLA.

Our accounts from Mexico to the 31st March show that the Mexicans, so far from being defeated at Puebla, as reported through French sources, have frequently repulsed the enemy and are probably still in safe possession of that city.

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.,

AUTHOR OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER VI.

"MR. EDWARD DODD?"

"Not at home, Sir. Left last week."

"For long?"

"I don't rightly know, Sir. But he won't be back this week, I don't think."

"Perhaps," murmured Alfred, "the ladies—Mrs. Dodd—might be able to tell me."

"Oh yes, Sir. But my mistress she's in London just now."

Alfred's eyes flashed. "Could I learn from Mrs. Dodd?"

"La, Sir, she is in London along with her ma; why, 'tis for her they are gone; to insult the great doctors."

He started. "She is not ill? Nothing serious?"

"Well, Sir, we do hope not; she is pining a bit, as young ladies will."

Alfred was any thing but consoled by this offhand account; he became alarmed, and looked wretched. Seeing this so perturbed, Sarah, who was blunt but good-natured, added, "But cook she says 'hard work would cure our miss of all she ails.'

"Cook is an unfeeling wretch," replied Alfred.

"Bless your heart, it belongs to her place, or how could she skin them rabbits? ha! ha! Who shall I say was asking for her? for my work is a bit behindhand."

Alfred took the hint reluctantly, and drew out his card-case, saying, "For Mr. Edward Dodd."

She gave her clean but wettish hand a hasty wipe with her apron, and took the card; he retired; she stood on the step and watched him out of sight, said "Oho!" and took his card to the kitchen for preliminary inspection and discussion.

Alfred Hardie was resolute, but sensitive. He had come on the wings of Love and Hope; he went away heavily: a housemaid's tongue had shod his elastic foot with lead in a moment; of all misfortunes sickness was what he had not anticipated, for she looked immortal. Perhaps it was that fair and treacherous disease, consumption. Well, if it was, he would love her all the more, would wed her as soon as he was of age, and carry her to some soft Southern clime, and keep each noxious air at bay, and prolong her life, perhaps save it.

And now he began to chafe at the social cobwebs that kept him from her. But, just as his impatience was about to launch him into imprudence, he was saved by a genuine descendant of Adam. James Maxley kept Mr. Hardie's little pleasaunce trim as trim could be, by yearly contract. This entailed short but frequent visits, and Alfred often talked with him: for the man was really a bit of a character; had a shrewd rustic wit and a ready tongue, was rather too fond or law, and much too fond of money; but scrupulously honest: head as long as Coldworth's, but broader; and could not read a line. One day he told Alfred that he must knock off now, and take a look in at Albion Villas; the captain was due; and on no account would he, Maxley, allow that there ragged box round the captain's quarter-deck; "that is how he do name their little mossel of a lawn: and there he walks for a wager, athirt and across, across and athirt, five steps and then about; and I'd a most let ye a half-penny he thinks hisself on the salt sea ocean, bless his silly old heart."

All this time Alfred, after the first start of joyful surprise, was secretly thanking his stars for sending him an instrument. To learn whether she had returned, he asked Maxley whether the ladies had sent for him.

"Not they," said Maxley, rather contemptuously; "what do women-folk care about a border, without 'tis a lace one to their night-caps; for none but the devil to see. Not as I have ought to say again the pair; they keep their turf tidyish—and pay ready money—and a few flowers in their pots; but the rest may shift for itself. Ye see, Master Alfred," explained Maxley, wagging his head wisely, "nobody's pride can be hurt by what you now there is to-days; their withdrawing-room it's like the Queen's palace, my missus tells me; she is wrapped up in 'em, ye know. But the captain for my money."

The sage shouldered his tools and departed. But he left a good kind heart behind him. He hovered about the back door next day till he caught Mrs. Maxley: she supplied the house with eggs and vegetables. "Could you tell him whether his friend Edward Dodd was likely to come home soon?" She thought not; he was gone away to study. "He hasn't much headpiece, you know, not like what Miss Julia have. Mrs. and Miss are to be home to-day; they wrote to cook this morning. I shall be here to-morrow, sartain, and I'll ask in the kitchen when Master Edward is a coming back."

Alfred saw he had fallen into the right hands; here was a good soul who only wanted starting to give many answers to few questions. He reflected a moment, then asked her could she bring him two fresh eggs every morning?

"Vich better?" said she. "Why, we do lay our own: only they come a little dearer than the shop eggs; but ha! a half-penny's not much to the likes of you."

"Good things are never cheap," said the sly boy; "so if you will be upon honor that they are yours, and fresh, I'll not stand sixpence for two every morning."

"Sixpence for a couple of eggs!" cried Mrs. Maxley, flushing all over with desire of gain. "I darsn't do it; Jem he'd kill me."

"Nonsense! It is not for me eggs only, but your trouble in bringing them: why, it is half a mile."

"So 'tis. La! to think of a young gentleman like you vallying a poor woman's time; and you got nothing to do with yours, but fling it away on cricketing and larning, which they don't make nobody rich, they don't."

Love and Avarice soon struck a bargain, and for once the nobler passion became a mere bird in the other, and picked up many a good crumb of intelligence. The ladies of Albion Villa were good kind folks, and their female servants loved them; Miss was more for religion than for society, went to St. Anne's church Thursday evenings, and Sunday morning and evening; and visited some poor women in the neighborhood; but not specially: for she could not sleep a wink when the wind blew hard at night; but never complained, only came down in the breakfast-room with her eyes red, and nothing to speak of, but they were in care along of being so swapt up in her, and no wonder, for if ever there was a darkey—

Acting on this intelligence, Alfred went early the next Sunday to St. Anne's church, and sat down in the aisle near the door. While the congregation flowed quietly in, the organist played the Agnus Dei of Mozart. Those pious tender notes stole on the young hearts, and whispered, "Peace! be still!" He sighed wearily, and it passed through his mind that it might be a mistake to care for him specially in his studies, if he had never seen her. Such instinctive advice to heavenly Peace and Purity aisle seemed to lighten up; she was gliding along it, beautiful as May, and modestly itself in dress and carriage. She went into a pew, remained there a minute, then seated herself and looked out the lessons for the day. Alfred gazed at her face; devoured it. But her eyes never stirred. She seemed to have put off feminine curiosity, and the world, at the church door. Indeed, he wished she was not quite so heavenly devout. She looked more delicious, but he longed to see her eyes once more; to catch a glance from them, and, by it, decipher his fate.

But, no; she was there to worship, and did not admire her earthly lover, whose longing looks were glued to her; and by-and-by rose and sank with the true worshipers, but with no more spirituality than a pigeon, or a Jewish dove.

In the last hymn before the sermon, a well-meaning worshiper in the gallery delivered a leading note, a high one, with general, but small precision, being about a semitone flat; at this outrage on her too sensitive ear Julia Dodd turned her head swiftly to discover the offender; and failed: but her two sapphire eyes met Alfred's point-blank.

She was crimson in a moment, and lowered them on her book again, as if to look that way was to sin. It was but a flash: but sometimes a flash does a mine.

The lovely blush deepened and spread before it ebbed away, and Alfred's time cooling heart warmed itself at that sweet glowing check. She never looked his way again, not once: which was a sad disappointment; but she blushed again and again before the service ended, only not so deeply: now, there was nothing in the sermon to make her blush. Alfright said, there was nothing to redden her cheek with religious excitement. There was a little candid sourness—oil and vinegar—against sects and low churchmen; but this generally predominated. Total: "Acerate of morphia," for dry souls to sip.

So Alfred took all the credit of causing those sweet irrelevant blushes; and gloated: the young wretch could not help glorying in his power to tint that fair status of devotion with earthly thoughts.

But stay! that same dear blush, was it pleasure or pain? What if the sight of him was intolerable?

He would know how he stood with her, and on the spot. He was one of the first to leave the church; he made for the church-yard gate, and walked slowly backward and forward by it, with throbbing heart till she came out.

She was prepared for him now, and bowed slightly to him with the most perfect composure, and no legible sentiment, except a certain marked politeness many of our young ladies think wasted upon young gentlemen; and are mistaken.

Alfred took off his hat in a tremor, and his eyes implored and inquired, but met with no further response, and she walked swiftly home, though without apparent effort. He looked longingly after her; but discretion forbade.

He now crawled by Albion Villa twice every day, wet or dry, and had the good fortune to see her twice at the drawing-room window. He was constant at St. Anne's church, and one Thursday crept into the aisle to be nearer to her, and he saw her steal one swift look at the gallery, and look grave; but soon she detected him, and though she looked no more toward him, she seemed distinctly unconscious. Alfred had learned to note these subtleties now, for Love is a microscope. What he did not know was, that his timid shifts were passing a master; every one that to find herself furtively followed every where, and hovered about for a look, is apt to soothe womanly pride, and stir womanly pity, and to keep the female heart in a flutter of curiosity and emotion, two porters that open the heart's great gate to Love.

Dr. Sampson dined with the Hardies, and happened to mention the "Dodds" among his old patients: for he had lived at Barkington.

"The Dodds of Albion Villa?" inquired Miss Hardie, in her brother's no little surprise.

"Albyn fiddlestick!" said the polished doctor. "No! they live by the water-side: used to; but now they have left the town, I hear. He is a sea-captain and a fine lad, and Mrs. Dodd is just the best-bred woman I ever prescribed for, except Mrs. Sampson."

"It is the Dodds of Albion Villa," said Miss Hardie. "They have two children: a son; his name is Edward; and a daughter, Julia; she is rather good-looking; a Gentlemen' Beauty."

Alfred started at his sister. Was she blind? with her "rather good-looking."

Sampson was quite pleased at the information. "N' listen me! I saved that girl's life when she was a year old."

"Then she is ill now, doctor," said Alfred, hastily. "Do go and see her! Hum! The fact is, her brother is a great favorite of mine." He then told him how to find Albion Villa. "Jenny, dear," said he, when Sampson was gone, "you never told me you knew her."

"Knew who, dear?"

"Whom? Why, Dodd's sister."

"Oh, she is a new acquaintance, and not one to interest you. We only meet in the Lord; I do not visit Albion Villa; her mother is an amiable worlding."

"Unpardonable combination!" said Alfred, with a slight sneer. "So you and Miss Dodd meet only at church?"

"At church! hardly. She goes to St. Anne's: sits under a preacher, who starves his flock with moral discourses, and holds out the sacraments of the Church as the means of grace, and keeps His atonement, and the efficacy of prayer through Him, in the back-ground."

Alfred shook his head good-humorously. "Now, Jenny, that is a challenge; and you know we both got into a fury the last time we were betrayed into that miserable waste of time and temper, Theological discussion. No, no:

Let sects delight to bark and bite,
For 'tis their nature to;
Let gown and surplice growl and fight,
For 'tis their nature to.

But let you and I ent High Church and Low Church, and be brother and sister. Do tell me in English where you meet Julia Dod I; that's a dear; for young ladies 'meeting in the Lord' conveys no positive idea to my mind."

Jane Hardie sighed at this confession. "We meet about His business; in the cottages of the poor and the sick, whom He loved and pitied when on earth; and we, His unworthy servants, try to soothe their distress, and lead them to Him, who can heal the soul as well as the body, and wipe away all the tears of all His people."

"Then it does you infinite credit, Jane," said Alfred, warmly. "Now, that is the voice of true religion—by Jupiter; and not the whine of this sect, nor the snarl of that. And so she joins you in this good work? I am not surprised."

"We meet in it now and then, dear; but she can hardly be said to have joined me: I have a district, you know; but poor Mrs. Dodd will not allow Julia to mix in His services. She visits independently, and by fits and starts; and I am afraid she thinks more of comforting their pet shoulds' bodies than of feeding their souls with crumbs from His altar; it was but the other day she confessed to me her backwardness to speak in the way of instruction to women as old as her mother. She finds it so much easier to let them run on about their earthly troubles: and of course it is much easier to one who is herself but a Babe in Grace. Ah, the world holds her still in some of its subtle meshes."

"Be patient, beloved this sadly; but presently, brightening up, said, with considerable bonhomie, and almost a sprightly air: "But she is a nice girl, and the Lord will give light her candle."

Alfred pulled a face, as of one that drinketh perpicr unawares: but let it pass: hypercriticism was not his cue just then. "Well, Jenny," said he, "I have a favor to ask you. Introduce me to your friend Miss Dodd! Will you?"

Miss Hardie colored faintly. "I would rather not, dear Alfred."

"Nonsense; why not?"

"Because the introduction could not be for her eternal good. Julia's soul is in a very trickish state; she wavers as yet between God and the world; and it won't do; it won't do; there is no middle path; every human creature must either be His child, or the devil's slave. You would very likely turn the scale, and then I should have fought against her everlasting welfare—my friend's."

"What, am I an infidel?" inquired Alfred, angrily.

Jane looked distressed. "Oh no, Alfred. But you are a worldling; and the world is at deadly enmity with Him."

Alfred, smothering a strong sense of irritation, besought her to hear reason; these big words were out of place here. "It is Dodd's sister; and he will introduce me at a word, worldling as I am."

"Then why urge me to do it, against my conscience?" asked the young lady, as sharply as if she had been a woman of the world. "You can not be in love with her, as you do not know her."

Alfred did not reply to this unlucky thrust, but made a last effort to soften her. "Can you call yourself my sister, and refuse me this trifling service, which her brother, who loves her and esteems her ten times more sincerely than you do, would not think of refusing me if he was at home?"

"Why should he? He is in the flesh, himself; let the carnal introduce one another. I really must decline; but I am very, very sorry that you feel hurt about it."

"And I am very sorry I have not 'an amiable worlding' for my sister, instead of an unamiable and devilish conceited Christian."

And, with these bitter words, Alfred snatched a candle and scorched to bed in a fury. So apt is one passion to rouse up others.

"YOU COULDN'T COME AGAIN IN HALF AN HOUR, MISS, COULD YE?"

Jane Hardie let fall a gentle tear; but consoled herself with the conviction that she had done her duty, and that Alfred's anger was quite unreasonable, and so he would see as soon as he should cool.

The next day the lower, smarter, if not the richer, part of Brohman Street, an agitated treble called after him, "Mr. Halfred! hoh, Mr. Halfred!" He looked back and saw Dick Absalom, a promising young cricketer, brandishing a document and imploring aid. "O, Master Halfred, doose please come here. I dursn't leave the shop."

There is a tie between cricketers far too strong for social distinctions to divide, and, though Alfred mentally pursued "whose cat is dead now?" he obeyed the strange summons.

The shutters were a singular one. Master Absalom, I must premise, was the youngest of two lads in the employ of Mr. Jenner, a benevolent old chemist, a disciple of Mead. Jenner taught the virtues of drugs and minerals to tender youths, at the expense of the public. Scarcely ten minutes had elapsed since a pretty servant girl came into the shop, and laid a paper on the counter, saying, "Please to make that up, young man." Now at fifteen we are troubled by inaccuracies of this kind from ripe female lips; so Master Absalom took the prescription with a complacent grin; his eye glanced over it; it fled to shaking in his hand; chill dismay penetrated his heart; and, to speak with Dickens's immortal, his liver turned instantly to water. However, he made a feeble clutch at Mercantile Mendacity, and stammered out, "Herb's is mixtures, tinctures, and the governor's out walking, and he's been and locked the drawer where we keeps our Prastrom."—For couldn't come open in half an hour, Miss, could ye?" She acquiesced readily, for she was not habitually called Miss, and she had a fellow feeling. Absalom, as we said before, belonged to a class which thinks it consistent to come after its followers.

Alfred saw the sad affair, and groaned at his ease. Here was a prescription full of new chemicals, sovereign, no doubt; i.e., deadly when applied Jennerically; and the very directions for use were in Latin words he had encountered in no prescription before. A year ago Dickens would have counted the prescribed ingredients on his fingers, and then taken down an equal number of little articles, solid or liquid, mixed them as directed them, and so to cricket, serene; but now, his mind, to apply the universal cant, was "in a transition state." A year's practice had filled the youthful valor, which used to scatter Epsom salts, or exalic acid; magnesia, or something white, at the slightest or two by himself and his compeers, with comments by the coroner, had shaken him to the heart's core with the awful human body of potent chemicals fearlessly administered, leaving him dark as to their distinctive qualities applied remedially. What should he do? run with the prescription to old Taylor in the next street, a chemist of forty years? Alas! at his tender age, he had not submitted to chaff that reversed rival persistently and publicly. Humble his establishment before the King Street one? Sooner perish death and come eternal cricket! And, after all, why not? Drummer-boys, and powder-monkeys, and other imps of his age that dealt destruction, were paid; Hannibal acknowledged their services in cash: but old Jenner, taught by Philosophy through its organ the newspapers, that "knowledge is riches," was above diluting with a few shillings a week the wealth a boy received behind his counter; so his apprentices got no salary. Then why not shut up the old rogue's shutters, and excite a little sympathy for him, to be followed by a powerful reaction on his return from walking; and go and offer his own services on the ticklish ground to Isabel the gentlemen by the hour, or bowl at a shilling on their balls? A shilling is the lay for me," said he; "you get money for that, and you only bruise the gents a bit and break their thumbs: you can't put their victims quite out you can at this work."

By a striking coincidence, the most influential member of the cricket club passed while Dick was in this uncertainty.

"Oh, Mr. Halfred, you was always very good to me on the ground; you couldn't have me hired by the club, could ye? for I am sick of this trade; I wants to bowl."

"You little duffer!" said Alfred, cricket is a recreation, not a business. Besides, it lasts five months. Unless you adjourn to the antipodes, it's no use to be shop like a man, and make your fortune."

"Oh, Mr. Halfred," said Dick, sorrowfully, "how can I fortune here? Master Jenner don't pay. And the crowner declares he will not have it; and the Berton Chronicle says we young gents ought to be given a holiday to see and see one of us hanged by lot; but this is what have made this camel's back at last; here's a dalied thing to come smiling and mixing up with, and put it across a counter in a poor boy's hand. Oh! oh! oh!"

"Dick," said Alfred, "if you blubber, I'll give you a hiding. You have stumbled on a passage you can't construe. Well, who has not? but we don't shed the briny about it. Here, let me have a go at it."

"Ah, I've heard you are a scholard," said Dick, "but you won't make out this; there's some new preparation of Mercury, and there's musk, and there's hoarhound, and there's a neutral salt, and dal that wrote it."

"Hold your I construe it to you. Die Mercurii, on Wednesday—decind hord vespertid, at ten o'clock at night—eat in Musck! what does that mean? "Ad Prastrom, to the Prastorium. Eat in Musck!" I see; this is modern Latin with a vengeance. "Let him go in a fly to the Prastorium. Solvet, let him pump—cum tredicina camvolis, with thirteen little dogs—proventus suos, especially with my little dog." Dicky, this prescription emanates from Bedlam direct. 'Domus vedilla—hallo! it is a woman, then! "Let her go in a fly to the Town-hall, eh? "—cum pump, no, 'dance, with thirteen whelps, especially mine.' Ha! ha! ha! And who is the woman that is to do all this, I wonder?"

"Woman, indeed!" said a treble at the door; "no more than I am; it's for a young lady. O, pinny!"

This polite ejaculation was drawn out by the speaker's sudden recognition of Alfred, who had raised his head at her remonstrance, and now started in his turn: for it was the black-eyed servant of Allson Villa. They looked at one another in expressive silence.

"Yes, Sir, it is for my young lady. Is it ready, young man?"

"No, it isn't; and never will," squealed Dick, angrily; "it's a vile 'oax; and you ought to be ashamed of yourself bringing it into a respectable shop."

Alfred silenced him, and told Sarah he thought Miss Dodd ought to know the nature of this prescription before it went round the chemists."

He borrowed paper of Dick, and wrote:

"Mr. Alfred Hardie presents his compliments to Miss Dodd, and begs leave to inform her that he has by accident discovered the contents of the inclosed prescription. As it seems rather a mystery jest, and tends to attract attention to Miss Dodd and her residence, Mr. Hardie would, with some misgivings, to send it back with a literal translation, on reading which it will be for Miss Dodd to decide whether it is to be sent in."

"On Wednesday, at ten P.M., let her go in a fly to the town-hall, and dance with thirteen [little dogs,] especially with mine: return [whelps,] home at six A.M., and sleep till dinner, and repeat the folly on occasion serves."

"Suppose a dose?" added in Miss's hand: when she's alone?" whispered Sarah.

"You would earn my warmest gratitude."

"Warmest gratitude! Is that a warm gownd or a warm cloak, I wonder?"

"It is both, when the man is a gentleman, and a pretty, dark-eyed girl pities him and stands his friend."

Sarah smiled, and whispered, "Give it me; I'll do my best."

Alfred inclosed the prescription and his note in one cover, handed them to her, and slipped a sovereign into her hand whispering, "Be prudent."

"I'm dark, Sir," said she: and went off briskly homeward, and Alfred stood rapt in dreamy joy, and so self-elated that, had he been furnished like a romance hero, with a fashionable confidante—"a thing all eyes," and choked up Jenner's shop, and swept his counter. He had made a step toward familiarity, had written to Miss Dodd: and then, if this prescription came, as he suspected, from Dr. Sampson, she would, perhaps, be at the ball. This operation was a delightful. Meantime Mrs. Dodd had communicated Sampson's opinion to Julia, adding that there was a prescription besides, going to be made up. "However, he insists on your going to this ball."

Julia begged hard to be excused; said she was in no humor for balls; and, Mrs. Dodd objecting that the tickets had actually been purchased, she asked leave to invite Rose and Alice. "Then they will be a treat to Rose and Alice; they seldom go out: mamma, I do so fear they are poorer than people think them."

"It would be but kind," said Mrs. Dodd. "Though really why my child should always be sacrificed to older people I cannot see."

"Oh a mighty sacrifice!" said Julia. She sat down and inclosed the tickets to Rose Darton, with a little apology for not calling, and Out. Elizabeth took it. Sarah met her at the gate, but did not announce her return: she lurked in ambush till Julia [gave] to go to her own room, then followed her, and handed Alfred's missive, and received his reply. These secret expeditions as the wind in matters of the heart, took it for granted the inclosure was something very warm indeed; so she was not at all surprised, on the contrary, that Alfred was at all right now, miss?" and retreated swelling with a secret, and tormented her fellow-servants all day with mundoes dark as Erebus.

Julia read the note her heart on hearing the momentous lines. "He does not like me to be talked of," she said to herself. "How good he is! What trouble he takes about me! And he will be there."

She divined rightly; on Wednesday, at ten, Alfred Hardie was in the town-hall. It was a magnificent room, well lighted, and at present not half filled, though dancing had commenced. The figure Alfred sought was not there; and he wondered he had been so childish as to hope she would come to a city ball. He played the fine gentleman: he would not dance. He leant the door with another Oxonian, and tried to avenge himself for her absence on the townspeople, who were there, by quizzing them.

But in the middle of this aimable occupation, and, indeed, in the middle of a sentence, he stopped short, and his heart throbbed, and he thrilled from head to foot; for two ladies glided in at the door, and passed up the room with the unpretending composure of well-bred people. They were equally remarkable; but Alfred saw only the radiant young creature in flowing muslin, with the narrowest sash in the room, and no ornament but a necklace of large pearls, and her own vivid beauty. She had altered her mind about coming, with apologies for her vacillating disposition so genuine and disproportionate, that her indulgent and unsuspecting mother was really quite amused. Alfred was not so happy as to know that she had changed her mind with his name. Perhaps even this knowledge would have added little to that exquisite moment when, unhoped for, Julia passed close to him, and the fragrant air from her brushed his cheek; and seemed to whisper, "follow me and be my slave!"

HOUSE-HUNTING.

"CHARLEY!"

The voice was soft and coaxing as the twitter of a bird in May-blossoms.

It's almost the 1st of May, Charley. If you only would look up a house somewhere! You know this is sold, and I'm sure I don't know what we're going to do, unless you'll be the dearest and darlingest of brothers, and—"

Charles Rayner contracted his brows, and rumpled his brown locks in a sort of bewildered despair.

"Mary!" said he, "I'd rather charge on set battery any time than go house-hunting! I don't know any thing about it, and what's more, I don't want to! There's no use teasing me! I won't!"

But what is man's resolve weighed in the balance with woman's tears? Mary Hooper pulled out a little laced pocket-handkerchief and began to cry, and all the gigantic barricade of Lieutenant Rayner's determination crumbled down, submerged by that tiny sparkling tide of tears! Mary got her own way, as she had known beforehand she would, and Lieutenant Rayner sulked forth in the blue brightness of the April day with a list of "eligible residences" in his breast pocket, and a confused mass of directions fermenting in his distracted brain!

"Hi-ho!" quoth Charley to himself, "No. 88 'To Let.' This is one of the fellows on the list! Now Charley Rayner, charge?"

The tidiest-looking maid-of-the door-bell was answered by an ancient-looking matron in curl-papers and a faded shawl.

"I believe this house is to let?"

"Yes it is," said the dame, curiously eying her interlocutor from head to foot. "Want to hire it? Calculate to look at it? How big a family you got?"

Rayner colored to the roots of his hair, even while he could not help laughing.

"There is some misapprehension," he said, quickly. "It is not for myself, but for—"

"Then what are you taking up folks' time lookin' at their houses for?" snarled the acidulated matron. "I guess you're after—you're a—a bait thief! Get along—quick—with your shoulder-straps and your airs and graces, or I'll call the police! Impudent young woman this way!"

And before Charles Rayner could open his mouth to remonstrate, the hall door was slammed in his face. What was he, a dashing young cavalry officer! To be mistaken for a "bait thief," and ignominiously turned out of doors by an old woman in curl-papers!

"Confound it all!" ejaculated Charley, the brief sentence writhing from his wrath as a Chamgage cork flies upward from an effervescing bottle. "I won't be made a fool of any more. I'll go straight home to him; but the next thing is houses!"

But then he remembered the babies in the nursery, and Mary's pretty bright tears, and mentally resolved to make one more trial at least!

"No. 16! This House to Let!" Hyacinths in the windows and "Lace curtains!" he commented to himself. "Looks nice, any way! Well, a fellow can but try, so here goes!"

And he gave the bell a spasmodic pull, bracing himself à la iced shower-bath, for the consequences.

"May I inquire what you look at this house?"

"Walk in, Sir—I'll spake to the mistress!"

What a bright little room it was into which the prepossessing Irish chambermaid left him! The windows glowing with chimes of hyacinth bells, white and blue—the canary warbling in the full pride of April weather—fresh broke around his cage and scattered itself in bright billows over the moscan carpet—the fire high-heaped in the cozy grate, and a young lady, with bright eyes and curls, just threaded with golden gleams, sitting at work among the flowers.

"Take a seat, Sir," said the young lady.

"Thank you," responded the Lieutenant, awkwardly extricating his sword, and watching the first steel shaft as it glanced in and out of the transparent muslin ruffling.

"That's a pretty dog," thought Charley; "what long eyelashes she has, and—"

Confusion to the Lieutenant of cavalry! how was he to know for certain the hazel eyes should accompany his own so suddenly. He turned scarlet—but not so red as the young lady.

"I beg your pardon," he stammered.

"Excuse me," said the brown-eyed, as the rosy color died out of her cheek; "but I think you must be a cavalry officer."

"I am."

"In what regiment?"

"The —th."

She rose, nervously dropping her work, and clasping her tiny hands together.

"Is it possible? Then, perhaps, you know Allan Carver?"

"Perfectly—a tall, handsome man with dark eyes, is he not? He was a private in my company, and—"

"And was wounded at Fredericksburg?"

"You are right."

"Oh, Allan, Allan!" murmured the girl, with quivering lip. "And can you tell me where he is now?"

"In hospital, I believe. I could easily ascertain."

"Oh, if you could," she faltered. "We have been in such wretched uncertainty, not knowing whether he was alive or dead. We have written again and again, but in vain."

Private Carver had been rather a favorite with Lieutenant Rayner, yet at this moment he was beginning to feel decidedly vindictive toward him. What business had he inspiring such an interest in the breast of this brown-eyed beauty? Why couldn't he have died peaceably, like many a one better than he?

"If you could tell us how to obtain his address?" added the damsel, timidly.

Charley began to bate Private Carver in the depths of his soul; but he answered,

"I will try, certainly; and if—"

He paused abruptly, for the door had swung open on noiseless hinges, and a sweet-faced old lady, in flowing white-cap ribbons, stood before him.

"I believe you wished to see the house, Sir?"

"Mamma," interrupted the younger lady, "this gentleman is a lieutenant in Allan's company—he knows Allan."

"And he wishes he never had set eyes on the miscreant," commented Charley, internally. "Allan, indeed! Now I wonder if they're engaged."

The old lady's face lighted up, and she began a torrent of eager interrogatories.

"Oh, Sir, if you knew the relief it is to hear from my son," she concluded.

"Your son!" echoed Charley. "Then Private Carver is your brother?" he added, turning to the brown-eyed fairy.

"Private Carver! I mention it?"

"Private Carver's the finest fellow in the regiment!" ejaculated Charley, flinging his cap into the air. "I beg your pardon, ma'am, but I think the house will suit."

"Will you not look at it, Sir?" said the old lady, in extreme astonishment.

"Oh, certainly, certainly," stammered the officer, with a dim remembrance of his sister's directions as he stumbled down the kitchen stairs. "I hope the range don't leak, and my sister was very particular about chandeliers being included in the bill-sale!"

"Sir?" said the old lady.

"I—I'm afraid I'm talking real nonsense," apologized Charley; "but you see I'm thinking what a brave fellow Private Carver was."

They went the rounds—the old lady ascending matter-of-fact stairs, but Charley Rayner walking on an atmosphere of cloud and couleur de rose.

What absurd questions he asked without so much as waiting to hear the answers! How anxious he was to know whether the skylight "taked well," and if the slate floor should want a carpet, and the parlor ceilings agreeable; whether the wine-cellars were "gilded," and if the door-knobs could be popped with painted! He had finally returned to the room where the hyacinths were, to say,

"It's all right—we'll take the house, Miss Carver. And—"

"Well, Sir?"

"As I'm going on to Washington next week, I shall make it my business to find out Private Carver. I will call to-morrow, if quite agreeable to you, to receive any message you may wish to charge me with."

The rosy cheeks were stained a deeper red—the hazel eyes became lovely luminous.

"Thank you—you are very kind!"

How Charley ever stumbled out of the door was a life-long problem to him; but the next thing he was conscious of, a surly individual in the street was requesting him, in no very courteous terms, to keep his eyes about him in the street and not run over a fellow-subject!

"Now, what's the matter, what luck?" demanded little Mrs. Hooper, as she came out of the nursery with a plump baby in her arms, and a dimpled two-year-old clinging to her skirts.

"Luck? the best in the world. I've engaged a splendid house!"

"Have you? Where? Three stories high or four? Is it a high steep, or an English basement?"

"I don't remember; but—"

"What is the rent?"

"By Jove!" ejaculated Lieutenant Rayner, throwing unconfutably hat, "I never thought to ask."

"Stationary tubs, of course, and a laundry?"

"Laundry! laundry—I didn't know I knew there were some stairs, and a room with flowers in it!"

Mrs. Hooper elevated her eyebrows despairingly.

"I can go back and inquire!" said Charley, with cheerful alacrity.

And he did; but when he reported himself the second time, Mrs. Hooper gained very little substantial information on the subject.

We do not venture to chronicle the number of errands Charley invented to "House to Let" during the following week, or the number he seemed to him. We only know that Private Carver, slowly recovering from tedious fevers in the hospital, was considerably astonished at the excessive attention lavished on him by Lieutenant Rayner.

It was not long before the young officer obtained another brief furlough, and came home express just as the May violets were dying under the luxurious spring of June roses!

"Don't torture me any longer, Amy! I tell you I love you better than all the world—better than my own life! Don't be cruel, dearest. Say yes or no!"

Sweet and soft the monosyllable came—so low you could only hear it by the aid of the warble of the canary-bird and the rustle of the rose-trees on the sunset piazza. But Charley Rayner would have caught the silver accents through all the crash of armies and the thunder of innumerable artillery!

"My love, my darling—my precious prize!"

Won forever! But who would have imagined that Lieutenant Rayner at the ——th Cavalry could have garnered so much happiness from the very unromantic and real business of House-Hunting!

Captain Candler. General Hooker. Major Lawrence.

MAJOR-GENERAL HOOKER, COMMANDING THE ARMY OF THE POTOM

MAC, AND HIS PERSONAL STAFF.—[From a Drawing by Mr. A. R. Waud.]

A FIGHT WITH THE NEW JERSEY CAVALRY.

We have seen hard service in this regiment, and have had few periods of repose. It has, too, been mostly a thankless labor, with less than its fair share of glory. I know nothing more unlike the picture of cavalry life given by authors and artists than is the reality, both in its incidents and its effects upon the character. To head a squadron on a scout of thirty or forty miles beyond the lines; to examine the country and discover the rebel location of each road and by-path; to hunt up every trace of the enemy, and study every nook and cranny that may reveal their whereabouts; to pick up every horse that is fit for service, and excite rebellious indignation by the assurance that the United States will pay or punish as their loyalty may be; to ensure yourself of dinner with any resident household, and flirt with the young ladies while the troopers and the chickens go by; to slowly ride all night, the weather fine or stormy, to-day, and feast upon the fat of the land to-morrow; to be as trapperate as an anchorite this week, and as confiscated whisky-barrel the next; never to stir saddle, sword, or boots for days, and to rouse from rest by the bugle-call "To arms!" and then again to lounge away life in a round of eating, sleeping, and grooming horses—all this is an amusing style of profitable license, and reckless joviality, alternating with an absolute dead monotony of thought and habit—may, my dear readers, have an effect upon character very different from the exercises of our friends at home, who read "Charles O'Malley" and "Tom Burke of Ours."

And yet all this external evil, no doubt, makes men seem worse than they are to envy; and even we are probably better men now than when we loitered on at home, with no real excuse for our careless indifference to the horrible conflict. I think the man who drinks with a relish whisky out of a canteen is not really more dissipated than when he would spend dollars as well as money in arranging a costly revel; that the frightful profanity of the lips is perhaps a lighter sin in God's eyes than the low habitual oath in the heart against His Word for the sake of our own gain or our own indulgence; that theft, under circumstances, when by fair safeguard against their power, does not so completely enthrall our nature as when we smuggle them out for the benefit of the retail. I know that many have prayed more earnestly on the battle-field than they have in church, have worked more honestly for the soldier's relief in the camp-hospitals, have been more grateful for blessings, less discontented under trials, than would ever have been the case at home. But these are not rules that have been formed, that may be carried into effect in the future of our lives, though I must confess that they seem to possess more force with them amid the whirl that have left the army.

These thoughts are natural enough at any time, but they have no very apparent connection with the talk of a body of officers who met together one evening lately in camp. In fact, there were more than the one reason for their gathering together for enjoyment on this particular night.

Our officers' mess-chest had just imported among his officers' stores a considerable supply of whisky which could be purchased for little more than government price, and the Major knew we had been paying about two dollars a pint for the vile composition weeded by our outlets, that an advance seemed to us too good to be true; and we consequently continually endeavoring to convince ourselves of its reality. A sixth additional canteen has been carried, that a general order had been issued, restricting each officer to a gallon a week. This regulation has had no effect on the first of January; so the officers determined to have a carnival before their entrance upon the new year and a course of economy and sobriety.

Head-quarters was a very comfortable place for our gathering, a well-tent and a Sibley had been combined into a small mess-room apartment, and the floor was neatly covered with boards obtained from a barn in the neighborhood of another regiment. The people to whom it belonged are camp hall nothing to complain of except the apparent migration of their small household gods to the mess-room floor. We be to the man who was caught stealing, or even straying out of camp; so it was only by long practice that we had attained the art of making themselves comfortable, and at the same time keeping up appearances. However, there the floor was, and there were the two benches of the same materials. There was also the roasted body of a pig, which had attempted to pass our pickets without the countersign, but died for his rashness with his life. Opposite smoked a noble round of commissary beef, procured by that official in return for the compliment of an invitation. Our vegetables were beans and potatoes, and the side-dishes consisted of fried pork and hard biscuit. Camp appetites soon demolished this unusually magnificent entertainment; and the reliable contrabands removed its fragments, and made room for a mess-table filled with noble punch, whose fragrance awakened a longing for closer acquaintance. The surgeon being in bed by reason of the administration of this draught, and requested to regulate its distribution in accordance with the laws of health and the principles of justice. We filled up the mess, and drew together with that sense of comfort, derived from memory, of many a weary march and many a bitter night on picket.

"Here, Doctor, just fill this up again, if you please," begged the chief of the Second Squadron. "I know that I am in advance of my allowance; but the effects of that last cup were swallowed up by painful recollections, and it must not be counted against me."

"I don't know what right you have to have more melancholy recollections than the rest of us," interposed A——; "and unless you prove your assertion you must go dry, besides suffering such other punishment as the court may inflict."

"Since Frank has been judge-advocate he is frightfully rigid and technical," answered B——; "but for all that, I maintain that ever since the night of the 8th of August I am justified in assuaging the memory of that thirst in addition to any that may exist at present."

"That was certainly a pretty tight place, Bob; but I do not know that you have a right to make this a tighter one," adjudicated the surgeon.

"I say, tell us about that affair, B——," begged the Adjutant, who had but lately joined the regiment. "Here are half a dozen of us who never heard the particulars, and you can improve our minds by imparting the desired information."

"Considering your youth and ignorance, Adjutant," said the Major, solemnly, "you will be excused this time; but remember that the company one of B——'s stories, especially as we are well assured that you will find them interesting, is a treat the offense after having once endured the consequences. Now, B——, fill up your can, and out with your story as short as it is possible. I'll keep it still more for daylight. My thirst had become absorbing, and I resolved at all risks to assuage it as soon as I could discover some way where. How horribly slow was the gradual whitening of the eastern sky; and how long it was before the first glow of light heralded the glorious sunrise of that bloody day! As the earth became distinguishable, I could see indistinctly far ahead of me, rising above the mist of the valley, a line of cavalry forming in the fields. It was too misty and distant for me to recognize which regiment; but I could see that each man had something white strapped behind his saddle. The Rhode Islanders had joined us during the night, I concluded, and not recognizing them; and I thought that the rebels must have advanced beyond my hiding-place. However, I must make sure of a couple of loaded rebels on the line of bushes which bordered that little brook which winds round the base of the hill upon which I stood. I crept to the couple of loaded rebels very coff, and the mist was pretty thick; so leaving my horse, I stole down to it. Deep in I plunged my head and neck, and then refreshed cool my fevered blood; and then I drank, and drank, and drank, as only a man can drink who has had no drink, as the palate welcomed the delicious draught. When I rose up I was a like a new man. All my nervousness had passed away, and I was in a comfortable mind returned to me at once, and I tell you there was need of it. I turned to go back to my horse, but what I left behind me for the bushes there was a flash of light between him and me that is not easily mistaken by a man who has once seen it. Right and left as far as I could see the sun was gleam, each time coming a little closer. There was no mistaking the shining of the muskets of the rebel skirmishers, as he came to advance. Was I bound of my heart I knew that the cavalry I had seen must be our fellows, and I felt that I must reach them at once. Considering, however, that the sun was beginning to shine very strongly, and there was no time to be lost, I followed up the stream till I came to a ford, and, pointed to the left, I took the lane of the fog, made my way toward the skirmishers. You may fancy how I felt when the fog suddenly lifted, and I saw, within musket-range, Company B——, with the sharpshooters of the First Squadron. I believe that I could have cried if I had not been ashamed. When I gave my name to Captain Smith, Major, you seemed to be giving me a new lease of life, and I was able to borrow a remount and report to Bayard. He is a minister's son, and at the same time one of the best equestrians was missing, but still he sent me back to Smith, as he was ordered to advance. While I was bound of my heart I knew that the cavalry I had seen must be our fellows, and I felt that I must reach them at once. Considering, however, that the sun was beginning to shine very strongly, and there was no time to be lost, I followed up the stream till I came to a ford, and, pointed to the left, I took the lane of the fog, made my way toward the skirmishers. He is a minister's son, and at the same time one of the best equestrians was missing, but still he sent me back to Smith, as he was ordered to advance. While I was the first men that I saw, on entering Culpepper were my own boys reating by the road-side. The rebels had evacuated the town in the night, destroying Ford and Barnett's, and had driven in our pickets three several times. But I——, with his quick eyes, had seen the enemy withdrawing through the town, if he had a brigade at his back instead of sixty men. This actually seemed to paralyze the rebel advance, and the movement was without advantage to all the afternoon. It was not till evening that their reinforcements came up, and in the darkness they could receive no orders except to try which flank of our men were still at their pickets. The next morning I found my regiment safely within the outside edge of the town, and two of the rebel stations on the other. Quietly withdrawing his pickets, he marched them to the woods between their forces, and got into Culpepper before the enemy had found out that the road was clear for their advance. I shall not tell you the tale that the cheering joined by his stentatious saved us the loss of the day; for if their night had been able to flank us round the town, as in the morning they would have been overwhelmed before Banks could have joined us."

"I have listened with interest to the two B——" interrupted I——, of Company I; "I don't spoil it by commentary. I fancy if you had been there, as that was a part of the 8th you could have made an equally thrilling history. The Jersey boys were ordered to advance on the left as well as on the left, and had our hands about as full—in fact fuller—by twenty odd prisoners."

"Gentlemen, you might as well tell that as an appendix to B——'s story, and as materials for the history of the campaign upon the Rapidan. I have only to add that exactly the took prisoners, whether it was Lieutenant-Colonel K——, or you, or B——, or the whole batch of you combined, the Major and I had a very hard time of holding the rebels in front till you should get back; and if we had not believed that Jersey cavalry could fight more than a cat we would have given you all up half an hour before we welcomed you."

"I can not, like B——, tell a story so smoothly and categorically," began Captain J——. "I must give up all attempts at pathos and harrowing descriptions, and make a very plain statement of fact. As the Lieutenant-Colonel told us afterward, Bayard had informed him late that night that the rebs had crossed a tolerably large party, and were annoying our pickets; so old K—— proposed that he should take one battalion, sweep round in their rear, and drive them right into the mouth of the General and the rest of the brigade. About three o'clock we heard 'To arms!' and we sprang to our horses faster than we had ever done before. The Colonel took my company and the first battalion, leaving the rest of the regiment in charge of the Major. As we got up to the cross road before you reach Slaughter's house, the General met K—— and whispered a few words to him. As we just were ordering me forward as advance-guard, I could hear the answer. Screwing up his face and shoulders in his peculiarly fashion, he said, 'I will try it, and run no chance. Let us know vat sort of a fight.' The General rode away on, but had no idea that the General had told K—— that there were at least ten thousand men, where we had planned for a hundred. We had not reached the course which we took a few days before, so I went on without any trouble—sent B——a shead with three carbineers. When we came to the road from Barnett's Ford to Madison Court House, I noticed, without much thinking, the tracks of a strong body of horses, and, pushing on, took across direction for Cave's Ford. When the main body came up, instead of following up into the lane, they turned off upon the main road, following the tracks I speak of. They had not gone far before K—— began to feel that something was wrong. The road was about plainly that a large regiment of cavalry had been along it within a few hours, but did not display any recently fresh indications. After the wrong detachment had been sent up a road to the right, on which he knew I could not have gone. He stopped the column, and sent B——out with one mounting party, and W—— with another, while at the same time he himself rode up a convenient hill from which to observe what was going on toward the river. All this time I was pushing my way forward, and came to the edge of a wood, and to the rebs ever left their flank so ungnarded I can not understand; but we did not come upon a picket or even a vidette. Through the wood I saw grey over two miles. At last we came suddenly on that large house with a portico, where there were so many wounded rebels, when we were about to get to Cave's Ford once before, and where those pretty two-year-old colts awakened our covetousness. At the corner of the corner, he saw a small soldier lounging on the porch, and some few more, without arms, standing around the kitchen-door. Without a moment's pause he dashed forward, and I, seeing him, came at speed in his rear. There were about fifty men at the picket, and as the nine old scouts lady was getting them a breakfast. They were nearly all too surprised to run, never dreaming of an enemy in that direction. After a rest of their advance, and within ride-shot of their camp, could be interrupted by a party of Yankee cavalry. The lieutenant was the first one he saw run, and his legs certainly carried him well; but they could not go as fast as my black. So, when he saw my sword over his head, he gave up, and quietly returned with me. We were in too great a hurry to sit down to table. Without giving the mistress of the house that we could not allow her means herself active in the relief service, had returned breakfast, this party, consisting of twenty-seven gapings from beneath the floor; and an investigation revealed to us the master of the house, Colonel Commissioner of Virginia Militia, a sedentary and undignified situation which I have just described. I assure you it took all my own men to extricate him, with his plumage ruffled, and numerous abrasions of his cuticle. Unmoved by his indignation and the tears of his daughter, after, we carried him along with us, rejoined K——, marched through woods and hollows for miles, and, finally, reached the same bluff on the river Rapidan, marched them right up to General Bayard in the face of their whole army. Now I think that this constitutes a fight for the day, and was calculating the battle on the next, are things of which we ought to be proud than we are; and I believe if we did but know what we really were doing, we would not have them turning up their noses at the cavalry in the way in which they do. But I have just been lecturing B—— for making a speech, and I will not commit the same fault myself. Doctor, I believe you are a drink."

As J—— refreshed himself after his unusual exertion, the Captain of Company I, with a half-sigh of satisfaction, looked audibly around for a toast. "I am beginning to think that we are all heroes without our knowing it. I am sure I have for not thinking myself one. I——is distinguished for leading around the enemy's lines. I think I ought to be a soldier for at least for what I did."

"Hallo, Y——!" exclaimed his bosom-friend, Lieutenant A——, of Company L, "have we been keeping your deliee sensibilities in the dark? Reveal to us the injustice, and we will rectify it, if possible. I will engage to use my private influence with the Secretary to make your claims known and appreciated."

"Bother your influence! I would wait to use it until I find it gets you a leave of absence to go and comfort a certain person at home. But I will say that I dodged about among the rebs for three days under aggravating circumstances, and brought myself and my horse and all my men out safe; and, as I am in a talking mood, I will tell you more about it than I have done yet.

"When Pope had permitted Jackson to march in his rear for twenty-four hours before the intelligence reached him, he seemed to have a notion that he might as well try to stop Longstreet from following in his footsteps. So Colonel W—— marched an along to Thoroughfare Gap, to hold it with his two hundred cavalry against a rebel army corps. After taking more prisoners than we knew what to do with, and finding Longstreet pushing pretty hard at us, W—— let us to work like day-laborers blockading the Gap, and a very neat operation we made of it. Indeed, we did it so well that I had nearly work to get back myself. There was very pretty, so far; but, unfortunately, our commanders seemed to have forgotten the existence of Hooker's Gap, and that this road runs over it to Thoroughfare. Wyndham, who gallantly kept his eyes open, sent me, with a dozen men, to keep an eye upon it; and General Bayard soon after bringing up the rest of the brigade, the Harris Light deployed some skirmishers to the front of this. They kept, however, at a respectful distance behind me; for I knew what Wyndham wanted, and had to push on. When I took my post I sent back and got the Harris officer to connect with me tolerably near. Just about sunset their cavalry began to show through the woods on my right, and I sent back word to the General, and prepared for further orders: two of my men being away—one with the Harris, and one having been sent to the Colonel. I suppose the Harris officer forgot to mention to the General my advance party, and did not think of it himself; for, the rebels making a push, he was obliged to fall back a little, without giving me any notification of the fact. So that, thinking I knew I saw parties of reb lying around loose in every direction. As I saw it my heart began to beat 'Libby Prison, Libby Prison, Libby Prison;' and I give you my word it kept on at that tune all the three days. However, I thought that I could not be taken yet, and that a little freedom was so much gain. The boys had all those gray undershirts which the Government served out to them last winter, so I made them take off and throw away their jackets, informing them that they were Confederate troops. I knew that it was dangerous. So to assume the character of regular troops, so I determined to be a scouting party of partisan rangers, assuming myself the name of a well-known S. Carolina room-mate of mine—Duncan Moore. I would have pushed that night for the Alexandria turnpike, about which Buford and Gregg were fighting; but the firing had grown more distant toward evening, and I was pretty certain that our men had fallen back toward Manassas Junction. So I had all Jackson's force in my way there, Longstreet's cavalry between me and Warrenton, and I did not know how many hundreds of miles between me and the Potomac. Contrary to Shakespeare's theory, I preferred to fly to evils that I knew rather, instead of bearing those that at present surrounded me. Too may imagine how I stole through the woods and hills that night, always keeping to the mountains, with a sharp look-out for campfires and strolling parties of cavalry. I did not care much for the infantry straggling, for I knew that they would think it all right, observing us moving along like a patrol; and I think the boys rather enjoyed humbugging them with my commissary. They made me out a mighty famous fellow, and looked disgusted and astonished when the men said they had never heard of "Duncan Moore." All along, mixed with these stragglers, were parties of wounded from King's engagement, which was the only way I could get some water to drink at one of the wells was by demanding it for some wounded man. I only had one big canteen with me, though. I could hear a heavy column coming along right by where I had to pass; and in the only cover to there was a few hundred yds to get off my horse, and stole within sight so as not to be observed myself; and I was considerably relieved at finding that they were not even skirmishers, but were a party of negroes who had probably been turned out of their quarters by surgeon's orders. I went by very leisurely, and struck a light to look in the direction of the Gum-Spring road. We lay very quiet all that day, listening to the guns of Siegel's and M'Dowell's fight with Jackson. We had nothing for our horses, and only a few biscuits for ourselves; for we did not dare fire for fear of a mule coffee. Toward evening, finding that part of the country rather quiet, I ventured to carry my party on to the south road. There were only some stacks of hay in a field near by. The horses scented it too, and I did not dare to pass for fear a whinny might be a whinny-ing in the enemy's case when the sound would be inconvenient. We stole into the woods, and then, dodging along the fence, managed to reach the stacks, and got enough to keep the poor beasts alive. By this time I was out of the track of their column, and moving within the range of their scouting and foraging parties; and though I had to be perhaps even more watchful, I ventured to push on more openly than before. What swarms of irregular cavalry I did see!—part of their cavalry regiments, no doubt, but with a style of discipline and uniform as much very different from ours. Half the column seemed to be dragging out and galloping up just as it pleased them—riding off to the houses, hallooing at the wells, in fact doing just as they chose. These habits made it much more disagreeable to Jackson's hiding while they passed us; but as they felt no need for advance-guards or flankers so far from an enemy, all I had to do was to choose an uninviting place. Oh! how I longed to have one ride at them sometimes; and I heard the men speculating convolutedly on the value of some of the horses. That night we crossed the Aldie turnpike and made our way toward the river. I had to turn back from the direction of Chantilly, and get across the London Railroad at Guilford Station, I think. And then I began to feel that I was almost safe, and have that longing to get quite out of danger which I once experienced swimming for my life against the tide. It was the evening of the second day. We had made so many turns that the distance traveled was nearly twice what we had gained. None of us slept very sound, and none of us had had to eat. What was almost as bad, though we had tobacco, we had no matches, and had been without smoking for two days. Now I felt rather bold; and seeing some pretty girls at a house near the road, I determined to get a light. So I rode up as boldly as could be, and greeting them very politely made known my request. They invited me in, asking the news, and making themselves very agreeable. I told them as much as I had picked up: 'that Jackson had been fighting all around Manassas and Bull Run, but that General Lee had passed him now, and was in pursuit of the main body, in which our side, as far as I knew, was whipping.' That I had been sent to that way to see if the country was all clear, and that Lee intended to march right over that region to take Washington. I might even have said to Washington, for stepping into the house there, sitting at ease as if at home, was a full-fledged rebel cavalry-man, on whom the girl that I first privately addressed did not cast an eye of regard. I began to feel that I had stepped into the wrong box; but putting on a careless air, walked to the fire, took up some fire, and lighted my pipe, as if I was so accustomed to such meetings that I did not even notice them. But I found out that I could not very well bear for supper; that it was essential that I should get to Drainsville that night, so that I might be ready to return and report to General Stuart as soon as possible. The man did not appear to notice any thing out of the way, and I determined to make a bold push and away without trouble. It was just getting dark when I got into Drainsville. It is a wretched little hole, and I had no intention of stopping there; but it would have excited so much observation if I had been seen off the road, that I had to take the road there. And, as though it loved to see thirty or forty beautiful cavalry horses standing unsaddled, but otherwise ready for service, all among the village street. There was not a house without its party, and there, to my surprise, I noticed the fine of my friend the rebel quartermaster. I began to feel the walls of the Libby Prison closing around me, even if they might not choose to consider me a spy, at which I should be shot; and began to have a very curious sensation around it. However, I thought that I had better put on a bold face. So, riding right into the village, I pulled up and beckoned to him. 'What officer is in command of this party?' asked I. 'There's no officer along, Sir. We're now at Wright's tavern, and I'm going in to see our friends. The Colonel has parties out on scout farther toward the river, and in toward the fighting; and we got home here while they're sent are in the neighborhood.' 'There are no Yankee scouts about, then, just now?' I said, much diffident. 'Well, I am looking after some that I heard of back near Aldie.' 'None has passed here but our own men, and your party,' answered he, gravely. 'I think that they can get through. I will tell any of our scouts that I see to keep a sharp look-out for them.' 'Well,' said I, 'I'm pushing down the road until I come to water and forage. You can say that Captain Moore of the North Carolina Cavalry has passed.' So off I rode, leaving him in high admiration at my cool as fast as my jaded horses would let me. The first lane that I came to I turned up, and took my men into a wooded hollow out of view of the road, and near to a quiet little farm-house. Here I halted for five minutes, and actually getting faint from lack of nourishment. Before we left the regiment there had been little to eat, and since then we had been starving. I suppose that, and the notion that I had done as much damage as could be done, made me reckless; for, leaving my men in the hollow, I rode to the house, entered, and sat down. About the most motherly-looking woman that I ever saw was sitting there by the fire. I wished her for, I will something told me that she must still have an affection for the Union. She looked at me, and asked me, 'What I would have?' I said that I was a Federal officer. Shaking her head, she replied, 'Then I can't help you.' 'Many parties are passing up and down all the time. Listen?' —and I could hear the tramp of a company of cavalry moving after their videttes ahead. 'I know,' said I, 'that you will not betray us. We have been for more than two days cut off from our army, and are trying to get within our lines. We have had nothing to eat, and have scarcely closed our eyes.' Before I had finished speaking the old lady had a pot on the fire, and was getting us a hasty supper. I found that her husband was suspected by the secessionists, and that he lived a very unquiet life. He had no corn but a little hay, which he gave us for our horses; and we all got a supper which seemed to us the very perfection of food as we had ever eaten. That night, back in the hollow behind the house, we slumbered deeply; and at dawn rose up with renewed strength and ready to dare any thing. As we started off, after paying as well as we could for what we had taken, we plighted troth and old lady's blessing. She halted him to his great alarm. He began to think that we must be rebels after all, and besought us to remember the good supper we had had. She told him in a way that moved our hearts. He was much relieved when he found that he only wanted him to show us by-road to Falls Church. We began to be certain that there were parties out in chase of us, and we knew that our pursuers were not to be raw. "Very quietly and cautiously we moved on; so much so that we avoided our own outposts, and came already to a picket, very much to their astonishment. I could tell you how I got the party into Washington; how I saw General M'Clellan for the first time, without knowing him; how I was rather free and easy at first, and then very much scared when I found who I was talking to; how he complimented me, and how I got leave to run home for a day or two: but I have been tiresome enough as it is, and can only assure you that a great deal more happened during those three days."

"That was a little different from your first encounter with the 'Seventh Cavalry,' I——y?" said A——, looking malicious. "You don't tell that, so I shall do it for you. You see we had seized a big wagon loaded with flour, and had been obliged to leave it in Occoquan, I—— was sent down there to bring it over. The ferry-boat was gone, the water was high, and he did not know how to manage. While he was preparing to go after it, he heard a drum and fife in the village. He dismounted some of his carbineers, placed them along the ridge commanding the ferry, and arranged for a desperate defense. The drum and fife approached, and I—— 's heart beat at the awful responsibility of his first combat, and he watched anxiously for the appearance of the enemy. At the head of the column appeared around the houses, moving with military dignity, Y—— examined them with his opera-glass in the attitude of Wellington at Waterloo. As he was doing so he heard a faint chuckle among his men. He took one more look, and with the promptitude of extreme youth ordered his men into the small boats and pulled over to the wagon. His vision of blood and glory had been created by a lot of boys playing soldier."

THE "MONITOR."

For evermore,
By the Ocean River's soundless shore,
Where the sea-grass points, by bank and bar,
Up through the gloom to the Northern Star,
With its nerves of fibrous iron set
The silent throat and strain
With which its stormy fate was met

On the spectral midnight main,
Unbothered by the billows wave,
In its battle-armor dressed.
Like a knight of old in his warrior grave,
The Monitor lies at rest.

The white-winged ships
Glide through the foam above;
And the trembling needle veers and dips
From its ancient, barry love.
A sentinel world its palsied hand
Keeps at the helm of its mighty command.
Of the hulk that erst with its iron will
Rode the startled hearts of men grow still,
And veiled in the sea's dim eye old control
Of the mystic forces that guard the pole.

Startling, sublime,
Blotting the records of elder time,
Was the coming of that should break the sleep
Of men who dreamed that the rocking deep
Bore on its breast no mightier power
Than in their brain was born,
When, in the evening's bodeful hour
Of terror wild,
This youngest child
Of the forge and the anvil, silently
Crossed the waves to the enter sea,
And through the summer midnight's haze,
Half lit by the frigate's dying blaze,
Awaited the awful morn.

Sunrise upon the bay,
And ripples glistening in the slanting ray,
Peaceful as when the fifth day came Upon a world yet unbeheld by eyes
That held the seeds of flame.
Specs in the azure shield
And under two dark forms of iron hide,
Fire-hearted, bloody-throated, eager-eyed,
Waiting and panting with constricted breath,
Alert, suspicious, wary, still as death.

Boom!
A sound like the terrible shock of doom;
And a tongue of flame behind the smoke,
That white from its hidden port-hole broke,
In mockery of a flag of peace!
The blow of a thunder-bolt falling in vain,
Missing off in the gulfing main;
Blow after blow without surcease,
Like the hopeless strokes by the archfiend given
To the angel-guarded walls of heaven;
Till battered, broken, drenched with blood,
Seems open wide to the eager flood,
The ocean monster, stubborn, fierce,
As the treason that gave it birth,
And the vessel's shell pierce,
Till this is a freeman's earth,
Sunk away to its fever den,
While the Monitor rested be,
In the gladdened eyes of God and men,
Crowned King of the Sea.

Its work was done;
The era of iron right began;
The first great battle fought and won.
Well that the champion ship should be
Enshrined in the heart of the loving sea;
To feel forever the throbs
Thrilling metallic veins below;
Safe from the weakness of growing age,
The battle's shock, and the whirlwind's rage!

The swinging tide,
Swinging through circles ocean wide,
Shall pause a moment beside the wreck,
Softly slide on the bolted deck,
Wind through the rusting port-holes grim,
Circle the turret's outer rim.
And kiss the cannon's silent lips,
That spoke the decrees of the king of ships;
And then away to the misty shores,
Where the gull is scared by the fisher's oars;
And under the skies where the northern bear
Paces around in the midnight glare;
Dip forlorn in the realms of frost and snow,
Whose feet are red in the fires below;
By the Empire Isles, eternally
Watching the lilies over the sea;
By the stormy shores of wild Biscay,
And the vine-clad capes of Spain,
To the burning sands that have heard for aye
The clank of the bondman's chain;
And across where the tropic whirlwinds rise
Round the throne of the Western Queen;
Till the waters pause where the Monitor lies,
Ere the shadows of night screen,
And tell of the mist, frost, fire, and sun,
Suspicion, hopes, and fears,
And the grave-worm might of the good begun
Through the never-failing years,
Till they glide at last in a sunny round,
By lands redeemed to human ken,
And smile in their happiness silently,
As they pass the Monitor under the sea.

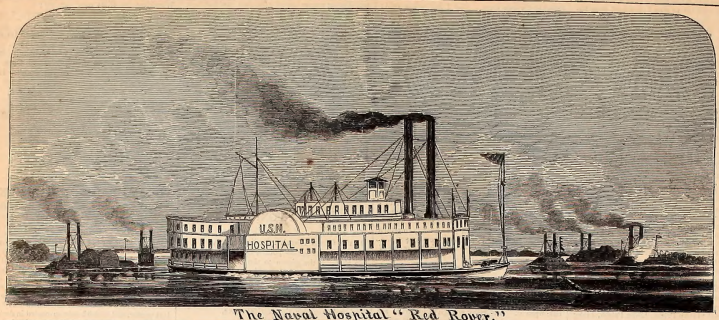
THE CAMPAIGN IN LOUISIANA.

We publish on page 292 two illustrations of GENERAL BANKS'S CAMPAIGN IN LOUISIANA, from sketches by Mr. E. H. Sothell. Mr. Sothell writes:

"The sketch of Brashear City is appropriate at this time, as it was at this point the majority of General Banks's troops crossed on pontoon bridges in pursuit of the rebels under Sibley. It is the temporary terminus of the New Orleans, Opelousas, and Great Western Railroad, and has been held by our troops as an outpost since last summer. The gunboats shown are the Calhoun, on board of which Commander Buchanan was killed last winter, and which lately succeeded in destroying the Queen of the West, the Diana, Hart, burned by the rebels, to prevent her falling into our hands; and the Estrella, an English vessel, captured while trying to run the blockade.

"The gun-boat Arrataria, shown in the other sketch, was a popular little craft, built for a sugar-boat to navigate shallow bayous, and converted into a gun-boat since General Banks took command of the Department of the Gulf. While on a reconnoitring expedition up Amite River recently she ran on a snag, from which it was impossible to extricate her. She was burned to prevent her falling into the hands of the rebs, who kept up a hot fire from ambush all the while she was ashore, but did not succeed in injuring any body."

THE NAVAL HOSPITAL BOAT "RED ROVER."



THIS institution, which we illustrate on page 300, is under the charge of Surgeon George H. Bixby and Dr. Hopkins, and is an untold comfort to our sick and wounded sailors. The sketch shows the main ward, in which are accommodations for over two hundred patients. The Sister is one of those good women who, from the rose, whose they smoke, read, and generally enjoy themselves. The boat itself, a clean, roomy craft, is under the command of a gallant old sailor.

THE FEAT OF THE "ESCORT."

On page 301 we illustrate the magnificent exploit of the steamer Escort, in running the rebel blockade between Washington, North Carolina, and Newbern, a little. Mr. Frenzeny, the author of the sketch from which our illustration was taken, writes us as follows:

"NEWBERN, April 17, 1863.

"I herewith send you a sketch of the steamer Escort, Captain Hall, of Philadelphia, running under a cross-fire from the rebel batteries at Rodman's Point, about four miles below Washington, North Carolina, on the morning of the 16th inst., with Major-General Foster on board, bound to Newbern, North Carolina, at 6 A.M. the rebels opened fire upon me from a field-piece, and, raking the steamer 'fore and aft.' At 6.30 abreast of Rodman's Battery, about a hundred yards distant, rifled musketing a tremendous fire from four 12-pounder guns at Rodman's Point and three from Hill's Point, a little above Rodman's Point; and also from rifled muskets all along the bank. Here my pilot, William Patrick, of North Carolina, was shot dead at my feet—at a terrible cost I am sorry to say. Lieutenant-Colonel Bowerfing his blood over the floor and upon my person. At this perilous moment the steamer struck a target on board to make something of a pilot. He sent to me, but being too frightened to be of service, I took the helm myself, and, under a terrific storm of orders to crowd on all steam possible, the steamer dashed through the obstructions, which consisted of four rows of piles, placed in such a zigzag position that there was no possibility of "dodging," and nothing to do but to dash through and trust a kind Providence with the results. One cannon-shot passed through the General's room, over the foot of his bunk; another, a shell, passed through the kitchen, just through a bolster on the stove, also through a bale of hay, taking off a negro's arm, and finally landed in the engine-room, where it exploded. Still another shell burst against the pilot-house, shattering it badly, and scattering the splinters about as promiscuously, knocking down Henry Gallop and hitting me, not seriously, in several places. The damages by the shell in the engine-room were as follows: The bell connecting the walking-beam badly bent, eccentric rod completely broken, hangers bent, set screws broken, air-barrel on steam-pump injured, slide of air-pump, broken, and many other slight damages."

THE FLOATING HOSPITAL ON THE MISSISSIPPI.—DRAWN BY MR. THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 301.]

PRINCE SALM-SALM.

We publish herewith a portrait of PRINCE SALM-SALM, Colonel 8th New York Volunteers, from a photograph by Brady. This officer, who won distinction as a cavalry officer in Prussia, arrived here on the outbreak of our war with a letter from the King, and was received with cordiality. His first wish was to command a regiment of cavalry. This, however, was found to be impracticable in consequence of the Prince's ignorance of the English language. He was accordingly placed on General Blenker's staff. After serving in this capacity for some months he was appointed to the command of General Blenker's old regiment, the 8th New York Volunteers, which he has led throughout the war. The regiment has completed its term of service, and returned home last week. We presume that the Prince will soon find some new sphere in which he can continue serving the country.

PRINCE SALM-SALM, COLONEL 8TH REGIMENT NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS.

WISER AND BETTER.

SHE was walking hastily up the hill-side in a fitful mood.

On the brow of the hill a large old maple spread its branches, targets for the golden arrows quivering from the autumn sunset.

Gertrude had flung her jaunty little hat with its curled dark-blue feather upon the ground, while seating herself under the old tree, and now, resting her soft cheek upon her hand, dreamed until the flush in the west faded to amber. When at length she raised her head a large tear was slowly rolling down her cheek. It fell upon a scarlet leaf tangled in the fringe of her shawl.

"Mocking the happy days of last autumn," she sighed, brushing the glistening tear away. "I wonder if Walter will ever again twine bright leaves among my curls." Stooping forward she caught up her flat by one of its long ribbons, and gathering her shawl closely around her, leisurely descended the hill. At its base she struck into a path leading to a quaint little brown cottage.

"Och! Miss Gerthrude, ye been gone so long honey, an' a swate jintleman in riginemials sveitin' to see yer purty face, an' yer Aunt Milly at the Squire's lint party. Don't be so anger-like, dear; it's not the like o' Misther Walther at all, at all."

Gertrude gasped frightfully, leaning against the hall table for support.

Bridget appeared distressed.

"Would I run for wather for ye, honey?

"No, no." She paused, pressed her hand to her side as if in pain, then resolutely turned the handle of the parlor door and entered.

A gentleman was slowly walking back and forth before the wood fire crackling upon the hearth. As Gertrude closed the door behind her he paused, and then advanced a step or two toward her.

"I must introduce myself," said a rich, kind voice. "Bethel Stuart—Miss Fitz Hugh, a friend of Walter Steyn."

"And he? What news of him?" burst from Gertrude's lips, raising her eager eyes to his face.

"He was wounded."

"Oh! not killed, thank God, not killed!" she cried, interrupting him, clasping her small hands, her beautiful eyes brimful of sudden tears.

Mr. Stuart looked extremely distressed.

"Poor child!" he said, soothingly, laying his hand upon her bright hair, "would that it were not killed. But poor Walter died of his wound upon the battle-field."

The bright flush of excitement faded from her cheek. She raised her brown eyes to his with a pleading glance.

"He is not dead. No, no, not dead; only say he is not dead!" she uttered in a hoarse whisper.

Mr. Stuart shook his head sadly.

"Oh, my God, Walter, Walter!" she cried, in low, altered tones.

Bethel Stuart caught her ere she fell. Tenderly gathering her into his strong arms he laid her white and breathless upon the sofa.

A rush of cold air from the opened window roused her. The long dark eyelashes quivered almost imperceptibly, the pale mouth parted with a gasping sound.

Mr. Stuart left her for an instant and came back with a glass of cool spring water. She drank a little, he holding the glass.

"I am quite strong now," she said, in a faint voice; "please go on."

The recital was a painful one. When Mr. Stuart had finished a look of relief spread over his fine features.

"You must let me be a friend to you now," he continued, bending toward her. "It was his wish."

Gertrude raised her wet face.

"You loved Walter," she said, in scarcely audible tones; "your breast pillowed his dying head—indeed, indeed your sympathy is very precious to me. Poor, poor Walter! Were those his last words," she continued, vainly striving to steady her voice.

"They were his words," Bethel Stuart answered, evasively. "Your name was the last word upon his lips."

"May I come this way sometimes and see how you are? Now that I have two little orphan nephews to care for I shall not return to the war. I had thrown up my commission before the last battle, but waited to see how Walter would fare. I am rejoiced that I did so. Good-by, Miss Fitz Hugh; I must be in the city this evening and have barely time to catch the down train."

* * * * * * * * * *

Edith Barclay stood before a mirror in her mother's softly-lighted parlors, fastening a japonica bud among her dark glossy braids.

"Mamma, how late Bethel is to-night!"

"Yes, my love."

"Edith, dear," Mrs. Barclay resumed, after a slight cough of embarrassment, "it strikes me you are too exacting—that is—"

"Pray go on, mamma," said Edith, turning with an air of superb scorn toward her mother, a frail looking lady with a sweet, low voice.

"Never mind now, my love. That is Mr. Stuart's ring. I was in hopes you would have understood me," she added.

Mrs. Barclay kissed her daughter's forehead and left the room as Bethel Stuart entered it.

"How very late!" greeted Edith, withdrawing herself from his arms that he might not kiss her.

"I have had something to do which took me from town for a few hours."

"I don't see what," said Edith, petulantly.

"How should you, my dear?" resumed Mr. Stuart, with an absent air. "A few of Walter Steyn's things were forwarded to me from Washington by my directions. This afternoon I took the cars and delivered them myself to Miss Fitz Hugh. Poor girl, my heart bleeds for her. Edith, I must take you out there. And some day we will beg your mamma's permission to bring her here for a week or fortnight. The novelty of city life may divert her mind."

"She won't want to be gay. It will be so stupid having her here."

An expression of painful surprise crossed Mr. Stuart's face.

"You would be very much interested in her were you to see her," he replied, gravely. "Will you let me take you there some time?"

Edith would not speak, but sat with coldly averted face.

"Edith, Edith!" cried Mr. Stuart, drawing her toward him, "where are your warm generous impulses? I scarcely recognize my darling in this strange mood." He imprisoned both her fair hands in one of his, and holding her close to his breast, gazed long and earnestly into her drooping face.

Presently her eyelids began to quiver, the pouting mouth grew tremulous. She burst into tears.

"You don't love me," she sobbed, hiding her face upon his shoulder.

There were no grieving accents in her tones. Mr. Stuart did not try to soothe her, but allowed the passionate tears to fall, still holding her tenderly to him. When at length he did speak, which was merely to pronounce her name, Edith started at the grave tone. Raising her head rather proudly, she strove to withdraw from the strong arms which held her, but in vain.

Bethel forced her to turn her face to his. He was all gentleness, but so grave, almost stern, Edith fancied.

THE STEAMER "ESCORT" RUNNING THE REBEL BATTERIES NEAR WASHINGTON, NORTH CAROLINA.—[SEE PAGE 299.]

"Are you distressed at the sympathy and interest I have felt for poor, dead Walter's Gertrude? Is it so, Edith? is it so?"

He awaited her reply anxiously. It came at last with a snap of fretfulness.

"You can go out there and comfort Miss Fitz Hugh as often as you choose. It won't make one bit of difference to any one in this house. Harry Lane will take me to parties and the Opera."

Bethel put her away from him, but not hastily.

"You are not a baby, Edith, to be coaxed back to smiles."

"It has been nothing but Gertrude, Gertrude, for the last two weeks," she pouted.

Mr. Stuart put a strong restraint upon himself before he again trusted his voice.

"God grant I have not been deceived in you, my precious Edith! But understand me once for all. I shall not trust of Miss Fitz Hugh for this unwarrantable whim of yours. She has no friends, and I promised my friend Walter Steyn, when he lay dying upon the battle-field, that I would befriend h r."

He paused to wipe the large drops of perspiration from his forehead.

"Choose between us," cried Edith, bitterly.

"Take care, take care, Edith," said Mr. Stuart, sternly: "you are reckless—"

"I mean it," she replied, with a light, mocking laugh. "I will never retract what I have said."

Be it so, then," Mr. Stuart's tone and lips grew white. His voice sounded strangely to his own ears. "You have no pity on yourself. Farewell!"

Edith Barclay drew herself up haughtily, and bowed with the stately grace of a duchess. But when the door closed upon Bethel Stuart, she flung herself upon the sofa, and, hiding her face among the cushions, sobbed as though her heart would break.

Half an hour later, bearing her father's step in the hall, she started up hastily, brushing back the heavy braids from her wet cheeks.

"Papa," she said, going to meet him, laying her little hand upon his arm, "don't ring for coffee yet. I want to tell you something."

"Tears, Edith? tears? Why, where is Bethel? I don't see him here."

"That is the trouble, papa. I suppose I have treated him rather badly, and he has gone off."

Mr. Barclay whistled, his eyes turned up to the ceiling.

"And when is he coming back, my dear?" he asked, laying his forefinger against the side of his nose, glancing slyly at his daughter.

"Now, papa, don't—don't make fun of me," she said, throwing her arms around her father's neck, drawing him down to a chair, and seating herself upon his knee. "I know you think it is nothing but a silly quarrel; but indeed—"

Edith burst into tears.

"Well, well, my pet! I am not laughing at you: only thinking over my own young days, you know. Come, come, Edith! Why, don't cry so, my dear."

He raised her hot face and laid her cheek to his.

"Hist, papa—"

"Well, my love?"

"You think Bethel will come back to me? Don't you, papa—don't you?"

"What took him off in such a hurry?"

"Because—because I didn't want him to care so much for Miss Fitz Hugh."

"Who is she?"

"The young lady Walter Steyn would have married if he had not been killed in battle."

"What has Bethel to do with her?"

"She is an orphan, papa; and Bethel promised Mr. Steyn he would be her friend, and—"

"And what, Edith?"

"I felt badly about it."

"About what, my daughter?"

"Why, his going to see Gertrude, and talking so much about her."

"Didn't Bethel want you to go and see her too?"

"Yes; but I can't now."

"Why not?"

"I went off into a fit of heroics while Bethel was here this evening, and told him to choose between us. Afterward I wouldn't retract what I had said."

"And Bethel?"

"He went off, papa, and I let him."

"Very pretty!"—Mr. Barclay paused a moment—"Bethel Stuart is a very proud man. He respects himself."

"Yes, papa, go on."

"And he won't come back—mark my words, Edith!—he won't come back unless you send for him."

"Then he may stay away," was upon Edith's lips; but something in her father's face checked such a light reply.

"Tell your mamma I want her—stay, I will go up to her room myself, and have coffee there."

He kissed her tenderly and led her go.

June came with her fragrant buds and vines. On every wayside bough the little birds held protracted meetings.

Surely, silently, under the influence of the sweet summer sunshine, the clouds of pride overshadowing Edith Barclay's heart dispersed.

"Papa," she said, one day, following her father from the dining-room into the hall, shyly putting a little note into his hand, "would you send that to—to—to Mr. Stuart?"

Mr. Barclay rapidly ran his eye over his daughter's delicate handwriting.

"Yes, my dear," he said, sadly.

"What is the matter, papa?" Edith asked, glancing uneasily at him.

"Nothing now. I was thinking, my love, that if you were too late—you understand me—why that there is nothing contained in this little note to cause you any after-feeling of embarrassment."

"But I don't understand," said Edith, simply.

"Never mind, love. I hope I may be mistaken in some of my ideas."

Mr. Barclay sighed, and hastily tucked his umbrella under his arm.

"Better send it by Thomas this afternoon before he brings the carriage round. Good-day, my dear."

That evening several of Edith's friends came in. Mr. Barclay watched his daughter narrowly. There was a flush upon her cheek, and a light within her eye which he did not like.

Their ye ' guests dispersed, he drew her toward him, aiding her to do his heart.

"You are anxious and nervous, darling."

"No, papa, not now," she said, in a clear, calm voice. "See, I have his answer already." She drew a little crumpled note from underneath her belt, quietly replacing it.

"I partly forfeited his respect that evening, I fancy—my long silence has done the rest. Papa, do you remember how you brought me home those beautiful fuchsias, and told me to give up pouting or I would be too tardy? But I was very wilful then, was I not, papa?" She gazed up into her father's face with a sad, wistful expression, then quietly bowed her forehead upon his arm.

"Edith, I shall take you to Europe. You sha'n't stay here," said Mr. Barclay, in a husky voice.

"Does mamma know?" he asked, presently. She shook her head.

"Will you tell her, papa? I did not dare; it will bring on one of those distressing sick headaches."

The pearl which Bethel Stuart had carried so long within his heart, through its profoundest gloom, thought, from human ken—which he hid day by day cherished more and more: waiting, waiting never so patient for the light that he might discover it to the fond, shy eyes of Edith Barclay—what then? "Too late, too late:" she had come looking for that which was not; and the June showers wept Amen upon the trees.

Time sheathed his remorseless summer scythe, sweet clover blossoms were ruthlessly mown in the south wind, golden rods flashing gloriously in the sunlight—tender blades of grasses—buds, lilies, blossoms—where are they garnered?

Scarlet leaves were falling from the forest trees.

A little while, and the white, wild winter more delicate than a woman's, spread a white mantle over the ruin he had wrought.

And the years sped by. Each year flew by, and April came, coaxing with many tears the crocuses into bloom.

Gertrude Fitz Hugh bent eagerly over them in Aunt Molly's garden, and, gathering a bunch, held them up delightedly to Mr. Stuart.

His imprisoned left wrist in a gentle grasp, brushing his cheek against the pretty flowers. Gertrude's eyes fell beneath his gaze.

"Gertrude, the last time that Steyn have never passed my lips. Will you listen to me?"

Gertrude Fitz Hugh started violently. A tremulous sigh fluttered to her lips. She did not speak, but waited patiently.

There was a strange thrill in Mr. Stuart's voice as he continued:

"Walter died ignorant of the engagement then existing between Miss Barclay and myself. Gertrude, besides claiming my friendship for you, he said to me, 'Bethel, perhaps you and she will love each other one day.' Gertrude, I am speaking for Your name, Miss Fitz Hugh, came with his last gasp."

Gertrude was sobbing.

Mr. Stuart raised her wet face to the sunshine.

"Will you be my Gertrude now?" he asked, tenderly.

A hot flush shot across her brow, a deadly pallor succeeded. The flowers fell from her weak grasp. Locking her hands convulsively together, she said, in a hard, strained voice,

"I am not Walter Steyn's legacy. You love Edith Barclay, Mr. Stuart. I never heard why you parted. But you love her passionately even now. I have seen it in your wife face with its pitiful flushings one day in the city, while Aunt Milly and I were shopping. Afterward I compared your two faces and thought you were blind."

"And you do not love me, Gertrude?" he asked, stooping to pick up her flowers.

For an instant she answered too rapidly for words, then she said, distinctly and resolutely, with a touch of pride,

"I do not. I have no right to offer me your love, Mr. Stuart."

He turned abruptly and left her.

Gertrude watched him until he disappeared behind the lilac boughs at the end of the long garden, then pressing up her wilted blossoms, went to her room to think.

How many of us have sought the seclusion of our chambers to think—thinking, we may best put away the remnants of a bright dream, and patiently take up again the threads of daily human life, and weave, with unconsciousness, to the flow of our stealthy tears.

Did he love Edith Barclay, passionately even, as Miss Fitz Hugh had confidently believed?

Bethel Stuart's heart responded Yes. His mind recurred to the last time that he had received from Edith in the early part of the last summer, and how nettled he had felt because she had not written sooner, that day forth he had steeled his heart against her.

Now a woman's hand had dared to turn aside the keen pleasure of his own, and he was a child in love of his heart, and lo! there was his pearl not lost, only hidden.

Again he stood in Mrs. Barclay's softly lighted parlors and heard Edith's light step upon the stair. Not rapid as of yore, when springing to welcome him, but slowly, almost reluctantly, he fancied.

His heart throbbed painfully as she came into the room, a slight blush mantling her cheek, and spreading in crimson tides to neck and brow.

Bethel Stuart quietly placed a chair for her.

"I must beg you to bear with me patiently for a few moments." He paused, his emotion broke through all barriers.

"Edith! Edith! can you forgive?" he cried.

She raised her eyes to his face with a shy, surprised look. A soft, half-dreamy light stole into them.

"Edith! Edith!" he repeated, pleadingly holding out his hand to her.

She came to him, and with the movement of a weary child laid her head upon his breast.

"We are both of us wiser and better now, are we not?" he whispered, softly.

CAMPAIGNING IN LOUISIANA.

THE picture on page 289, illustrating PICKET DUTY IN THE SWAMPS OF LOUISIANA, shows what our brave soldiers have to encounter in their campaign through Central Banks. Alligators and rattlesnakes abound on the bayous and in the swamps, and the manner of unpleasant creeping, flying, and walking creatures swarm under the luxuriant tropical vegetation. Campaigning in such a region has its charm; but it has its drawbacks too.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CHLOASMA, OR MOTH PATCHES.

Blemishes on the face, called Moth Mask, are very annoying, particularly to ladies of a fair complexion, as the discoloured spots on the skin show more strongly on blondes than on brunettes, but they constitute greatly in marring the beauty on either; and any thing that will remove moth patches without injuring the skin in texture or color, would no doubt be considered a great achievement in medical science. Dr. B. C. Pierce, having devoted his whole time and attention to Diseases of the Skin, will guarantee to remove Moth Patches, Freckles, and other discolorations from the face without injury to either texture or color of the skin. His success in this, as in other branches of his specialty—DISEASES OF THE SCALP AND LOSS OF HAIR—will warrant him in guaranteeing a CURE in several cases. For full particulars, address, enclosing stamp for a circular,

HOSTETTER'S
CELEBRATED
STOMACH BITTERS.

Loss of Delicate Constitution and uncertain health are strenuously advised to throw aside the nauseous and useless preparations with which they are surcharged to drug themselves, and test the hygeian, body-and-mind-strengthening virtues of HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS. In all the complaints and disabilities arising from acrid humors, they will find this cheering, refreshing, and invigorating preparation of extraordinary efficacy. Its regulating properties are wonderful; and as a remedy for the hangnor, nausea, tremors, convulsions, hysterics, and many others accompany the development of womanhood, it has no equal either among the prescriptions of the faculty or advertised medicines. For the many distressing feelings which usher in and often follow the period of maternity, and also for the painful and dangerous symptoms which sometimes accompany the change of life, HOSTETTER'S BITTERS are earnestly recommended. No other restorative seems to suit so well the constitution and the organization of the feebler sex. In all cases of female debility, where there is a want of the vital spark, this BITTERS produces a most important change—relieving local weakness, and establishing the general health.

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners, the exposition of all prominent manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Corn Flour" of this and other countries notwithstanding. The only preparation that received the approval of Liebig. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Makes Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without eggs, kitchen, with five or no eggs, at a cost scarcelyin the most economical. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. A little boiled in milk will produce rich Cream for coffee, chocolate, tea, &c. Put up in 1 pound packages, under the trademark "Maizena," with directions. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists generally.

Cherry Pectoral

For the Rapid Cure of

COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS,
BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING-COUGH, CROUP,
ASTHMA, and CONSUMPTION.

This remedy has won for itself such notoriety from its cures of every variety of pulmonic disease, that it is certainly unnecessary to recount the evidences of its virtues in any community which has been enjoyed. So wide is the field of its usefulness, and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every section of the country abounds in persons publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate illness of lungs by its use. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine is fixed in the confidence of those who understand and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the distressing and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs which are incident to our climate. Not only in formed communities upon the lungs, but for the milder varieties of bronchial affections, it is found the best remedy. LAY OF THE MODDERN "KONSERVATIVS."

I am a guy "Konservativ."
I stand by the old Konstitushun, I du;
I go for the Union as it was,
With the old Dimmycrat ticket, ritu thru.
These black Republikans don't suit me,
For I'm a Konservativ man, yu no!

I am a Dimmycrat, dyed in the wool—
I go fur free trade, and that sort ov thing;
I think it's rite to let Slavery rule—
Soonerr'n her Lincoln I'd vote fur a king,
And bee the Stouth fur an aristockracy
Ta rule the bull North (except the Dimmockracy).

Bluttin up fokes fur speekin their mind
In my opinion's a piece of knavery—
I go fur free speech ov every kind.
Except when it interfers with slavery!
(Sich kind ov free speech all Dimmykrats fight—
Ef Brooks had killed Sumner he'd done just right.)

I go fur sour konstitushunal rights,
With the rit ov habeas corpus invi'late.
I'd show 'em how a Dimmykrat fights,
If Abram Lincoln attempts to rule it.
I've a right to tuek treason, ez I understand—
Tawk's tawk; it's money that buys the land!

I go fur the vigorous conduct ov war
(Of course with a decent regard to figgers,
So ez not to inkrease our national debt),
And I'm down all ov free nigger trade.
Pul rubber the North bed not pulled a trigger
Than see a traitor shot daown by a nigger.

Yes, I am a rest Konservativ;
I stand by the Constitushun, I du!
Ef enny wun ass I'm frends with the Sauth,
I'll sware by hokey it isn't true!
I only a-mittid, but, be—I—speshul fus—
kinder believe in Vallandigham, though!

HARPER'S WEEKLY

"SCARCELY any paper is doing so much for UNION and LIBERTY as Harper's Weekly."—Boston Commonwealth.

THE SITUATION.

ONCE more the nation is called upon to sustain itself bravely under the smart of defeat. Major-General Hooker's campaign against Fredericksburg, like that of General Burnside, has failed.

Of the operations of the Army of the Potomac we have news up to Wednesday, May 6. On 28th, 29th, and 30th April General Hooker crossed the Rappahannock at various fords from 15 miles above Fredericksburg to 30, and drove in the rebel pickets, advancing his army to a small village called Chancellorsville, near the residence of a Mr. Chancellor. A day or two previously General Stoneman, with a large cavalry force, had been sent to make a grand detour by way of the Upper Rapidan and the southern part of Orange and Spotsylvania counties, with a view of cutting the railroad between Richmond and Fredericksburg in the neighborhood of Milford. General Hooker's advance took the rebels by surprise, and compelled them to come out of their intrenchments and attack the Union army. Withdrawing the bulk of his army from the heights above Fredericksburg, the rebel General made his first attack on Friday afternoon, another on Saturday, and a third on Sunday. These various fights appear to have been bloody and indecisive. Fortune varied, as usual in the great battles of this war; at times we drove the enemy, at times they drove us; one day we took some guns and prisoners, and the next we lost some. But on Monday, 4th April, Sedgwick, who had stormed the heights of Fredericksburg when the rebels withdrew the bulk of their force from that point, was obliged to give way. General Hancock, who is said to have brought up reinforcements to the rebels, attacked him fiercely, and finally drove him across the river, with a loss of some 6000 men. On the following day General Lee, flushed by success, threw his whole army upon General Hooker, and compelled him also to withdraw his force across the Rappahannock. Of the results of General Stoneman's raid, which was a part of the general plan, we have as yet no intelligence that is entirely reliable. He should try this time to have succeeded in cutting the railroad, so as to prevent the transmission of supplies and reinforcements, which are said to be going from Richmond in addition to General Lee. Comment on this event would as yet be premature, and we forbear.

Turning to the other theatres of the war, we find that all is activity in the Southwest. The railroad between Vicksburg and Jackson has been cut by our cavalry, and another attack upon that strong-hold has been commenced. General Sherman has landed a force in the Yazoo, near the point where he landed before, and General Grant has disembarked his army on the Mississippi side of the river a few miles below Vicksburg. Simultaneously, the fleets, under Porter and Farragut, are said to be preparing for a new bombardment. For the first time, therefore, Vicksburg may now be said to be fairly beleaguered, and whatever be the prospect of an assault, she difficulty experienced by the rebels in keeping up their communications must be very great indeed.

The last heard of General Banks was that he had succeeded in driving the rebels out of the richest portion of Louisiana, and had occupied the town of Alexandria, at the head of steamboat navigation on the Red River. He has thus driven the rebel Governor of Louisiana to the very confines of the State; has cut off all the supplies which the rebels at Vicksburg had been receiving by way of the Red River; and, more important still, appears to have discovered a large number of Union men, who were only too glad to welcome his approach, and return to their allegiance.

From the army of Tennessee we have no news except that our cavalry are making some serious raids into the rebel country, capturing prisoners and capturing supplies. Neither General Rosecrans nor General Bragg seem inclined to provoke the inevitable encounter; each waits for the other to move.

From Charleston a story reaches us that the iron-clads are again preparing to cross the bar. This we doubt. Still there can be no question but that the attack on this strong-hold of treason should be renewed as soon as possible, and as often as required, until it was successful. It would be well if the Navy Department were to direct Admiral Du Pont to attack Charleston once a month, until it was carried, and to go on building iron-clads to replace any which might be destroyed in the attacks.

The President has described the situation in a word. We are "getting away," and shall continue to "peg away" until our work is done.

OUR RELATIONS WITH ENGLAND.

We publish in another column a letter from an Englishman, which purports to prove that the mass of the English people are not, as has been argued, in alliance with the slave confederacy of the South; but that those Englishmen who have made public their sympathy with our slaveholding enemies are either themselves little better than another slaveholding oligarchy, which has been conspicuous in history as the opponent of freedom, democracy, and equal rights.

We freely admit that the people of the large cities of Great Britain—London, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Glasgow—have in assembled meeting testified their adherence to the great principles of human liberty which have been the boast of England in every past century, and for the maintenance of which the United States are now struggling. And, insomuch as this testimony of theirs, at this particular time, confers upon us a benefit, we do not doubt that the people of the United States ought to be and are grateful for it.

That gratitude, however, it is but fair to say, would be more lively if the views of our friends in England took the shape of a practical purpose instead of mere sentimental phrases.

It profits us very little to hear that large meetings have been held in Britain to express support of the Union, when at the same time we learn that new pirates are being built in the English dock-yards, and being sent to sea to prey upon American commerce, with the merest formality of official observance. We recently published in this paper in England continues to misrepresent and belie us in the most shameless and outrageous manner; and we have had occasion several times since superior to vulgar impulses of demagogy—like Lord Palmerston, Earl Russell, and Mr. Gladstone—gratuitously falsify our condition and our purposes, and thereby do their utmost to de over slave rebellion and blockade-running.

If these Englishmen, who are so much their friends, really feel and say by word and deed they not prevent the Japan getting to sea and obtaining her armament from the Alar? Why do they sit by quietly and see the rebels obtain coal in British ports? Why have they nothing to say to the pro-slavery articles in the leading papers, to the grossly false dispatches of Earl Russell, and the shameful perversion of fact contained in the speeches of Lord Palmerston?

It is extremely agreeable to hear that the British people are not to blame; but so long as the only depredations committed on our commerce are committed by British pirates, and the only statements in the public journals of Britain about us in the rebel interests are English statesmen, and the only newspapers which make a business of belying our country and misrepresenting us in the gross are of the world English newspapers, we must be permitted to tone down our gratitude for British sympathy.

Englishmen must understand that we have never sought aid, moral or material, from abroad. From the recognition, by the maritime powers of Europe, of a state of war existing between one in this country has understood that we were to fight out our battle alone. All that we have asked has been non-interference. If the Queen were to condemn the rebels in her speech to Parliament, and her ministers were to join in denouncing the nefarious attempt of Mr. Davis and his confederates to establish a slave confederacy, it would do us no good. We ask no foreign aid, nor desire none. Those among us who once loved England would have liked, for her sake, to have seen her take a position in this great controversy worthy of her antecedents, and worthy of her great men of the past. They have sorrowed to see her sink to the level of a purveyor of pirates, a manufacturer of manacles, and a sneaking ally of the meanest form of treason.

A VOICE FROM ENGLAND.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

SIR,—The state of the public mind in this country has arrested my attention, and induces me to ask you to allow a stranger to offer a few remarks through your widely-circulated. The struggle in which you are engaged is one in which few Englishmen are unconcerned spectators, but one in which your people too readily assume the interest to be all upon the side of the South. It need not, and indeed must not, be that large deeds have been made and honored upon that account; but it may be now respectfully submitted that the deeds are exhausted, and "un effects" will ere long be the indorsement. The reasons for the expression of sympathy so frequent some months ago may be epitomized as follows:

1st, Pluck. As all Englishmen admire pluck, from the bishop to the cabman, as Emerson says, so a small people numerically contending with one three or four times as many, and fighting—as it must be admitted they have fought—bravely, necessarily appealed to this powerful English principle; and men of strong impulse, animal courage, and little moral power or cultivation, especially as Sir Robert Peel (son of the Sir Robert), very readily fell into the error of forgetting the cause and regarded the fight as it was contested.

2d, The demonstrated feasibility of separation in the case of your own great Republic, born of our own Empire, naturally led to the belief that North and South fell into two peoples; such reasoners having forgotten or overlooked the not unimportant fact that a particular and dismembering sent are widely different processes; and while in the latter case the Atlantic is the great fact takes suggested a natural boundary, Nature herself has, in the latter, made perpetual presence and almost constant antagonism the essential conditions of separation.

3d, While cotton had not seared the consciences and stopped the ears of all England, it had laid its spell upon influential classes, such as cotton-spinners and manufacturers (not all of these, however), ship-owners and ship-brokers of the Liverpool and Stumsfield, who have examplar-ized political haunting—the Spithead Derby, Ireman Hall, who have reviewed its moral aspects, and the crowd of inconsiderable "nobodies," such as Mr. Hughes Hughes Brown, Hughes Hughes Brown and Goldwin Smith, John Stuart Mill, the Duke of Argyle, and Milner Gibson, have not spoken in behalf of these classes, but for the sentiments of public opinion. The Times tried to ignore the movement, but ten thousand people in and around Exeter Hall soon let it be ignored. The Post scoffs and ridicules it; but the people do not mind its scoffs; and its able and honest competitor, the Daily News, presents the facts and the principles thereon, as does the Star; and, with few exceptions, the large provincial journals, such as the Leeds Mercury, Birmingham Daily Post, Manchester Examiner and Times, Liverpool Daily Post, Cheltenham Examiner, and Bristol Northern Star vigorously counteract the Times teachings. Let the American people and Congress vigorously act out President Lincoln's Proclamation, and they may be assured of the good wishes of old England. In the words of the great and good Dr. Guthrie, Moderator of the Free Church of Scotland, "THE ADVANCED POSITION WHICH THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT HAS NOW TAKEN UP, AND MADE THE SUBJECT OF SLAVERY HAS MADE THEIR CAUSE THAT OF HUMANITY AND RELIGION; THEREFORE I CAN NOT BUT WISH, AND PRAY, THAT THEIR SUCCESS AGAINST A POWER WHICH RESTS ON PRINCIPLES AS INSULTING TO GOD AS THEY ARE CRUEL TO MAN."

I am, Sir, respectfully,
A BRITISHER.

May 9, 1863.

THE LOUNGER.

FIRMNESS THE SECURITY OF PEACE.

BETWEEN great nations, as Washington said, in his Farewell Address, there can be no romantic friendship. Such ties can be, and often are, decree of friendliness, ranging from a thinly-masked hostility up to an expression and action of cordial sympathy. The extreme extremes of political friendliness between states are illustrated in the conduct and expression of Lord Brougham in Great Britain and Count Cavour in Italy, before the death of that greatest of modern statesmen, as reported in the correspondence of Mr. Motley, the minister of Mr. Marsh, our Minister to Italy. Self-respect, therefore, and the cause of popular civil liberty, for which this country is responsible, require that its relations with Great Britain should be regulated by a strict and cold regard to the letter of the law, and nothing further.

If Cavour were still living and directing the foreign policy of Italy, and the Merrimac were sailing under the Italian flag when she was arrested upon suspicion, the surrender of her mail-bag, even although it might have been made under strictly technical grounds, would not have touched so deeply the honor of this nation. It would have been a somewhat strange, but it would have been willingly, to mark our perception of the different bearing of one neutral power from another. In the actual case, however, there was no call for the least concession, even in appearance. If the Iveshaff were lastly detained, every spar and rope and marling-spike and piece of paper on board were equally good prize. If she were unjustly arrested, there has been not a moment's delay upon the part of the Government in amply apologizing and compensating. But until that point was fully determined there could have been no other object in surrendering part of her but to appease the irritation of John Bull.

Under the circumstances, however, it is an unnecessary humiliation. If the Government is unable to maintain its rights let us forbid the capture of all prize whatever, that we may not seem to add cowardice to impotence. But if we insist upon seizing contraband vessels under the British flag, let us settle the question of ship and contents by the strictest letter of the law. The British dispatch concedes our right to stop a vessel in the situation of the Peterhoff. Is there any thing in the present conduct of the British Government toward us which should induce us to wear even the appearance of obsequiousness? There can be no stronger friends of peace with England than we. But peace is marked by intelligent firmness when we are right, and swift apology and reparation when we are wrong; but never by shrinking or timid deprecation. Diplomacy can be heroic as well as sagacious.

THE FRUIT OF BRITISH "NEUTRALITY."

JOHN BULL in his unhandsome effort to discover how not-to-do is "neutrality" between this Government and the rebels, succeeds in doing some things that are a burning and an eternal disgrace. Captain Glover, of the bark Lyndon, arrives in Boston, having been chased by a pirate and driven her off. He reports that off Colorado Reef, on the 15th of April, he saw a steamer in full, but "being afraid of pirates, stood away." Captain Glover can not be blamed. The "piratical" character of the John Bull delights to call himself, having sent out pirates upon the ocean, which are built and manned in his ports, which are armed by his dye, and are armed by his connivance, which enter no harbors but his own, and burn the ships of a nation upon which John has treasury of commerce and amity, is directly responsible for the desolation and death and terror which ensue. If the vessel which Captain Glover saw were an innocent British vessel—if ship, cargo, crew, and passengers were lost—if every other ship, in mere self-defense, "stood away" and left them to their agony, it is the British Government which is responsible before God for the tragedy. That Government has taken pirates under its protection. Those pirates mark their course with the flames of their captures. The British Government sends out a burning ship upon the high seas no longer a summons of eager sympathy, but a ghastly warning of danger. It is a British vessel with which sailors the world loves, and which is rapidly extinguishing all individual respect in a sentiment of hatred for its falsity and contempt for its meanness.

JOHN ELLIOTT CAIRNES.

JOHN ELLIOTT CAIRNES is one of our firmest and fastest friends in Great Britain. Professor Cairnes has done this country is not second to that of John Bright, of John Stuart Mill, of Forster, of Richard Cobden, or of Goldwin Smith. He is Professor of Jurisprudence and Political Economy at Queen's College, Galway, and his work, The Slave Power, which has already passed into a second and enlarged edition in England, is the most thorough and exhaustive treatise upon the subject, displaying, indeed, a very remarkable knowledge of our history in the chapters devoted to the political aspect of the question. The work has been republished by Carleton in this city. Not only in his book, but constantly in the columns of the Daily News, Professor Cairnes has fought the cause of right for us, confounding several antagonists who undertook to defend the rebellion; and bringing the Saturday Review, in particular, to signal grief.

But Professor Cairnes's point of view is universal civilization, and not especially the permanence of the Union. The rebellion he considers to be the great anti-civilizing movement of history. It is barbarism in modern history: barbarism turning suddenly and making a stand against the progress of the race. It must, therefore, in the interest of humanity, be subdued. At any cost it must be overthrown. If the power of the United States Government is inadequate to quell it, the rebellion must be supported by the combined force of all Christian and civilized powers. When that is achieved an entirely new question is in view at once; and then, by what means shall the consequences that must follow the war be most promptly and permanently secured? He believes to the opinion that we shall find it best to put a few rebel States out to cool before receiving them again into the Union. In other words, he thinks it will be wiser for us to undergo a little temporary disunion. But he holds this view only because the thinks that the cause of human liberty and international peace would be the gainers. The absurdity of seceding, and the folly of yielding an inch until the fangs of the serpent are removed, are as clear to him as to any body. His difference is upon the question of establishing the Government anew.

But this is a speculative difference which does not affect either the one or the quickly sympathy. The show him that it is better for the great interests of liberty and of this free country to maintain the Union after our victory, and he would be very willingly persuaded. That he does not see it and know it as we do comes from the fact that he is not an American. He does not understand the inevitable necessity of the Union, in the first place; nor, in the second, does he appear to perceive that to set off any number of States, even if it were but a single State, as a separate power, would be to surrender ourselves immediately to the mercy of every foreign nation with which the new power would create alliances. Few of our foreign friends seem fully to apprehend that the question for us is Union and liberty, or separation and anarchy, with consequent moral, social, and political ruin.

But for the treatment of its great theme no work is to be named before "The Slave Power" of Professor Cairnes.

TWO KINDS OF MEN.

THERE are no men among us so ineffably mean as the white men who stand sneering at the black men. "Fools, pooh! they are made for slaves; we hate 'em!" There are no men more noble than the black men who, notwithstanding this maddening insult, which might justly drive them to join arms with their masters against us, have yet the perception that our cause is their cause, however we may try to conceal it. We lame them and blind them, and then sneer that they can neither walk nor see. We deprive them of every inspiring motive, of every word of sympathy, of every sign of respect and confidence, and then taunt their passivity. We crush them to the earth, and because they do not run faster than we.

The time has at last come when even they are to have a chance. The Mississippi River slaves, comprising those who have been sold from Virginia and the border States they had some sparks of manhood remaining, and those whose blood has been reinforced from the foreign slaves trade—these are the men who will fight. We dare to say that they will not carve the skulls of their late masters into drinking-cups, nor their bones into trinkets that they may wear on their surplices to wild horses nor hang them to bleach in the sun; that they will strike their masters only in honest fight, and that they will never have always struck them when they were utterly helpless. We don't believe they will even kill their late masters when are in rebellion, although those gentry have not hesitated to torture them when helpless and guilty of no conceivable indignities. We don't believe that they will draw them up in a line at night, hold lanterns to their faces, and shoot them down with one volley, as the barbarity did to the negroes they captured upon the steamer Sam Gaty at Sibley, Missouri. No, no! in every point of humanity, of honor, of generosity, and humanity, we believe they will show themselves easily superior to their late masters as easily as Robert Smalls is superior to his late superior in simple patriotism, bravery, and manhood to Robert Toombs.

THE ORIGINAL ANNIE LAURIE.

THE Longman reminds his correspondents to "Annie," who asks if the song that was so popular with the English soldiers in the Crimea is not an old song, and is the heroine who is said to have made it an old one, and that there is a song of the same name long popular in the south of Scotland. But the Crimean favorite is a new version written by a lady still living, whose name the Longmen does not recall. The old song is the following:

Maxwelton braes are bonnie,
Where early fa's the dew;
There use me and my Annie
Made up the promise true;
Made up the promise true;
And ne'er forgot will I;
And for bonnie Annie Laurie
I'll lay me down and die.

[She's the fairest of the faces
Which bloom on all the braes;
She's fling about the middle:
Her waist is like a wand;
Her waist is like a wand;
And the white o' her bosom
Exceeds the drifted snow.]

It is supposed that these lines were written by Mr. Douglas, of England, upon Anne, one of the fairer daughters of Sir Robert Laurie, who was created first baronet of Maxwellton, in 1685. The Lady Anne did not marry the poet, but became the wife of Mr. Fergusson, of Craigdarroch. Maxwellton is a mansion in the valley of the Cairn in Dumfries-shire; and the old song was printed for the first time in Edinburgh, in 1818, in a collection then called a "Ballad Book" by Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe. The new song with the music is in Wood's "Songs of Scotland."

GENERAL FOREY.

THE French General who is very invading Mexico is one of those whom Kinglake in his History of the Crimean War calls "the men of December." It was the men who surrounded Louis Napoleon that surrounded the building in which the representatives assembled who refused to disperse. It was Forey who arrested Count Robert Laurie, who was to prison. Upon Kinglake's pages he then disappears until he emerges at the battle of the Alma. The apparition is startling. "Who," asks Kinglake, perhaps, had hoped," says Kinglake, "that in the pressure of the enemy he might be able to scramble over the mark which his reputation contracted on the 2d of December; on the day, when, along with Magnan's memories of Lodi and Arcole, he found self to be publicly used as the assailant and the pallet of the unarmed Legislature of France; but Forey's chance of retrieving his character, prior to his account, it will not be by an appeal to the Alma that he will be able to avert his punishment."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

WHEN you see a dwarf you may take it for granted that his parents never made much of him.

On the day for renewing the license of the publicans in the West Riding of Yorkshire one of the magistrates said to the old veteran, "Sergeant Bradshaw, I think I may safely say that he did not put any pernicious ingredients into her liquor." He replied "I'm sure he was not, sir. Such pernicious put into our barrels but the excisemen's stick!"

Each, the York comedian, was asked how he came to be called "Each." He replied, "That one good turn deserved another."

A poet was walking with M. de Talleyrand in the street, and at the same time reciting some of his own verses. Talleyrand perceiving at a short distance a man yawning, pointed him out to his friend, saying, "Not so loud, he hears you."

FORTUNATE IMPOSSIBILITIES.—An Italian who was very poor, and very much addicted to play, used to express his wishes thus: "Fortune! Fortune! Fortune, then cause make me lose, but thou canst not make me pay!"

WOMAN SOWS, and man reaps the advantage of it.

A waggish speculator, one of a numerous family in the world, recently said, "Five years ago I was not worth a penny in the world; now you see what I am, through my own exertions!" "Well, where are you?" "Why, a thousand pounds in debt!"

"I like that epulet, it relieves the natural blackness of your face," said a coustic man to a dark lady. "Indeed!" quoth the lady, "you're a pig, then, you do not squint!"

A party of gentlemen were taking supper at a country inn, when one of them, observing the poultry rather large, after exercising his ingenuity to no effect in trying to cut up a fowl, called to the waiter, and asked,

"Have you any such thing as a powder-flask?"

"Yes, Sir," was the reply, "how many was you in?"

"Why, you fool, I think the shortest way would be to blow it up."

A minister having walked through a village churchyard, and observed the indiscriminate pains bestowed upon the dead, wrote the following epitaph for departing him: "Here lie the dead, and here the living lie."

Upon a traveler telling General Doyle, an Irishman, that he had been where the hay was a large and powerful that two of them would drain a man's blood to one of the purpose of hiring a horse, "My good Sir, we have the same animals in Ireland, but they are called humble bees."

A lady fell down in the street, when a man very civilly picked her up and said, gently,

"Madam, may I ask you some the worse."

"Well, indeed, I am just as little the better," she replied, and walked off.

HORSE OR HORSE VEGETATION.—No one does it so regularly, so efficiently, so perseveringly, so punctually as the horse-chestnut. The fellow seems to have quite a call for the business.

Here are two "little 'uns" which I heard "it at" to-day.

Who was the smallest man mentioned in the Bible?—Bow-legged Nimrod, of course.

Of whom was it recorded that he hid no father?—Melchisedec, to be sure.

A negro, undergoing an examination, when asked if his master was a Christian, replied, "No, Sir, he's a member of Congress."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

A REPORT dated, "Army of the Potomac, Wednesday, May 6," says:

The Army of the Potomac has recrossed the Rappahannock and reoccupied Banks's Ford, and is marching back to the old camps along the Aequia Bullrod.

Sedgwick was reinforced by Reynolds, and pressed hard on both front and rear, and was hardly able to make it by his escape near Banks's Ford. Fredericksburg and the heights beyond have been reoccupied by the enemy, and the situation is substantially as it was previous to the advance.

Sedgwick has lost in killed and wounded about 5000 men. His artillery and trains were safely brought over on Monday night.

After fighting the severe battle of Sunday morning General Hooker withdrew his troops from his lines, leaving up double lines of rifle-pits, and contracting shorter along the entire line. This was done in order to concentrate to make demonstrations along the works, driving in the pickets and skirmishers, and thus ascertain where we were exposed.

The artillery was placed on the heights below United States Ford, a position to command the crossing.

At daylight a splendid morning, Sedgwick on half an hour at Banks's Ford, which was an unsuccessful attempt to cross. Reynolds's corps, which had been left behind, crossed at United States Ford.

On Tuesday the Sixth Corps of Hooker's army, recentered, engaged the enemy's rebels on the heights over United States Ford, and are marching back to Fairview.

The retreat of Hooker's army was a great panic at Aequia, and every thing movable was placed on the north bank in the utmost confusion.

The order for retreat was a surprise, as it was believed by the determination of each one and attack the enemy in the front.

The crossing was commenced at ten o'clock on Tuesday night. At three o'clock on Wednesday morning wagons and mule trains, and artillery had all passed, and the infantry was crossing on two bridges at U. S. Ford. Couchs's corps was the last to cross. The rumor was spread by the Fifth, Meade's corps.

Lee's sharpshooters crossed at the artillery horses and fired on any mounted officer seen behind the rifle-pits. Troops could be seen marching in the direction taken during the route southeast from Chancellorsville. In all advantages gained in this movement on our side, the enemy fought against Hooker's corps. As soon as counter guns were brought to bear on the rifle-pits batteries, they would disappear to their themselves to the rear.

The effect of the artillery fire was terrible, and, undoubtedly defective, even produced a damaging effect on the entire army. The enemy's artillery fire was by order of the Army of the Potomac. Constitutions were had with every commander of corps. Not a man left the field until a treat was discussed. This one branched, and the campaign was a failure.

It was decided that the enemy was too powerful to be attacked, and the movement was made to draw off from the army, in order to make an offensive movement practicable.

Sedgwick being failed to join Hooker on the Fredericksburg and Richmond road, Sedgwick's force being had pressed he crossed the Rappahannock and saved his corps from annihilation. The entire movement cost him some 6000 men. He inflicted, doubtless, a much greater injury on the enemy.

Sedgwick's repulse, added to the weak counsels of retreat of his corps commanders, has greatly disheartened, and forgetting that he was the aggressor, and then lost a big half the number, and withheld the attack at the full force of the enemy, he in one fatal moment gave the order to evacuate the heights, abandon and his fortifications, and to retreat across the Rappahannock at United States Ford.

A defeat could have been little worse. The army is not panic-stricken, but it is in a dreadful state, especially the high inglorious retreat.

There was no rain from Friday morning till Monday night that Hooker could not have attacked and defeated Lee's army, but he had not the ability to issue the order.

On Monday morning at daylight the enemy shelled, from the heights below Scott's Dam, the trains of Hooker's army that were still on the north bank. The circumstance increased the fears of the commanding general, and the panic which was wholly without means of clother. The train were left behind, and many lost their knapsacks in battle.

THE CAMPAIGN ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

On the morning of 30th April, General Sherman, with a fleet of transports, accompanied by gun-boats, passed up the Yazoo and made an attack on the rebel batteries. In the afternoon several of the transports followed, with troops on board. It is reported that General Sherman landed speedily in the rear place in the rear of the batteries, and met stuck. Camenading and musketry were distinctly heard at Young's Point that day, till long after nightfall. A gentleman who left Near Carthage on 30th, states that a very heavy force of General Grant's army has been landed on the Mississippi side of the river eight miles above Grand Gulf, and that our gun-boats had been shelling the latter place for several days. A dispatch from the rebel General Pemberton to the War Department at Richmond, dated the 30th ult., at Jackson, Mississippi, also states that six gun-boats, averaging ten guns each, opened a terrific fire upon the rebel batteries at Grand Gulf, at seven o'clock that morning, continued without intermission for six hours and a half, when they withdrew. He says that several batteries were completely damaged and dismounted, which was then lying on the Louisiana shore below.

THE BLOCKADE OF THE SOUTH.

A reconnaissance in large force was made by the army of General Peck on the 3d instant, under General Keyes and Jordan and Colonels Howard and Butler, for the purpose of ascertaining the position of the enemy on the south side of the Nansemond River. The enemy's pickets were encountered three miles from Suffolk, and were driven back in a very serious and sharp encounter with the rebels, in which our troops did valiant service. The loss on each of the officers is described as insignificant. The enemy were driven into the woods in disorder, and the following morning there were none of them to be found within twelve miles of Suffolk, except the wounded left behind. It would appear that they had commenced a retreat for the purpose of joining Lee, but before the movement assance was made. They fled along the South Ley road, and were last discovered on Monday by General Corcoran and the Irish Legion. He captured and sent back several prisoners. Our losses were small compared with the importance of the undertaking.

ANOTHER ATTACK AT CHARLESTON.

It is said in the Tribune that we come her at Charleston on the 31 instant, and the Monitors on the 4th. This, if true, would indicate the commencement of a second attack on the forts in Charleston harbor.

FROM ALABAMA.

According to rebel accounts, General Dodge has advanced eleven miles east of Tuscumbia. He had met the rebel General Roddy at Town Creek, and expected to be going on on the 9th ult. General Dodge was in possession of Courtland, Decatur, on the 5th instant. Mississippi dispatches represent General Grant at Union Church on the Big Black and Jackson, covering the Natchez.

GENERAL BANKS ON THE RED RIVER.

General Banks has taken possession of Alexandria, Louisiana, and issued an address to the people setting on the Red River, thus cutting off the rebel supplies by that route. He has also captured Fort De Russy, at the purpose of capturing several rebel steamers and schooners on the same. These have been entirely successful since the occupation of the Attakapas country by our troops, the people are declaring sincerity in their oaths of allegiance to the United States Government and claim the protection of its flag.

REBEL RAID INTO WEST VIRGINIA.

The Union former under General Mulligan were repulsed by a body of rebel cavalry, under Jenkins, at Summit, in Western Virginia, on 1st May. They destroyed the Gauley Bridge on the Kanawha and Ohio Railroad at Cloud River and Fairmont, and five others. General Mulligan has since moved from Summit, and General Scammon is got all his artillery of in safety.

Morgantown was occupied by the rebels in large force, and considerable depredations committed in that locality. The 56 General Mulligan was joined by General Kenley with reinforcements, at Grafton.

A PIRATE CAPTURED.

The brig Louisiana, from St. Domingo, March 28, has arrived at New Bedford, and reports that she was chased from St. Thomas by the rebel pirate Alabama. The captain states positively that the United States steamer Alabama came into port and captured the pirate, and when last seen had her safe in port at St. Domingo.

ARREST OF VALLANDIGHAM.

The arrest of the Hon. Clement L. Vallandigham, at Dayton, Ohio, by a posse of soldiers sent from Cincinnati on 5th for that purpose, has caused a considerable excitement in both cities. A stubborn resistance was made at Mr. Vallandigham's house, and a fight took place ensued. The fire bells were then rung and an attempt was made by the friends of the rebel sympathizer to rescue him. He was carried off to Cincinnati. An immense mob has assembled in front of the jail, and is burning effigies of, or fire to the office of the Journal, a rabbist paper. The telegraph office was closed for fear of an attack by the press. The charges against Mr. Vallandigham are not stated.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

MR. ADAMS'S TICKET OF LEAVE.

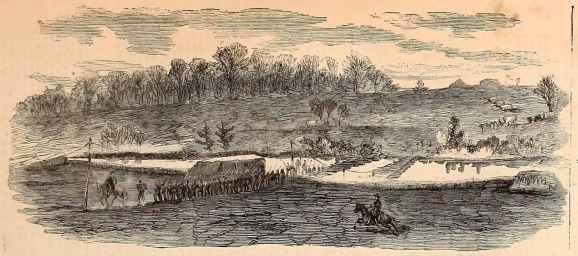
MR. ADAMS, United States Minister in London, has given a special invitation to the Queen to visit Chicago in the port of Matamoros. The license was in the shape of a letter addressed to Mr. Adams by Earl Russell, containing the characteristic of the cargo, so that she might pass the Union cruisers. The letter was duly granted on the following morning.

Howell and Zerman—an American and Mexican—contracted to build some gun-boats, intending to run the ordnance on the cargo. Mr. Adams's letter was made public, and the Government immediately issued the official state of facts in England against the United States. A depredation of the merchants and shipowners of Liverpool followed, and the Government made the matter its address to Earl Russell, who professed to be entirely ignorant of the fact. The London Times believes us sound.

THE ARMSTRONG GUN FOR ALEXANDRA.

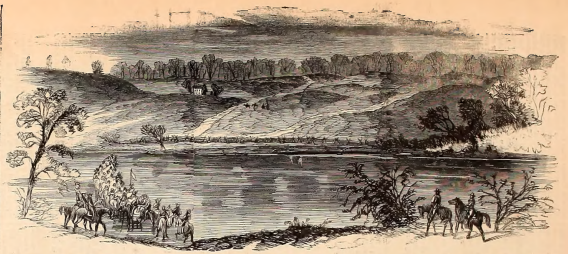
The Anglo-rebel gun-boat Alexandra has been "exonerated" by a jury court, and it is reported that the government contemplate legal proceedings against the builders.

POLAND.



THE REBELLION.

The notes forwarded by England, France, and Austria to the Court of St. Petersburg, on the subject of the Polish revolution, have been published. The first contains about a "cessation" in the Kingdom Cabinet. The Czar had not yet replied to the notes. It is said that the Russian Government was making considerable armaments. Irregular bands of Poles existed, and engineers were actively engaged in fortifying the port of Cattaroma, the chief Polish port of Galicia. Gortschakoff, who is to be rendered capable of refitting not only the Swedish men-of-war but also the Russian vessels of three Powers whose names it might be to station a naval force in those waters." Prussia allowed to the Russian troops to pursue the Russian amnesty was published at Warsaw, and found less compensation than it had been represented, as the leaders of the insurrection are excluded from its benefits. It had not induced a single insurgent to lay down his arms. Engagements continued between the Russians and the Poles with varying fortunes.



MEXICO.

THE SIEGE OF PUEBLA.

The latest news from the City of Mexico shows, with all their tremendous exertions, the French army of invaders are not yet in possession of the city of Puebla. Up to the 10th of April the struggle for the possession of that city was going on warmly on both sides, and while the French, with their superior artillery and small-arms, were slowly advancing, the undisciplined Mexicans were heroically dispuling with their invaders the possession of every inch of their independent territory. The French accounts tardily acknowledge that "the Mexicans were fighting with valor and resolution." The two strongest fortresses of Puebla were still holding out at last accounts, though General Forey writes to the Emperor, with all confidence, that he expects to reduce the place and occupy the city.

CAULIFLOWER.

I.

["WHAT did you bring home company for, Rhett? You know the cook had gone.] How do you do, Mr. Romley, glad to see you. Why didn't your sister come with you? should have been delighted to have had her here. There's your left, Rhett. I've been to lunch, and if you'll excuse me Sophie will pour tea. Here Sophie, Sophie, you can finish that embroidery this afternoon; go with Rhett and Mr. Romley now, I must keep my encagement with Mrs. Chetwood. Good-morning, Mr. Romley: I hope you'll make yourself perfectly at home."

And Mrs. Rhett Wyatt bowed herself off, and young Romley and Wyatt, her son, went downstairs after her to make some demand or inquiry concerning his friend Romley's entertainment. He came back with a shocker scowl, and muttering too audibly,

"Selfish."

Jem Romley, the new guest, observing all this, thought: "A fine lady for a mother, hey? By George! I'd rather have our old hum of a house now, with Aunt Sarah in it, than this uncestral ark of splendor ornamented with that lay figure. Sophie, eh; who's Sophie, her waiting-maid?"

They went out to lunch: a great display of plate, and glass, and lovely old china; with three scraggy bits of beef on one dish, a few slices of cold mutton thirdly, upon another, and a plate of dry, shrunk olives.

Behind the tea-service appeared the little dark head of a girl scarcely more than a child.

"My sister Sophie, Romley," said Rhett, initiating her with a nod, as if it were not apparent otherwise.

"My sister Sophie" returned the inclination of young Romley with a grave bow, and commenced pouring tea as they sat down.

The scowl still lingered on the host's brow; it grew bewvier as he tasted the beef.

"Sud!" he ejaculated.

"Sud," said the solemn waiter—"isn't there any thing better in the house than this?"

Before the stolid Sam could gather his wits the little lady at the tea-tray coolly remarked,

"I'll see to it, Rhett."

Whereupon she slipped down from her perch and skipped from the room, while her brother rubbed his hands and complacently exclaimed,

"Glad it's it!"

Romley looked his surprise, and Rhett, catching the look, laughed, then explained.

"Sophie is prime in the culinary way. Three years ago, when she was only ten, she'd get up a regret fit for Soyer himself. Every thing's always at sixes and sevens here," he kept on, "except in the servant's prossence. "The cook's always gone, and the rest of those upside down. I warned you, you know. Wonder what Sophie will produce now out of that old chaotic kitchen. It'll be something worth while, you'll see."

Tan, fifteen, twenty minutes, and Rhett fingered his watch impatiently, casting anxious glances at his guest. Jem Romley, though a Southerner and a school-boy, magnanimously repressed all outward indication, and talked volubly of Rhett's great interest—Miss Marie, Zoraide, who had won in a ten-mile race against his own Furore. He had wound Rhett up to besting fervor, when in came Sophie, her cheeks on fire, her eyes in a blaze, and sparkling like two very black diamonds. She bore in her hands a deep dish, which she carried with great care, and from which arose a delicate, appetizing steam. Following her came a servant with a platter of mutton-chops and a plate of freshly cut bread.

With an air of intense satisfaction Sophie deposited her dish before her brother and presented her seat at the tea-tray opposite. Rhett drew it nearer and inhaled the odor. A smile passed over his face.

"Oysters," he said.

Another smile, the first Romley had seen upon her face, shed over as she negatived this guess.

"Not oysters, not oyster pâté."

She stood by, head, and a gay little gleam shot out from her dark eyes.

Next he tasted, with slow, meditative air, and still waxing puzzled expression. Then he appealed to Romley. Romley was as much in the dark as himself; but both agreed in pronouncing it the most delectable compound they had ever tasted. Over it they made a hundred guesses, always wrong, plunging deeper than ever into their puzzle.

Behind the tea-tray beamed and sparkled the little dark head of Sophie, gay and triumphant.

They rose from the table as ignorant as they sat down, but laughing and jovial through her means. At last the three met again in the presence of a fourth—Mr. Rhett Wyatt, Sen., whom Jem Romley saw now for the first time: a man whom nature intended for a brilliant, splendid gentleman, but whom some sharp disappointments, some ill-advisings probably, had marred into a selfish, morose man.

He welcomed Romley cordially enough, but indifferently; and flung himself into his arm-chair in an angry glance at the empty one opposite. "Mamma is at the Chetwoods," explained Sophie.

An audible "Humph!" was Mr. Wyatt's only response; then removing the cover from the soup he inhaled its odor, and ejaculated "burnt!" he ejaculated from him, commanding Sam to remove it.

"The cook has left," again explained Sophie.

Mr. Wyatt's eyes flashed angrily, and he growled out something suspiciously like an oath.

Rhett took this exhibition coolly, as if he were used to it; but Sophie grew red as she darted a swift glance from her father to the guest.

The dinner proceeded in this uncomfortable silent manner until Mr. Wyatt helped himself to one of the entrements. His dark brow cleared, and the storm lifted, showing the ray of a smile.

"Sam, who got this up?"

"Miss Sophie, Sir," stammered Sam.

"You, Sophie?"

"Sophie has a natural genius for concocting messes," volunteered Rhett. "She's saved my temper from popping over, when it was at boiling point, many a time."

"Why didn't you ever save mine before?" asked Mr. Wyatt, with grim humor.

Sophie laughed, but did not reply; and then he asked:

"What is it?"

There was a fraction of a minute in hesitation, and then, in a demure voice, Sophie murmured:

"Cauliflower."

"Cauliflower!" exclaimed the three gentlemen in concert.

"Cauliflower." Sophie's eyes were cast down, but they were counting forth from beneath dusky lashes dancing sparkles of enjoyment as she quietly proceeded. "There were no oysters in the house, and no vegetables but cauliflowers, so I thought I would make these do."

"Do—well how did you do them, Sophie?"

The little dark head bridled, and a dash of disdain curved the mouth.

"It was my own fancy. I tried the experiment last summer one day, when mamma and all the rest were away at the White Mountains. I came home from school, and couldn't find any body, or any thing in the house but cauliflower."

She laughed. Her father and brother looked at each other with half smiles, tinged with pain. They forgot their own discomforts, as they contemplated this forlorn little picture of Sophie, alone, and tired, and hungry, and left to care for herself, and forced to cook her own dinner out of such scant materials, while mamma was away pleasuring, and the servants gadding and neglectful, par excmple of their mistress.

Rhett broke the pause.

"Tell us the other ingredients, Sophie."

"Oh nothing but a mixture of mustard, pepper, a little of cayenne, some salt, a tea-spoonful, a dash of sago, and a little oil, all pressed together and cooked in twenty minutes, over a slow fire," she replied, glibly, in the wise phraseology of a cookbook.

"Sophie, you're a trump!" ejaculated Rhett, with his mouth full.

"She's a genius," commented Romley, bowing gravely at the small person.

"She deserves public acknowledgment—a fête, or a feast," broke in Mr. Wyatt, laughing genially. "Sophie, I must pledge you not only in sherry over a bottle of Burgundy. Sam, the third row, and the third bottle."

Sophie's eyes sparkled brighter than the Burgundy as she touched her lips to this sacred wine of her father's choicest keeping. He could pay her no greater compliment. Rhett, too, applied the gay, good-natured phrase; but it remained for Romley to carry off the palm of the joke as he dipped his yellow mustache into his brimming glass, and murmured,

"Cauliflower!"

From a jest this name became a habit, and clung to the little dark girl from thenceforward long after she had dismissed the cauliflowers. Her children are called Pet, Daisy, Bun, or any other household appellation, so Sophie after this, at first in jest, at last in consecrated earnest, answered unthinkingly to the name of "Cauliflower."

Apparently the least considered of any one in the house, Jem Romley discovered that she had wonderful influences to harmonize the distracting elements of her family.

Small, childish, silent, she somehow, in a soft, uncbildish way smoothed out the roughnesses, palliated the discomforts, and restored the moral and domestic tone in a remarkable manner. She was like a ray of sunshine through stormy, drifting clouds. And yet no one praised her, and no one cared for mature women, that prompted Jem Romley to touch his lips to that tiny brown hand as he took her "good-by."

"I shall see you again next Christmas," he said. And he was mistaken. He never repeated his visit to Epping. Eight years was many years before he saw Sophie Wyatt again.

II.

A FROWN was threading a dark and narrow street in Florence, when there fell upon it the shadow of a violent collision. He looked up as he started back with a hasty exclamation; but the "pardone, Signor," in liquid Italian speech, touched him like a mellow atmosphere.

He passed on, came out by St. Peters, and went in amidst the kneeling crowds, thinking.

"How sweet these Italians' tones!" and, "what a gracious mien they have!" and there, leaning back in a balcony corner, was the speaker, whose onward impetus had just now jarred body and temper aside, to be so miraculously restored by a musical language.

It was an elderly, not an old man, and his eyes seemed darkly under a slouched hat, in hollow, haggard sockets.

A Protestant and a stranger, but how at home in that silver tongue! "Cursed be Babylon," he muttered.

"A long resident perhaps. His face seems familiar. Like those like the Florentine I met at Padua last spring. Can he be English, or American?"

Then his attention was distracted by a lovely Roman girl, and he forgot his speculations until that evening, as he sat at his window at the Hôtel de Londres, the same tall figure came sauntering by. "I have certainly seen that face before," muttered the young traveler, pulling hard at his yellow mustache, as if to help his memory.

In the morning, as he was taking his walk to the Piazza Hills, again the same meeting. This time the elder man seemed conscious and disturbed. He drew his hat closer down over his eyes, and hurried past.

The other, from a mere passing interest, now began to feel a haunting curiosity. He hunted his memories for some connection that he was convinced had only escaped him.

At last he got a clew. Sitting one morning in an artist friend's studio, he saw from the window his mysterious face acquaintance sauntering slowly along under the arches of the opposite wall. His exclamation brought the artist to his side.

"Why, he's a fellow-countryman of yours. De Launay knows him; says his name is Vick."

"Where is De Launay?"

"Gone out of town, I believe."

So the thread of the clew snapped. He has given it up as vain, when one day he was taking a stroll through the streets of Rome, by chance he could hear from home, or could meet a home face, and hear his English tongue spoken with a home accent, when, as if to answer his thought, a voice said,

"Come out and walk, child; you stay in the house too much."

It was the English tongue, and it had a home accent. Where was it? It seemed at his very ear.

There was a shaded portico just beyond; above it rose the lofter arches of the old Roman architecture.

Two steps, and a picture was revealed. A dark and handsome man reclined in the portico. He held between two fingers a long slender pipe, with amber mouth-piece; but his face was turned away toward the door that led inward. It did not need the slouched hat to identify him to our young traveler.

An overwhelming curiosity held him motionless to the spot: as he stood a girl came out from within, and, leaning over the back of his chair, kissed him, and said,

"It is going to rain, papa; I think I had better wait for my walk until the shower passes."

Her eye fell on the figure at the step to her father. She rested her hand upon his shoulder, and smiled.

"Sophie, you are getting thin. You want change. We will go to Florence and see Rhett."

The young lady's head crossed in a haughty bounds, and astonished the tranquil occupants of the portico with outstretched hands and cordial exclamations as he leaped before them.

"Mr. Wyatt, is it possible! and Miss Sophie! And Rhett in Florence. How delightful! I thought of you, Sophie, often and often; I couldn't quite make it out."

"And so you dogged my footsteps to find me at last, you young scamp," replied Mr. Wyatt, with the good-humor of a person who is obliged to make the best of a thing not altogether agreeable; but Jem Romley was too heartily glad over this meeting to criticise very deeply at present—glad to hear all about Rhett, who was pulsing at Florence, and to talk about Rome with those who had lived there so long.

"Six years, it is possible? Why it don't seem six months now since I was down at Epping. Do you remember the Cauliflower, Miss Sophie?"

Mr. Wyatt looked for a moment, and he puffed savagely at his pipe; but it cleared again as Sophie's laugh pealed, and she answered, brightly,

"Oh yes, I remember, Mr. Romley, and you christened me with the name which I wear yet. Rhett scarcely calls me any thing else to this day."

"Is it so? Well, it delights me to find that I have had the least link of association with you and Rhett all this time. You know I was coming down at Christmas; but I went to South America with my father instead. I was there for three years. Last year I came to Rome. I have written repeatedly to Rhett in the interval, but never a word from him."

"We broke up before that Christmas, Mr. Romley. Split flatly and finally after our wife's death, shook the dust of its country from our feet to come to Rome, cheap, dirty, artistic old Rome, where one barrow of gold would have made us kings, to console our republican feelings with dreams of its past ducal races. This very room held a king once, I have been told, Mr. Romley. You must take that for your entertainment, young Sir. have no Burgundy left."

There was a pleasure in this tone, in the words, though an attempt at saturnine jocularity. Romley understood all from it. The broken fortunes, the lost home, the proud spirit biding its time—the last condition in this dismantled old villa, in cheap, dirty, artistic Rome."

His ready sympathetic heart ached at the picture; but as he looked at his host's face he felt that there was no room for pity. It was proud, and dark and hollow-eyed, but he missed the selfish, dissipated air he remembered at Epping.

Spite of every thing, Mr. Wyatt looked a happier man, and a better, though he sneered and growled at fate and fortune alternately, and turning his back upon old old acquaintances with insistent pride.

The stronger Sophie had predicted fell heavily as they talked, and thus delayed the young man was persuaded to remain to lunch.

As he looked down upon the waiting her place at the tea-tray he thought of the little dark girl who had surprised him in that place six years ago. She caught his look, and smiled, and asked,

"Well, has she changed much?"

Not much. As I look I remember a little shy girl whose head and shoulders just appeared above the table. I see the same head almost, but higher up."

"Oh yes, I am quite tall. I was thirteen then. I am nineteen now."

There was a quaint simplicity, lady-like but free, about her whenever she spoke that carried a childlike atmosphere with her. Romley could have half believed that he had been taking but an afternoon nap at Epping as he listened.

Besides the tea there was a dish of wine, and as Mr. Wyatt touched his lips to his glass he made a tacful face, and ridiculed the notion that in Italy one could live on "rare old wine and purple figs."

"Yes, it is rare," he muttered, "as gold. My Burgundy at home was better than any I have tasted since."

"But I have something for Mr. Romley that he will like better than Burgundy perhaps, for association." And Sophie's eyes danced.

As she spoke he scented a faintly-remembered odor from the delicate steam arising from a dish beside his plate.

"Cauliflower!" Her laugh tinkled airily in with his own at this word, and brought back still more vividly six years ago.

And, like Sophie's six years ago, they sat around the table pledging each other over the wonderful compound of cauliflower; the dark, grim face of Mr. Wyatt losing its gloomy cast, and shining with genial cheer, all at the touch of an enchantress —Cauliflower.

Once found, Jem Romley did not easily lose the Wyatts; and after the first burst of annoyance Mr. Wyatt himself seemed to forget their shabby though lofty old rooms, and the one servitor in place of the retinue at Epping, and to grow brilliant and jovial as it lives in great Jem Romley's presence.

Then all at once Rhett came, and the party was perfect.

They used to sit under the frowning arches, or in the garden under the shade of the lieu-trees, and discuss art, or talk of home, and a thousand things in which they had mutual interest. Always a little apart, bending over some feminine occupation, Sophie, naturally silent and still, would now and again join in their talk, or offer a modest word in their discussion.

Jem Romley had got into the habit of watching her. He had thought her almost unchanged. He had said that it seemed hardly six months, three at most between them. Gradually he began to think otherwise. Of great simplicity of manner, frank, even free in her quaint, childlike way, he began to feel a vivid difference between them as men. With all her frankness, her gay simplicity, in her freest moments, he felt conscious of a fine cool distance, as if were, which seemed to be unconscious to himself, but set her in some interior way afar off from him, especially as a woman. In this discovery he came to be aware that Sophie Wyatt had thoughts and feelings to which she never admitted them.

Watching her closely as an unexpected fact by no means an unnatural thing befell honest, unsuspicious Jem Romley. He got in love. A great, strong, manly love, subject only to a child's wisdom and experience of life, he had a modest, perverse nature, which overlaid all the world's knowledge, and made him more than a boy of his own merits. To him then Sophie Wyatt, in her soft serenity, was not something so far above him that he dared not approach her with the farthest suggestion of love. To him it was like

"Stars in the bosom of the sea for the star"

and he might have gone on hiding his heart until this day had it not been for—Cauliflower.

It was a dreamy, rainy day in Rome,

"Inside the melancholy little house"

the four friends contrived to pass the hours agreeably. Rhett painted bits of rainy sky, strips of campagna,

——"with its endless fence
Of feathery grass-y waves."

Romley overlooked, making suggestions which were never acted upon. Mr. Wyatt sat by the window and smoked continuously, while he read Galignani; and Sophie flitted in and out, "on household thoughts intent."

Rhett's sketches became too deeply absorbed for companionship. Mr. Wyatt leaned back in the pleasure of the weather and his book, and Romley softly but restlessly paced the floor, his "occupation gone," for Sophie was absent from the room. It was then, during the lulling, that Romley began to be an impossible castle, that he heard her voice humming old New England hymns as she moved about. It was a low, sweet voice, with a clear note of content breathing through it; and listening, he piled up the stones of his castle, half sighing as he did so.

He was in the midst of a bright scene, a vision of delight, when suddenly the door opened. There was a break in the tune; a little, low, hopeless cry of pain had ended it.

Observing all these points he ran out, darted across the hall and into the next apartment.

There she stood, quite pale, intent upon a wound in her hand, from which the blood was flowing profusely. She looked up as he approached, smiled nervously, and said,

"It is a mere scratch, I suppose; but I am always very foolish about the sight of blood."

It was a long, but wounded, but deeper in the tender heart of Jem Romley as he looked at it —as he, spite of remonstrance, stripped up his own shirt-sleeve and bandaged the little thread bare, crumpled and stained with blood, impulsively into his breast.

Perhaps the little hand trembled as he bound it; perhaps the courage, so strong and enduring to most life, so false in this small crisis, suggested some power of some gentle agency in the presence which led him on to do what he did—to keep the hand in his, to kiss it reverently, to say so much in those few earnest, simple words—words that Sophie had been shyly yearning to hear, all the time, perhaps, that he had been yearning to say them.

And still holding her hand, still regarding that "little wound" with a mixture of pity and gratitude, he asked,

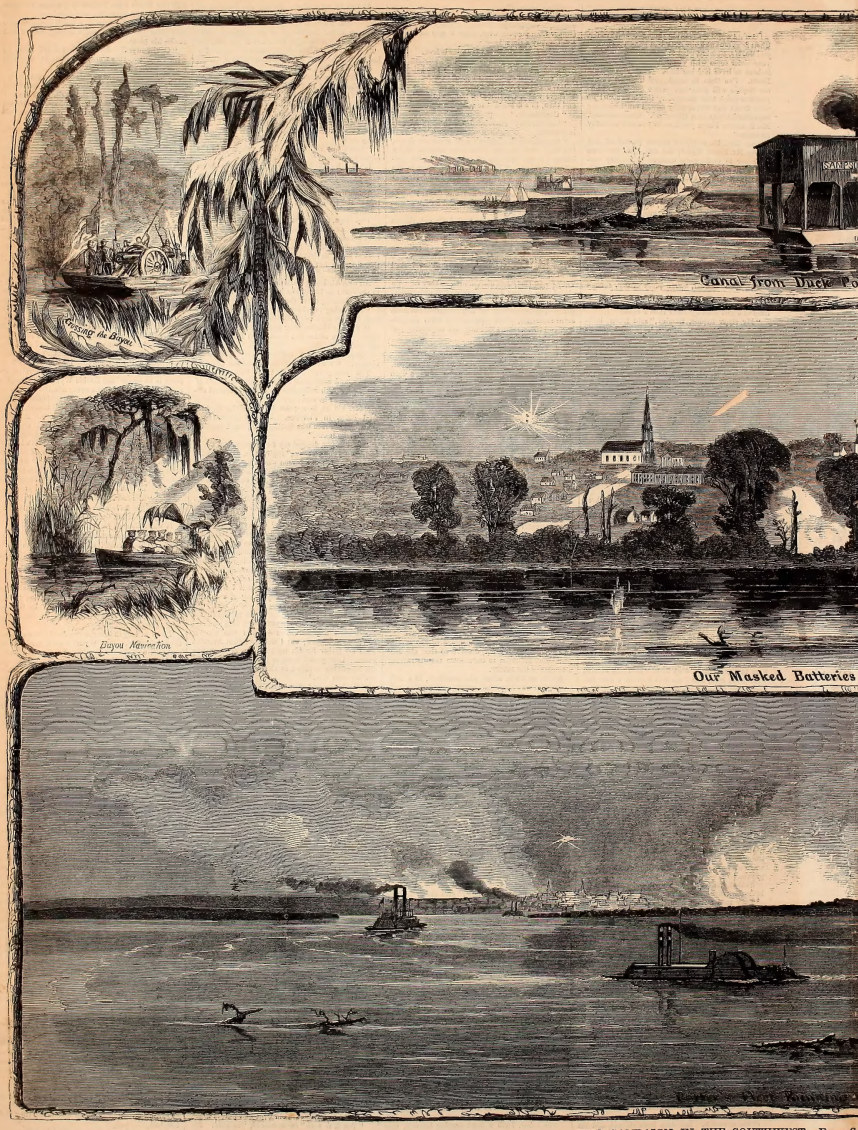
"How did it happen, dear?"

The gleam of a tender mirthfulness sprang into her face.

"How? I had forgotten until now. See!"

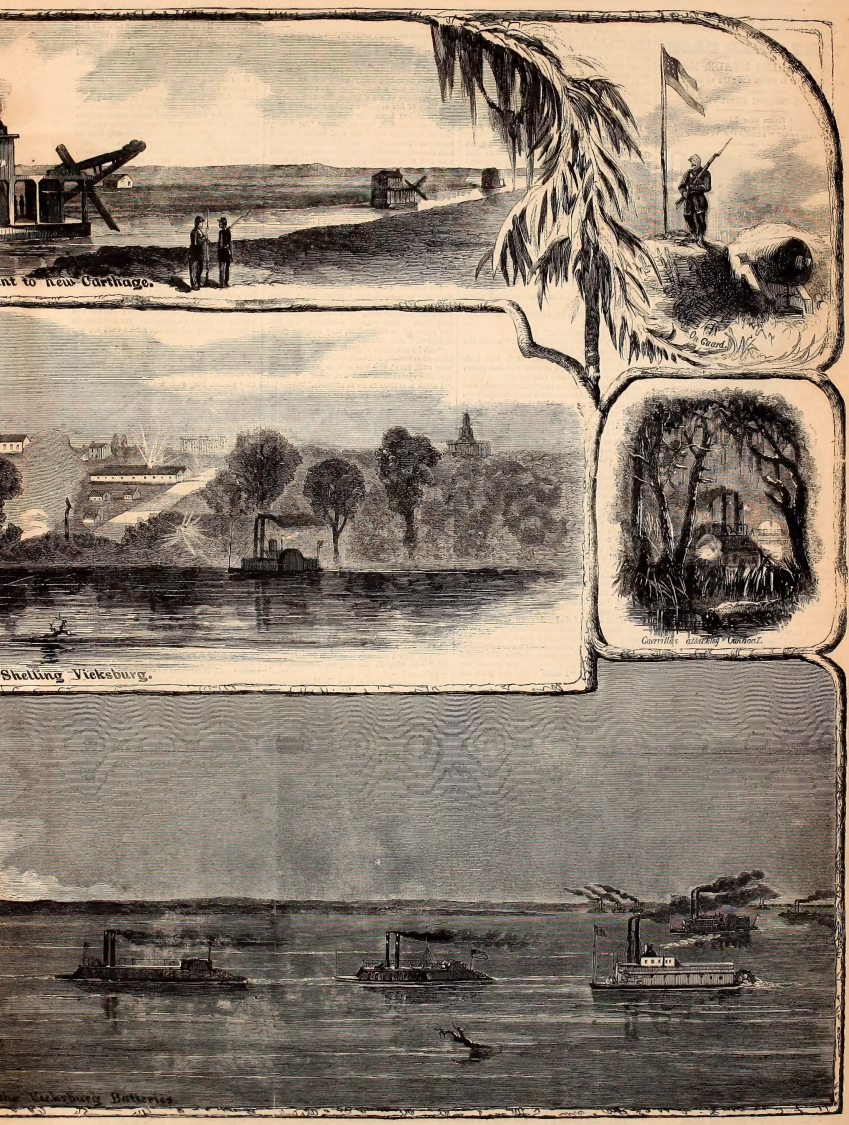
She pointed to a table. There lay a cauliflower. Piercing its green crimpness was a knife, whose sharp point of blade showed through the side.

"And you cut your hand so?"



"Yes."

"Dear Cauliflower!" and he bent and kissed the hand again.



Lifting his head his eyes met hers; they both laughed.

"Sophie, when we are married I shall have a cauliflower to grace the wedding feast."

And he did.

CHAPTER VII.

He did follow her, and, convinced that she would be engaged ten deep in five minutes, hustled up to the master of the ceremonies and begged an introduction. The great banker's son was attended to at once.

Julia saw them coming, as her sex can see, without looking. Her eyes were on fire and a delicious blush on her cheeks when the M.C. introduced Mr. Alfred Hardie with due pomp. He asked her to dance.

"I am engaged for this dance."

"The next?" said Hardie, timidly.

"With pleasure."

But when they had got so far, they were both seized with bashful silence; and, just as Alfred was going to try and break it, Cornet Bosanquet, aged 18, height 5 feet 4 inches, strutted up to them with clanking heel, and, glancing haughtily up at him, carried Julia off, like a steam-tug towing away some fair schooner.

To these little storms society treats all anxious lovers, but the incident was new to Alfred, and discomposed him; and, besides, he had nosed a rival in Bosanquet's prescription. So now he thought to himself, "that little ensign is 'his puppy.'"

To get rid of Mrs. Dodd he offered to conduct her to a seat. She thanked him; she would rather stand where she could see her daughter dance: on this he took her to the embrasure of a window opposite where Julia and her partner stood, and they seated a circle of spectators.

The band struck up, and the solemn skating began.

"Who is this lovely creature in white?" asked a middle-aged solicitor. "In white? I do not see any beauty in white," replied his daughter.

"Why, there, before your eyes," said the gentleman, loudly.

"What, that girl dancing with the little captain? I don't see much beauty in her. And what a rubbishing dress."

"I never cost a penny, making and all," suggested another Barkingtonian nymph.

"But what splendid pearls," said a third; "can they be real?"

"Real! what an idea!" ejaculated a fourth; "who puts on real pearls as big as peas with muslin at twenty pence the yard?"

"Weasels!" muttered Alfred, and quivered all over; and he felt to Mrs. Dodd so like a savage going to spring, that she laid her hand upon his wrist and said, gently, but with authority, "Be calm, Sir! and oblige me by not noticing these people."

Then they threw dirt on her bouquet, and then on her shoes, while she was winding in and out before their eyes a Grace, and her soft muslin drifting and flowing like an appropriate cloud round a young goddess.

"A little starch would make it set out better. It's no use as a towel on the line."

"I'll be sworn it was washed at home."

"Where it was made."

"I call it a rag, not a gown."

"Do let us move," whispered Alfred.

"I am very comfort'ble here," whispered Mrs. Dodd. "How can these things annoy my ears while I have eyes? Look at her! She is by far the best dressed lady in the room; her muslin is Indian, and of a quality unknown to these provincial shop-keepers; a rajah gave it us: her pearls have been in every court in Europe; and she herself is beautiful. would be beautiful dressed like the dowdies who are criticising her; and, I think, Sir, she dances as well as any lady can, encumbered with an Atom that does not know the figure."

At this, as if to extinguish all doubt, Julia flung them a heavenly smile; she had been furtively watching them all the time, and she saw they were talking about her.

Cornet Ormond now came up to Hardie. "Do you know the beauty? She smiled your way."

"Ah!" said Hardie, deliberately, "you mean that young lady with the court pearls, in that exquisite Indian muslin, which so gracefully, while the other muslin girls are all crimp and stiff, like little pigs clad in crackling."

"Ha! ha! ha! Yes, large dose mi!"

"I could not take such a liberty with the queen of the ball."

Mrs. Dodd smiled, but felt nervous and ill at ease. She thought to herself, "Now here is a generous, impetuous pair." As for the Barkington party, staggered at first by the masculine insolence of young Hardie, it soon recovered, and, true to its sex, attacked him obliquely, through his white lady.

"Who is the beauty of the ball?" asked one, haughtily.

"I don't know; but not that mawkish thing in limp muslin."

"I should say Miss Hetherington is the belle," suggested a third.

"Oh, beyond question."

"Which is Miss Hetherington?" asked the Oxonian coolly of Alfred.

"Oh, she won't do for us. It is that little chalk-faced girl, dressed in pink with red roses; the pink of vulgarity and bad taste."

Alfred's Oxonian laughed arrogantly, and Mrs. Dodd withdrew her hand from the speaker's arm and glided away behind the throng. Julia looked at him with marked anxiety. He returned her look, and was sore puzzled what it meant, till he found Mrs. Dodd had withdrawn a softly from him; then he stood confused, regretting, too late, he had not obeyed her positive request, and tried to imitate her dignified forbearance.

The quadrille ended. He instantly stepped forward and, bowing politely to her mother, but authoritatively, "Mrs. Dodd sends me to conduct you to her. With your permission, Sir." His arm was offered and taken before the little warrior knew where he was.

He had her on his arm, so light, and fragrant as spring flowers, and breath waving his neck; oh, the thrill of that moment! but her first word was to ask him with considerable anxiety, "Why is mamma not here?"

"Miss Dodd, I am the most unhappy of men."

"No doubt: no doubt!" said she a little crossly. She added with one of her gushes of naivete, "and I shall be unhappy too if you disobey mamma."

"What could I do? A gang of snobbesses ce detracting from—somebody. To speak, Miss Dodd, I was dancing with the loveliest of her sex. Your mamma told me to keep quiet. And so I did. not a fair chance, and then I gave it them. I did. He pressed his own back, and added, "I think I was very good not to kick them."

Julia colored with pleasure, and proceeded to turn it off; "Oh! most forbearing and considerate," said she, laughing. "Fancy! I think I did hear some ladies express a misgiving as to the pecuniary value of my costume; ha! ha! Oh dear, dear, dear, how shocking, how amusing that! Why it is in little nooks that the approval of the ladies shows itself at a ball, and it is a much sincerer one than the gentlemen's bombastical noises; 'the fairest of her sex,' and so on; that none but 'the silliest of her sex' believes."

"I did not say the fairest of her sex; I said the loveliest of her sex."

"Oh, that alters the case entirely," said Julia, whose spirits were mounting with the lights and music, and Alfred's company, "we have come and to reconciled to the best and wisest of her sex; ay, and the beautifullest, if you but knew her name, during their stay in Dover; there she is; let us fly. Mamma, here is a penitent for you, real or feigned."

"Mrs. Dodd," said Alfred. "I had no right to disobey you and risk a scene. You served me right by abandoning me; I feel the rebuke and its justice. Let me hope your vengeance will go no further."

Mrs. Dodd smiled at the granddlogonence of youth, and told him he had mistaken her character. "I saw I had acquired a generous, hotheaded ally, who must not be doing battle with insects; so I withdrew; but so I should at Waterloo, or any where else, where people put themselves in a passion."

The band struck up again.

"Ah!" said Julia, "and I promised you this dance; but it is a waltz; and my guardian angel objects to the value a faux tempo."

"Decidedly. Should all the mothers in England permit their daughters to romp, and wrestle, in public, and call it waltzing, I must stand firm till they return to their senses."

Julia looked at Alfred despondently; he took his cue and said with a smile, "Well, perhaps it is a terrible brutal; a donkey's galop and then twirl her like a mop."

"Since you admit that, perhaps you can waltz comme il faut?" said Mrs. Dodd.

Alfred said he ought; he had given his whole soul to it in Germany last Long.

"Then I can have the pleasure of dropping the tyrant. Away with you both while there is room to circulate."

Alfred took his partner delicately; they made just two cat-like steps forward, and melted into the waltz.

It was an exquisite moment. To most young people Love comes after a great deal of waltzing. But this pair brought the awakened tenderness, and trembling sensibilities, of two burning hearts, to this their first intoxicating whirl. To them, therefore, every thing was an event, every thing was a thrill—the first meeting and timid pressure of their hands, the first delicate enfolding of her supple waist by his strong arm but trembling hand, the delightful unison of their unerring feet, the movement, the music, the soft delicious whirl, her cool breath saluting his neck, his ardent but now liquid eyes seeking hers tenderly, and drinking them deep, hers that now and then sipped his so covertly—all these were new and separate joys, that linked themselves in one soft delirium of bliss. It was not a waltz; it was an Ecstasy.

Starting almost alone, this peerless pair danced a gauntlet. On each side admiration and detraction buzzed all the time.

"Beautiful! They are turning in the air."

"Quite gone by. That's how the old fogies dance."

Chorus of shallow males. "How well she waltzes."

Chorus of shallow females. "How well he waltzes."

But they noted neither praise nor detraction: they saw nothing, heard nothing, felt nothing, but themselves and the other music, till two viewers (a dead temp) took "a tremendous header" into them. Thus smartly reminded they had on earth all to themselves, they laughed good-humoredly, and paused.

"Ah! I am happy!" gushed from Julia. She blushed at herself, and said, severely, "You dance very well, Sir:" this was said to justify her unguarded ejaculation, and did, after a fashion. "I think it is time to go to mamma."

"So soon. And I had so much to say to you."

"Oh, very well. I am all attention."

The sudden facility offered set Alfred stammering a little. "I wanted to apologize to you for something—you are so good you seem to have forgotten it—but I dare not hope that—I mean Mr Henley—when the beauty of your character, and your goodness, so overpowered me, that a fatal impulse—"

"What do you mean, Sir?" said Julia, looking him full in the face, like an offended lion, while, with true feminine and Julian inconsistency her bosom fluttered like a dove. "I never exchanged one word with you in my life before to-day; and I never shall again, if you pretend the contrary."

Alfred stood stupefied, and looked at her in piteous amazement.

"I value your acquaintance highly, Mr. Hardie, now I have made it, as acquaintances are made; but please to observe, I never saw you before scarcely; not even in church."

"As you please," said he, recovering his wits in part. "What you say I'll swear to."

"Then I say, never remind a lady of what you should wish her to forget."

"I was a fool. And you are an angel of tact and goodness."

"Oh, now I am sure it is time to join mamma," said she, in the dryest, driest, way. "Valsons."

They waltzed down to Mrs. Dodd, exchanging hearts at every turn; and they took a good many in the space of a round table, for in truth both were equally loth to part.

At two o'clock, Mrs. Dodd resumed command place views of a daughter's health, and rose to go.

Her fly had played her false, and, being our island home, it rained buckets. Alfred ran, before they could stop him, and caught a fly. He was dripping. Mrs. Dodd expressed her regrets; he told her it did not matter; for him the ball was now over, the flowers faded, and the lights darkness visible.

"The extravagance of these children!" said Mrs. Dodd to Julia with a smile, as soon as he was out of hearing. Julia made no reply.

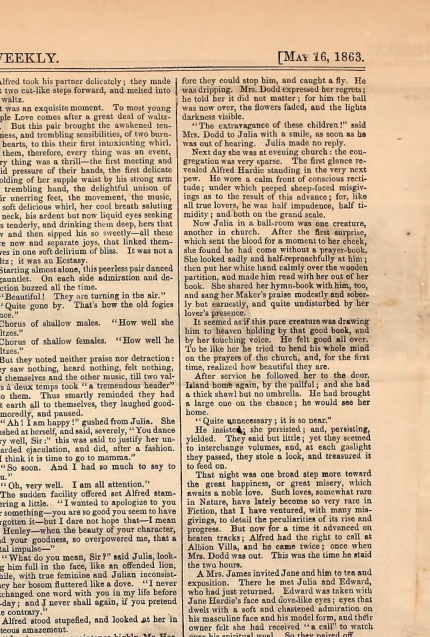
Next day she was at evening church: the congregation was very sparse. The first glance revealed Alfred Hardie standing in the very next pew. He wore a calm front of conscious rectitude; under which peeped sheep-faced misgivings as to the result of this advance; for, like all true lovers, he was half impudence, half timidity; and both on the grand scale.

Now Julia in a ball-room was one creature, another in church. After the first surprise, which sent the blood for a moment to her cheek, she found he had come without a prayer-book. She looked sadly and half-reproachfully at him; then put her white hand calmly over the wooden partition, and made him read with her out of her book. She shared her hymn-book with him, too, and sang her Maker's praise modestly and soberly but earnestly and quite undisturbed by her lover's presence.

It seemed as if this pure creature was drawing him to heaven holding by that good book, and by her touching voice. He felt good all over. To be like her he tried to bend his whole mind on the prayers of the church, and, for the first time, realized how beautiful they are.

After service he followed her to the door. Island home again, by the pailful; and she had a thick shawl but no umbrella. He had brought a large one on the chance; he would see her home.

"Quite unnecessary; it is so near."



He insisted, she persisted, and, persisting, yielded. They said but little; yet they seemed to interchange volumes, and, at each gaslight they passed, they took a look, and treasured it to feed on.

That night was one broad step more toward the great happiness, or great misery, which awaits a noble love. Such loves, somewhat rare in Nature, have lately become very rare in Fiction, that I have ventured, with many misgivings, to detail the peculiarities of its rise and progress. But now for a time it descended on heaten tracks; Alfred had the right to call at Albion Villa, and he came twice; once when Mrs. Dodd was out. This was the time he said the two hours.

A Mrs. James invited Jane and him to tea and exposition. There he met Julia and Edward, who had just returned. Edward was taken with Jane Hardie's face and dove-like eyes; eyes that dwelt with a soft and chastened admiration on his masculine face and his model form, and their owner felt she had received "a call" to watch over his spiritual weal. So they paired off.

Julia's fluctuating spirits settled now into a calm, demure complacency. Her elder, finding this strange remedial victim a youthful society, gave young partics, in which Jane and Alfred in their turn, danced; but, as she could no longer keep Julia from knowing her worldly brother, and hoped a way might be opened for her to rescue Edward, she relaxed her general rule, which was, to go into no company unless some religious service formed part of the entertainment. Yet her conscience was ill at ease; and, to set them an example, she took care, when she asked the Dodds in return, to have a clergyman there of her own party, who could pray and expound with unction.

Mrs. Dodd, not to throw cold water on what seemed to gratify her children, accepted Miss Hardie's invitation; but she never intended to go, and at the last moment wrote to say she was slightly indisposed. The nature of the indisposition she revealed to Julia alone. "That young lady keeps me on thorns. I never feel secure

"SHE TURNED AWAY AND MADE AN EFFORT TO LEAVE HIM."

she will not say or do something extravagant or unusual; she seems to suspect sobriety and good taste of being in league with impiety. Here I succeed in bridling her a little; but encounter a female enthusiast in her own house! Mercy! After all, there must be something good in her, since she is your friend, and you are hers; let her pass: I have something more serious to say to you before you go there. It is about her brother. He is a fixt: in fact, a notorious one, more than one lady tells me."

Julia was silent, but began to be very uneasy; they were sitting and talking after supper, yet without eating: she profited, for once, by that amazing gap in the intelligence of "the sex."

"I hear he pays you compliments; and I have seen a disposition to single you out. Now, my love, you have the good sense to know that, whatever a young man of that age says to you, he says to many other ladies; but your experience is not equal to your sense; so profit by mine, a girl of your age must never be talked of with a person of the other sex: it is fatal; fatal! but if you permit yourself to be singled out, you will be talked of horribly, and others as those who love you. It is easy to avoid injudicious duets in society; oblige me by doing so to-night."

To show how much she was in earnest, Mrs. Dodd hinted that, were her admonitions needful, she should regret, for once, having kept clear of an enthusiast.

Julia had no alternative; she assented in a faint voice. After a pause she faltered out, "And suppose he should esteem me seriously?"

Mrs. Dodd replied quickly, "Why, then he will be much worse. But," said she, "I have no apprehensions on that score; you are a child, and he is a precocious boy, and much of a fop. But forewarned is forearmed. So now run away and dress, sweet one: my lecture is quite ended."

The sensitive girl went up to her room with a heavy heart. All the fun of the evening was irate revived. She saw plainly now that Mrs. Dodd only accepted Alfred as a pleasant acquaintance: as a suitable one for a wife was the question. "Oh, what will she say when she knows all?" thought Julia.

Next night, near the window, she saw him coming up the road. After the first movement of pleasure at the bare sight of him, she was sorry he had come. Manners, however, awoke at last, and here he was again; the third call in one fortnight! She dared not risk an interview with him, ardent and impassioned, under that penetrating eye, which she felt would now be on her always.

She rose hurriedly, said as carelessly as she could, "I am going to the school," and, tying her bonnet on in a flurry, was presently out at the back door with her shawl in her hand just as Sarah opened the front door to Alfred. Julia then shuffled on her shawl, and, without stirship, the little shrubbery into the open field, and reached a path that led to the school, and so gratified was she at the dexterity in evading Alfred's visit that she hung her head, and went murmuring, "Cruel, cruel, cruel!"

Alfred entered the drawing-room gayly, with a good-sized card and a prepared speech. This was not the visit of a friend but a subscriber to the treasurer of the cricket-ground, come to book two of his eighteen to play against the All England Eleven next month. "As a fop" (such worthy Sir (turning to Edward), I shall just put you down without ceremony. But I must ask leave to talk privately with Mrs. Dodd. I come at the universal desire of the club; they say it is sure to be a dull match without Captain Dodd. Besides, he is a capital player."

"Mamma, don't you be caught by his chaff," said Edward, coolly. "I pay to play as well as all. Any thing more unlike cricket than his way of making runs—"

"Is not to play them, old fellow; now you and I, at Lord's the other day, played in first-rate form, left shoulder well up, and achieved—with modest submission, dexterity, and dispatch —the British duck's-egg."

"Misericorde! What is that?" inquired Mrs. Dodd.

"Why, a round O," said the other Oxonian, coming to his friend's aid.

"And what is that, pray?"

Alfred told her "the round O," which had yielded to "the duck's-egg," and was now quite obsolete, meant the cipher set by the scorer against a player's name, who is out without making a run.

"I see," sighed Mrs. Dodd: "It penetrates to your very sports and games. And why British?"

"Oh, 'British' is redundant: thrown in by the universities."

"But what does it mean?"

"It means nothing. That is the beauty of it. Redundancy is delivered in musical one idol, the Greeks; they adored redundancy."

In short, poor Alfred, though not an M. I was talking to get off time. His Julia should come in: so he soon favored Mrs. Dodd, of all people, with a flowery description of her husband's play, which I, who have not his memory for voluble, suppress. However, he wound up with the subject: "moral influence." "Young match," said he, "Barkington did not do itself justice. Several, that could have made a stand, were frightened out, rather than bowled, by the London professionals. Then Captain Dodd went in, and treated those artists with the same good-humored contempt he would a parish bowler, and, in particular, sent Mynne's ·ver-tossed balls flying over his head for six, or to square leg for four, and, on his retiring with twenty-five, scored in eight minutes, the remaining Barkingtonians were less funky, and made some fair scores."

Mrs. Dodd smiled a little ironically at this tirade, but said she thought she might venture to promise Mr. Dodd's co-operation, should he reach home in time. Then, to get rid of Alfred before Julia's return, the amiable worldling turned to Edward, "Your sister will not be back; so you may as well ring the bell for luncheon at once. Perhaps Mr. Hardie will join us."

Alfred declined, and took his leave with far less alacrity than he had entered with; Edward went down stairs with him.

Miss Dodd gone on a visit?" asked Alfred, affecting carelessness.

"Only to the school. By-the-by, I will go and fetch her."

"No, don't do that; call on my sister instead, and then you will pull me out of a scrape. I promised to bring her here: but her sainthip was so long adoring "the poor perishable body," that I came alone."

"I don't understand you," said Edward. "I am not the attraction here. It is Julia."

"How do you know that? When a young lady interests herself in an undergraduate's soul, it is a pretty sure sign that she likes his body also. But perhaps you don't want to be converted; if so, keep clear of her. 'Her life is a dragon's blighting way;' but shun that lovely snare."

"On the contrary," said Edward, calmly, "I only wish she could make me as good as she is, or half as good."

"Give her the chance, old fellow, and then it won't be for want of trials if you are not one of the Call at two, and Jenny will receive you very kindly, and will show you sure in the 'gait of the apostles and the look of antiquity.' Now, won't that be nice?"

"I will go," said Edward, gravely.

"That's right. Where Alfred went the reader can perhaps guess; Edward to luncheon.

"Mamma," said he, in that tranquility which sat so well on him, "don't you think Alfred Hardie is spoony upon our Julia?"

Mrs. Dodd answered, with a smile, perhaps to gain time before replying sincerely) said she had not the honor of knowing what "spoony" meant.

"Why, signs, I am told, are the first and fondest she is prettier than Miss Hardie. He must be over head and ears."

"Is Julia?" inquired her mother. "If I thought so, I should withdraw from their acquaintance. Excuse me; I must put on my bonnet at once, and call on Mrs. Hardie myself."

Edward did not relish her remark: it menaced more Spoons than one. However, he said not the man to be cast down at a word: he lighted a cigar, and strolled toward Hardie's house. Mr. Hardie, of course, had the same day paid a visit to London; Miss Hardie received him; he passed the afternoon in calm complacency, thinking reverently of Julia's perfections, and looking her softly out of countenance, and into earthly affections, with his lion eyes.

Edward saw his remark, as he had really seemingly foolish to Mrs. Dodd, was the true reason for her leaving him so abruptly. "Even this dear child," said he, sighing deeply, "is not to be trusted to Julia more seriously, and would go to the wood at once, to climb on that tree at once, and put on her bonnet and shawl before the glass, then moulded on her gloves; and came down equipped. On the stairs a large white cloak, and a hood in the open field; she naturally cast her eyes through it, in the direction she was going, and what did she see but a young gentleman approaching her slowly down the path toward the villa. Mrs. Dodd bit her lip with vexation, and looked keenly at Julia, to divine on what terms they were. And the more she looked the more uneasy she grew.

The head, the hand, the whole person of a young woman walking beside one she loves, before her has been seen, produces eyes wiped of their unseen: and most female eyes are experienced at this sort of inspection. Why did Julia move so slowly? especially after that glance? Perhaps her head averted from that encroaching boy, and herself so near him? The anxious mother could mark that Julia was not a step her distance, and look him full in the face. Her first impulse was that of leopardess, lioness, tigress, and all the cats, wild and tame, to dart from her ambush and protect her young; but she controlled it by a great effort of moral valor to descry the truth, and then act with resolution: besides the young people were now almost on the shrubbery; so the mischief, if any, was done.

They entered the shrubbery.

To Mrs. Dodd's surprise and dismay they did not come out this side so quickly. She darted her eye into the plantation; and lo! Alfred had used the fatal opportunity following on a surprise, then thinnish; he held Julia's hand, and was pleading eagerly for something she seemed disposed to grant; for she turned away and made an effort to leave him. But Mrs. Dodd, standing there concealed, saw Alfred retain her, and hot with shame, could not but doubt the sincerity of that graceful resistance. If she had been by to some extent, Julia dare enough in her to box the little wretch's ears. She ceased even to doubt, when she saw that her daughter's opposition had no heart in it, and that Julia was instead of one, and devouring them with kisses, while Julia still drew her head and neck quite away, but in their cold little frame seemed to yield and incline, and draw softly toward her besieger, by some irresistible spell.

"I can bear no more!" gasped Mrs. Dodd aloud, and turned to hasten and part them; but even as she curved her stately neck to go, she caught the lovers' parting; and a very pretty one too, if she could have looked at it as these things ought always to be looked at, Artistically.

Julia's head and lovely throat, unable to draw the rest of her away, compromised; they turned, declined, drooped, and rested one half moment on her captor's shoulder, like a settling dove: the next, she scudded from him, and made for the house alone.

Mrs. Dodd, deeply indignant, but too wise to court a painful interview with her own heart bearing high, went into the drawing-room: and there sat down, to recover some little composure. But she was hardly seated when Julia's innocent voice was heard calling "Mamma, mamma!" and soon she came bounding into the drawing-room, flushed, all grace thrown, her cheeks as red as fire, and her eyes wet with happy tears; and there confronted her mother, who had started at her footing, and now, with one hand hopping the back of the chair convulsively, stood lofty, looking strangely agitated and hostile.

The two ladies eyed one another, silent, yet expressive, and Julia, after facing a statue; but soon the color died out of Julia's face as well, and she began to cower with vague fears before that stately figure, so still and placid usually, but now so discomposed and stern.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

We devote pages 305, 308, and 309, to illustrations of the movement of the Army of the Potomac which commenced last week, from sketches by Mr. Waud. The following are pictures explain themselves, and it might suffice to say that the various heavy corps crossed the Rappahannock at various points on 28th, 29th, and 30th April. In some places the crossing was effected at fords, in others on pontoons and the bridges left in them. A picture on page 305 shows the construction of a pontoon bridge at a point where the river was too deep to ford. Another illustrations on page 309 will depict the bridges used by General Sedgwick's corps and General Reynolds's corps for their crossing. General Sedgwick's brigade was the first to cross, went over in boats. This operation, which was performed in the mist of a cloudy morning before daylight, is illustrated on page 308, and is thus described in the Herald correspondence:

Toward daybreak twenty-three boats were afloat and ready for the start. Lieutenant Colonel Russell had the honor to pass the first river. General Russell's brigade consisted of the Fifteenth New York, Colonel Ely; the Thirty-second New York, Colonel Pinto; the Forty-ninth Pennsylvania, Colonel Cross; the Fifty-ninth Pennsylvania Pennsylvania Volunteers, Colonel Tyler; and the Sixty-first Pennsylvania Volunteers, Colonel Candy. Russell's men had been ordered to enter the boats at fifties. The regiments thought that Russell's brigade, Sedgwick's, and General Brooks therefore made the fifty forty-five.

Lieutenant Colonel Russell, the Regulars under command of his men. Every boat left the shore as one with the Sixth, so as to keep the line of battle intact in its movement on the still water, just in the early dawn and in the midst of the fog which covered one of war. Every one the oars fall until the great square tube got into a race with the Sixth, and then the Sixth had to pull hard to keep scarcely a hundred yards in width we could not see the other side. The Sixth reached the shore first, and soon returned and began to fill again.

The men as they landed pushed the opposite shore Russell's men clustered up the bank and to gun to form. But before the Sixth left the enemy delivered at short distance, and from a rifle-pit directly in front, one volley. Not a man was hurt, not a shot returned. One hundred and Nineteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers on the right, next to their left, and the Ninety-fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers, Forty-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers, Thirty-second New York, and Fifteenth New York. Out of the rifle-pits the enemy went in a hurry. One prisoner, Lieut. Col. Smith, Commander of the first line of rifle-pits and out of the ground, and our men had the field before them—so says Captain Dorr, from Dorr Run on our right to Bernard's house on our left.

The Sixth Corps is reported to ring in Fredericksburg with all the clamor of which they were capable.

Another picture introduces us to the Eighth Pennsylvania Cavalry, encamping at Kelly's plantation. Of their performance the New York Times correspondent says:

At about 10 o'clock General Sykes's division was sent forward on the left, by the Banks' Ford Road, to make an attack in force, but encountered no eyes worthy of the name that task. He moved promptly into position, with Weedy's, near Watson's, Battery in front. The first gun was fired by the enemy about 12 o'clock. Heavy skirmishing commenced, and continued during the field with much enthusiasm. The Eighth Pennsylvania Cavalry skirmished in the very front for some time, and sustained a galling fire from the enemy's infantry, but behaved with great intrepidity. Their loss was small, considering the nature of it, only to be in turn driven back. General Sykes then ordered forward a regiment of infantry, without a battery, across, on the double-quick, who supported the cavalry, and drove the enemy from the rifle-pits. The action now became quite general between the two forces, each seeming to be trying their utmost strength.

On page 310 we give a fine map of the theatre of the conflict.

THE RATTLE OF IRISH BEND.

We illustrate on page 316 THE BATTLE OF IRISH BEND, fought on 13th April by General Grover's division, under General Banks's army, in the recent campaign in the interior of Louisiana. Our picture is from a sketch by Lieut. H. Hall, of the Twenty-second Maine Regiment. The following account of the battle is from the Herald correspondence:

About seven o'clock A.M. the advance reached the edge of a dense line of woods, near what is known as Irish Bend, in a sharp turn of the Teche, about eleven miles distant from the rebel earth-works, where General Banks had established his base.

Here Taylor had a strong one of our forces, which had been driven from the bank of the Teche, across the front and left flank of Grover's division in that direction.

The enemy was strongly posted at this point, their line of battle extending in front, and their left resting on the round knit another wood, in such a manner as to command a perfect view of the whole ground which our army must occupy in their position in the wood first spoken of.

General Grover's division, the advance of General Grover's division, at this time in command of the advance, and supported by two sections of Rogers's battery, now skirmished with the rebels in front for about an hour, our skirmishers and their supports engaging the infantry and dismounted cavalry of the enemy. Colonel Birge then ordered the Twenty-fifth Connecticut and One Hundred and Fifty-ninth New York in front of the first skirt of wooded. This had no sooner been done than the enemy commenced a flank attack, endeavoring to take the section of Rogers's battery which was on the left flank.

These two regiments, assailed by a fire on their front and flanks from an enemy very perfectly concealed, replied ineffectually to the fire, became shaken, and finally commenced to fall back, when General Grover rode up to the front and rallied them, at the same time ordering General Dwight to hasten up with his brigade.

The section of Rogers's battery was compelled to limber up and go to the rear, the fire of the enemy being so lively as to pick off nine cannoneers at their guns.

At this time General Dwight moved on to the field with his brigade, and placed the Sixth New York on his right, in such a manner as to outflank the enemy's left, in a similar way that the enemy outflanked our right.

The Sixth New York was ordered to charge, and to advance against the woods, with the First Louisiana supporting, and the Sixth New York, and the Twenty-second Maine and One Hundred and Thirty-first New York in support of the Sixth New York.

The charge was made as was given, and like veterans they moved forward some sixty yards, when, from the woods, and from the rifle-pits, the enemy sleety but surely falling back before them; seeing which, on, taking him with his position, and finally compelling him to so hasty a retreat that he left over one hundred prisoners in our hands.

Lieutenant Colonel Dwight was unable to speak to take with a loss of something over three hundred men, was wounded in the engagement, with a loss of only seven killed and twenty-one wounded.

General Dwight was never ordered to attack, take a favorable position, and hold it.

This was done, the enemy continuing to manœuvre in front of General Dwight's and Colonel Birge's commands for two or three hours.

The Diana did but very little harm during the whole of the action.

Our troops, in the mean time, had been ordered by General Grover to rest in their present until further orders, which they did until about three P.M., when an order was given to feel the enemy on the front and left, with a view to our attacking their position in force.

Before any considerable advance was made the enemy evacuated, retreating to the woods and canes, having destroyed the bridge on the great road Pierre aux Bœufs, Petite Gouvernor, Newsiden, and Fira No 2.

The retreat was accomplished in such a manner as to prevent effectual pursuit.

The rebel prisoners represent that they had upward of five thousand men engaged in this affair, and that they were of Taylor's command. Speculation of General Grover's division across the Bayou Teche before General Banks's army could reach the point. Our loss was slight, only a loss of from three to four hundred.

Many of the rebels on the wounded and five prisoners were taken, and thirty wounded.

Among the killed is General Riley, and among the wounded Colonel Gray.

The latest official report that General Dick Taylor advanced in force on the flank, and was in command of the rebels in the action, "Lafayette" but he was not present in the fight, and never is.

About one hundred and fifty prisoners in all were captured by General Grover's command.

The reconnoissance in force to the extent of the movement, which met a carrier from the advance of General Banks's army, states that the new position is in the line that the enemy had evacuated his works at Brandand.

A MODEL CAMP ON THE RAPPAHANNOCK.

We publish on page 317 an illustration of the CAMP OF THE TWENTY-FIFTH MASSACHUSETTS REGIMENT ON THE RAPPAHANNOCK, from a sketch by Mr. Davis. This camp was a model one in regard to beauty, order, cleanliness, and discipline, and deserves to be commemorated. The Twenty-fifth Massachusetts Regiment was the first to break camp and cross the river on the new march to Richmond.

VICKSBURG.

We reproduce on pages 312 and 313 several illustrations of the OPERATIONS IN THE VICINITY OF VICKSBURG, from sketches by Mr. Theodore R. Davis. One of the illustrations represents

THE NEW CANAL NEAR VICKSBURG.

Mr. Davis writes:

"HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE TENNESSEE, MILLIKEN'S BEND, April 11.

"Another canal is nearing completion; and from every quarter one hears the utmost confidence expressed that the most satisfactory results will attend the work. The length of canal required is less than 1500 yards, which completed, we shall, by clearing trees and obstructions from bayous, have a navigable communication from Lake Providence, by low this point to New Carthage, a place some 20 miles below Vicksburg, where our gun-boats are now at anchor.

Another picture shows us

OUR MASKED BATTERIES SHELLING VICKSBURG.

Mr. Davis writes:

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF GENERAL SHERMAN, CAMP NEAR VICKSBURG.

"General Sherman seems to have a determined propensity to carry on the present war in a manner likely to be most offensive to the rebels. The last instance of his beneficence is manifested shelling of the 'Virgin City of Vicksburg,' by a well-protected battery of thirteen guns, under the direct superintendence of Captain Edwin D. Phillips. The inhabitants of the 'Virgin City' do not, it is said, like the new order of things at General Sherman's, for they have vacated their homes; in which, en passant, we may soon find it convenient to take up our abode.

The large picture represents

RUNNING THE BATTERIES.

Mr. Davis writes:

"HEAD-QUARTERS, PORT, LOUISIANA,
Friday Morning., April 11.

"The Benton led by about a mile, and was followed by the Lafayette, which just preceded the 'Turtles' in line; the Forest Queen, Henry Clay, and Silver Wave in the order I have named them, the Tuscumbia, as rear-guard, following.

"In my sketch of Vicksburg you will see, near the water's edge, next to the Lake Yazoo Courthouse, a group of wooden buildings. These were evidently prepared with combustible materials, for almost after the first boat was discovered nearing the whole surface of the river was illuminated by the glare of their burning. A shanty on the point opposite was fired at the same moment, lending a bright light.

"The Henry Clay had nearly completed her dangerous journey when she was struck by a shell, set on fire, and burned. Our boats sent shot after the rebels. The night was without a cloud, the stars bright. The fleet has gone down to New Carthage."

THE SOLDIER'S BURIAL.

COMRADES, find for him a grave
Where the hoofs of war-steed clatter;
Where but childish feet may patter;
Any where; it will not matter:
Only find a grave.

Comrades, lay him softly down.
Was he not our land's defender?
Though so womanly, so slender,
With a soul so true and tender?
Softly lay him down.

Comrades, roughly jar him not;
Never salt that brown tress, lying
As it lay when he was dying,
With the bullets round him flying:
Roughly jar him not.

Comrades, move him tenderly,
As the touch of fondest mother—
As a sister would a brother—
As one woman would another:
Move him tenderly.

Comrades, lower him gently down:
Ah! for him how soon Death's flat!
But his face is far more quiet
Than our own, where life-scars riot:
Lower him gently down.

Comrades, drop a tear for him;
Though our camp-fires blaze as brightly,
And the low song rise as lightly,
We shall miss your mess-mate nightly:
Drop a tear for him.

Comrades, now our work is done:
Soldiers have no time to sorrow;
Rather let us courage borrow
For the toil of the morrow:
Now our work is done.

CURIOSITIES OF SLEEP.

An orphan girl, employed in tending cattle, slept in an apartment separated by a very thin partition from another, which was occupied by an old and infirm blind man. A benevolent lady took her under her care, and she became her servant. Some years afterward, when she was still in this family, beautiful music was heard in the night-time, which was at length traced to the bedroom of this girl. She was found in a deep sleep, but singing in a tone exactly resembling the sweetest sounds of a small violin.

Another remarkable case is recorded on the authority of a highly intelligent clergyman. A girl, his servant, greatly addicted to talking in her sleep; and it was found that in this way she passed through all the transactions of the past day, and that she repeated every thing which she had said in its proper order. Her tone and manner were changed to suit the circumstances of the different occasions on which she had spoken. She often rose in her sleep, and followed her usual occupations, and at length she passed into a state of continued unconsciousness to external things. She was aroused more than once from this condition, but was subsequently removed home. She recovered in several weeks, and her peculiarities gradually disappeared.

Van Doven, as quoted by Treviranus, mentions a student who talked in his sleep, and began every night exactly at the point where he had left off on the preceding night. A continuous and connected dream was the topic of his nocturnal ramblings. This affection continued about three weeks. Combe refers to a case related by Major Ellet, Professor of Mathematics in the Military Academy of the United States at West Point. A young lady of cultivated mind had an attack of somnolency, and when she came out of it all her acquired knowledge had vanished. She could not read her parliamentary studies, and was regaining her lost acquirements, when a second attack of somnolency occurred. She now at once recovered her lost knowledge, but remembered nothing of what had passed in the interval between the two attacks. A third attack again reduced her to the status of ignorance in which she had been after the first, and in this manner she passed through these alternate states for four years, retaining in one state all her original knowledge, and in the other only that which she had acquired since the first attack. These in one condition she wrote beautifully, in the other her penmanship was poor.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

CHLOASMA, OR MOTH PATCHES.

Blemishes on the face, called Moth, are very annoying, particularly to ladies of light complexion, as the discolored spots on the skin show more strongly on blondes than on brunettes, but they contribute greatly in marring the beauty on either; and any thing that will remove moth patches without injuring the skin in the texture or color, would no doubt be considered a great achievement in medical science. Dr. B. C. PERRY, having devoted his whole time and attention to Diseases of the Skin, will guarantee to remove Moth Patches, Freckles, and other Blemishes, from the face without injury to either texture or color of the skin. His success in this, as in other branches of his specialty—DISEASES OF THE SCALP AND LOSS OF HAIR—will warrant him in guaranteeing a CURE in EVERY case. For full particulars, address, enclosing stamp for a circular,

Mason & Hamlin,

Manufacturers of Cabinet Organs, Harmoniums, and Melodeons, take pleasure in referring to the musical profession generally as to the superiority of their instruments, which they claim to be unsurpassed by any in this world. They have had the honor of receiving the only GOLD MEDAL ever awarded to such instruments in this country, and though constantly exhibiting their instruments, have not, even in a single instance, failed to carry off the first prize. M. & H. respectfully invite attention to their new Cabinet Organs, which are receiving golden opinions from the highest sources. Among the distinguished organists who pronounce these the best instruments of their class in the world are Morgan, of Grace Church; Zundel, of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's Church; Wels, of Christ Church; Messgrath, of Dr. Poe's Church; Mosenthal, of Calvary Church; Berg, of Trinity Church; Wilson Mason, and many others. Prices of Organs, with one and two stops, $70 to $150; with six to twelve stops, $200 to $600 each. Warerooms, Nos. 5 and 7 Mercer Street, New York. Address MASON BROTHERS.

Just Tribute to Merit.

AT INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION, LONDON,
July 11th, 1862,

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "Corn Starch" pronounced by the Jurors "Good" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commission. The exhibition of all previous manufacturers of "Corn Starch" and "Prepared Corn Flour" of this and other countries received nothing. The food and luxury of the age, without a single fault. One trial will convince the most skeptical. Maizena Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without lemon-peel, with few or no eggs, and without baking full as economical. A slight addition to ordinary Wheat flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also unrivalled for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meat, soups, &c. For Ice Cream and delicate Confectionery, it is. A little boiled in milk will produce rich Cream for coffee, chocolate, tea, &c. Sold by all grocers in packages, under the trade mark "Maizena," with directions. A most delicious article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Manufactured at Glen Cove, Long Island.
Whole office, 416 Fulton Street.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

You may recover your health by the use of other remedies. You may recover health without any; but do not forget that they cannot fail, and that Brandreth's Pills could have saved you. For, remember that the

PRINCIPAL CAUSE OF DEATH,

when you have it in excess in your system, is evident to your animal instincts. Your countenance tells your friends; your dreams and your own heart tell you.

Now, at these times there is no medicine so deserving of your confidence as

BRANDRETH'S VEGETABLE UNIVERSAL PILLS,

which is the only medicine I know that can servicably save when all the usual indications tell that you must die.

HOSTETTER'S

CELEBRATED

STOMACH BITTERS.

67 Fever and Ague Extinguished.—Marvelous as this statement may seem, it is true. The remarkability for your sufferings rests upon yourselves. Just as surely as you make up your minds to be cured—to-morrow, HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS will extinguish your disease under the chills. But if you taken this genial tonic as a preventive, you would have no need of it as a cure. Both are infallible, but different in the effect of the BITTERS! Their curative action is rapid, they are speedy to the system; they are not only harmless, but tend inevitably to strengthen the constitution, and prolong life: they never have failed, and it is confidently assumed that they never can fail in any case of fever and ague, however inveterate it may otherwise be. Be without HOSTETTER'S BITTERS in any region infested with the malaria of miasmatic fever, is simply to reject safety and court disease.

IMPORTERS OF WATCHES

NEW YORK.

Are receiving a large importation of the celebrated

RAILWAY TIMEKEEPERS.

Especially adapted for Army Sale; a really good Watch, being an accurate and reliable time-keeper, at a price that brings it within the reach of all! This novelty, has attained a popularity unsurpassed by domestic or foreign manufactures. See notices of the press in previous issue of this paper. Prices: Gold Hunting or Open, with lunar bands, per case of six, $45. Solid Stelling Silver, per case of six, $25—all nicely engraved, and in good running order. Should retail at prices from $70 to $100 each. By mail, postage $3 00 per case.

THE MAGIC TIME OBSERVER.

The Perfect Time Measuring, and as a Gentleman's Watch in one, and a Hunting and Open-Face Combined, Watch of Modern Scientific Improvement. The N. Y. Illustrated News, the leading pictorial paper of the United States, in the issue of Jan. 10th, 1863, on page 147, voluntarily says, that "We have been shown a most pleasing novelty, of which the Hubbard Bros., of New York, are the sole importers. It is called the Magic Time Observer, and is a Hunting and Open Face Watch combined. One of the prettiest, most convenient, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general and reliable use ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery, its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being fine 16 carat gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece." Price, superbly engraved, per case of half dozen, $264. Sample Watches, in neat morocco cases, for those proposing to buy at wholesale, $38. If sent by mail the postage is 36 cents. Retails at $100 and upwards.

Remittances may be made in United States money or fresh purchased gold coin of this city, if sent by express, or in a registered letter, at our risk. No Checkers on Auburn! Order Goods to be sent by mail, as that is the quickest and safest method of transportation, and the only manner in which Watches can be sent to subscribers in the distant states! We guarantee a safe delivery. AYER'S

Cherry Pectoral

For the Rapid Cure of

COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS,

BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING-COUGH, CROUP,

ASTHMA, AND CONSUMPTION.

This remedy has won for itself such notoriety from its cures of every variety of pulmonary disease, that it is entirely unnecessary to recount the evidences of its virtues in any community where it has been employed. So wide is the field of its usefulness, and so numerous the cases of its cures, that almost every person has cognizance of some in persons publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases by the use of its virtues. When once tried, its superiority over every other medicine of the kind is too apparent to escape observation, and where its virtues are known, the public no longer hesitate what antidote to employ for the most dangerous and dangerous affections of the pulmonary organs, and the community at large have learned that it not only furnishes attacks upon the system, but that it counteracts them, and leaves the sufferer's health unbroken. Housekeeper, &c.; and for Children, it is the safest and most reliable remedy that can be employed.

As it has long been in constant use throughout this section, we deem it useless to more than assure the people its quality is kept up to the best that it ever has been, and that the genuine Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is sold by all Druggists and Dealers in medicine everywhere.

American Watches

For Soldiers

AT REDUCED PRICES.

American Watches for Americans!

THE AMERICAN WATCH COMPANY give notice that they have lately issued a new style of Watch, expressly designed for Soldiers and others who desire a good watch at a moderate price. These watches are intended to displace the worthless, cheap watches of British and Swiss manufacture with which the country is flooded, and which were never expected to keep time when they were made, being refuse manufactures sent to this country because unsalable at home, and used here only for pickpocking and swindling purposes.

We offer to sell our Watch, which is of THE MOST SUBSTANTIAL MANUFACTURE, AN ACCURATE AND DURABLE TIME-KEEPER, and in Sterling Silver Cases, Hunting pattern, at as low a price as is asked for the heavy-nosed Aneres and Lepines of foreign make, already referred to.

We have named the new series of Watches, WM. ELLERY, Jr., Mass., which name will be found on the plate of every watch of this manufacture, and is one of our trade-marks.

Sold by all respectable watch dealers in the loyal States. Wholesale orders should be addressed to

MAJOR-GENERAL GEORGE STONEMAN, U.S.A.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

TO GENERAL HOOKER.

THE BATTLE OF THE RAPPAHANNOCK.

"Clear the way!" Columbia saith,
"For a moment hold your breath,
Freedom must be won by death!"

So they marched—the patriot train—
While the wounded and the slain
Lay in heaps like gathered grain.

Hooker formest in the fray,
Holding the stern foe at bay—
Oh! it was a fearful day!

There brave Berry sank to rest—
On the front of Freedom press'd,
Risking all at her behest:

Clarifying the precious thought,
As their hearts now say they fought—
"Thus must Liberty be bought!"

I protest, on bended knee,
By their record that we see,
They have bought a victory.

By God's love of truth and right—
By their deeds done in His sight—
We were victors in that fight!

Ay—though tens of thousands slain
Lie in heaps on hill and plain—
Justice never fights in vain!

GENERAL STONEMAN.

WE publish on the preceding page an equestrian portrait of GENERAL GEORGE STONEMAN, who commanded the cavalry on the recent raid round Lee's army.

George Stoneman was born in this State about the year 1826. He entered West Point in 1842, and, on graduating, was commissioned Second Lieutenant in the 1st Dragoons. He does not appear to have taken part in the Mexican war, but during the fifteen years of peace which ensued he acquired a high standing in his profession, and was deemed by his comrades an excellent cavalry officer. At the outbreak of the rebellion he was appointed, on 9th May, 1861, Major in the 2d Cavalry. In August of the same year, when M'Clellan undertook to create the Army of the Potomac, he was commissioned Brigadier-General, and took charge of a brigade. He was subsequently transferred to the cavalry arm of the service, and when the Army of the Potomac undertook the Peninsular Campaign he was appointed to the chief command of all its cavalry. His services during that campaign were conspicuous, and raised him high in public esteem. We believe that he went nearer to Richmond than any other man in the army. In the campaign in Maryland, and that under Burnside, he commanded a corps, giving continued satisfaction to his President and the people. He has just performed a feat which casts all the famous raids of the rebel Stuart into the shade. He has ridden round Lee's army, destroying their communications with Richmond, and some of his men have actually been within two miles of the rebel capital. The importance of this achievement will be discovered hereafter. Meanwhile it has raised Stoneman so high in public estimation that he has been mentioned for the supreme command of the Army of the Potomac.

WHY IMMIGRATION INCREASES.

EVERY vessel which the east wind brings into port from Europe arrives freighted with human beings. Ships and steamers come up the bay in dark black with human freight, and bulwarks lined with human faces, eagerly gazing at the shores of the promised land. As they pass the busy ferry-boats plying to and fro, the exultation of immigrants in all their arrival in this country bursts forth in loud cheers and huzzas. Yet these people come, for the most part, from a country whose rulers have pronounced the United States to be mob-ridden, bankrupt, and moribund, and whose leading journals declare us on a race of savages, rushing toward ruin and perdition. They come in the face of taxes nearly as heavy for the time as those of Great Britain itself, and in spite of a Conscription Act as sweeping as that of Russia. They come with the perfect knowledge that we are engaged in a fearful, deadly war—a war with our own fellow-countrymen, and that they may be compelled very soon after their arrival to take part in the struggle as private soldiers.

The fact is eminently suggestive. It is clear that the first cause of the large increase of immigration this year is the high rate of wages paid to all classes of workmen. At the present time, in this meridian, mechanics command their own terms, and common laborers receive as large pay as skilled mechanics did formerly. Labor has increased in value more than any other article; and hence, notwithstanding the advance in the price of all articles of consumption, the operative class are saving more money at present than they ever did before. This is the principal secret of the large influx of immigrants from Europe.

But another cause, which, though its operation is less obvious and less direct than the one which we have described, is none the less powerful, is the general consciousness throughout Europe, and especially throughout Great Britain, that the contest in which we are engaged is not merely a struggle between secession and Union, or between slavery and freedom, but is really the final decisive contest between free popular government on the one side, and government by an oligarchy or a monarch on the other. It is well understood by the democratic leaders in England—and they have so thoroughly explained the fact to the masses that no intelligent workman can remain ignorant—that our war is being waged to determine whether or no a democratic republican government can maintain itself against domestic insurrection. Half a century since the absolutists, and all the haters of liberty throughout the world, pointed to France as conclusive evidence that republicanism could be stable, and predicted that a foreign war would be fatal to the United States. Two foreign wars have occurred since then, and each rather strengthened than weakened our country. Baffled on this point, the partisans of oligarchy and monarchy retreated, but did not succumb. Wait, they said, till domestic anarchy shall arise and civil war break out in the United States, and then you will see how utterly incapable a republican government is to maintain itself, and how impossible it is for a great nation to preserve peace, law, and order without such stable institutions as a king or an aristocracy.

The event required has occurred. Civil dissensions have arisen, and war has actually broken out. For two years the partisans of privilege and the monarchists throughout Europe have fancied their visions were being realized. Because we did not crush the rebellion in sixty days, and because some of the people of our own race, kith, and kin, showed fight gallantly, and bore in patience sufferings unexampled in history, while we proceeded with our work steadily but slowly, they fancied that the cause of freedom, and these maligners of human capacity for self-government, have filled the world with their croakings, that the days of the republican form of government in the United States.

But they not only failed to dismay us—they have not even convinced their own people. In the humble village of Paisley, Glasgow, Rochester, Leeds, Paisley, Glasgow, Rouen, and Lyons; among the peasantry of Ireland and Germany; in every assembly of intelligent working-people in Europe, the lying taunts of the aristocracy and their organs are appreciated at their true value, and the great fact is generally understood that we—the people of the United States—are in reality fighting the battle of the working-man throughout the world—the great battle of human rights and progress against aristocracy and privilege. Hence, in no small degree, the vast flocks of men from Ireland, England, and Germany who are now in search of a home in spite of war-taxes and conscription.

It is the inscrutable policy of Heaven, it should be decreed that we be baffled in our purpose of restoring the Union, the cause of human liberty will suffer a blow of unexampled severity. A government of the people, South land and the United States are the only nations in which "a man's a man for a' that." Great Britain is ruled by a landed aristocracy; France, Austria, Russia, Turkey, China, and Brazil by despotic emperors; Spain and Italy by a combination between the aristocracy and the middle classes. Nowhere save here and in Switzerland does a man enjoy full rights of citizenship simply on the ground that he is "fashioned in the image of God." If the Government of the United States maintains itself and suppresses the present rebellion, the haters of liberty will be at once silenced, and the world's human capacity for self-government will be solved satisfactorily and conclusively, and no artifice of the emperors or kings or noblemen of Europe will avail to resist the progress of the idea of self-government like ours. Out of our success in 1776–'83 grew the French Revolution which convulsed Europe for a quarter of a century; and now, a fresh—possibly a peaceful—revolution will begin, which will not end until the last remnants and relics of the feudal institutions, and manhood universally recognized as the only real title to full citizenship.

If, on the contrary, we are defeated, and the slave power on the South succeeds in establishing a separate national existence, based upon human slavery and military power, the cause of the world's progress will be seriously and perhaps thrust back perhaps for several generations. If, with our advantages, our wealth, our resources, and our intelligence, we can not maintain a Government against domestic traitors, the oligarchs of Europe will well say that republics are impracticable, and human self-government a delusive dream. Wise men, even liberal wise men in every country, will not unreasonably accept the fact, and make their policy square to it, by avoiding our example. In every country in the world the suffrage will be restricted, the privileged class strengthened, popular rights reduced, the burdens of the poor man increased, and his opportunities diminished. We shall have brought self-government and humanity itself into merited contempt.

It is, in part, to avert this dire calamity that the working-men of Europe are coming here in such vast numbers.

THE LOUNGER.

ANOTHER INTERCEPTED LETTER.

AMONG the intercepted letters of the day, the following is not without interest. It is a confidential communication from Baron Munchausen to George Palmanazar:

MY DEAR GEORGE,—I am in great luck. I find myself among a people who are not only willing, but anxious to believe the wildest stories I can invent. I have only to praise the most ludicrous and obvious fiction, and preface it in the newspapers with—"it is said," or "it is reported," or "there is a rumor," or "a special dispatch from Washington states," or "we have it upon the best authority," or "we have information from a perfectly reliable source," or "there is no doubt that," or "private advices have been received," or "it is perfectly well understood"—and this delightful people rubs its hands and goes to bed contented.

During the disastrous seven days' fighting upon the Peninsular last year I greatly comforted the public by "private," and "perfectly reliable," and "unquestionable," and "beyond all doubt," intelligence from a gentleman in Baltimore, that General Buell had arrived there with some fifty thousand men. The day after the battle of Antietam, the incredible day of total inaction which stole success from the victory of this Government, I consoled them again by "private," and "perfectly authentic," and etc., etc., accounts from Washington, that General Sigel, with thirty thousand men, was marching in the rear and three of the Potomac to cut off Lee's retreat. And just now, when Hooker was hard pressed, I launched the same old story that Pleasonton was reinforcing him with thirty thousand men, to my unspeakable amusement and to the entire comfort of the most accommodating people I ever knew.

Last summer, to try what depths of gullibility there might be in the miserable folk, I described the disastrous seven days' fighting and retreat upon the Virginia peninsula was a masterly change of front, by which, finally, was the most complete and complete story I had ever achieved, up to that time. My dear George, you will not believe me when I say that it was gravely accepted for some time, and that the Secretary of State actually wrote it in his dispatches to his foreign agents. But I was lately clever better things, and I am sure of your pride in my performances. General Hooker lately made a change of base, unfortunately. After five days hard fighting and exposure and risk of communication, he fell back and occupied the old ditches, and it was actually a happy event for the rebels, for it was the repulse of the army they most feared. What do you think I did? With sublime audacity I told you will apparently announced that the rebel army were greatly demoralized by their—signal success! And this people swallowed it whole! And they believed it lasted good! And I loved them so for it that the next day I told them the Stars and Stripes were in Fayetteville, North Carolina! And they believed it! And I am going to announce that Provost Marshal-General Patrick has been captured by a small balloon, has then reascended, having attached to his car the rebel state house containing Jeff Davis and his Cabinet, and, from a lofty height, has then dropped the whole concern into Chesapeake Bay. And, to crown the whole, I am going to say that the navy yard at Philadelphia. And this wonderful people will publish extras about it; and placard it on bulletins; and print it in enormous capitals with every variety of comment and details; and we shall have letters from vessels in the bay saying that the rocking from the waves made by the great splash was perfectly perceptible; and the evening editions will have special dispatches informing us upon what part of the city Mayor Fox or Provost Lowe has already descended upon Charleston to the same way, and has effectually blocked the harbor by dumping the rebel city into it. My dear George, if I do not continue to beat the Devil's tattoo upon the back of this patient people, it will be only because there are no newspapers left, or because my name is not MUNCHAUSEN.

A VERY SIMPLE PLAN.

For all this meandering confusion mentioned in Munchausen's letter there is a very simple, obvious, and efficacious remedy. Let the Government announce, as they precisely what official news of important movements it has received, and what are only rumors, reports, and rhetoric. During the late movements, if it had stated every morning and evening the exact substance of official reports received, it would have or, in the absence of news, if it had announced that there was none, the public mind would have been much calmer and more satisfied. So, again, on the subsequent Saturday morning, when the story of the capture of Richmond was told, if the Government had exercised the same judicious reticence, and withheld all the truly important intelligence it had received, its silence would have completely disposed of the matter, and in the absence of Governmental confirmation the papers would have refrained from publishing what they knew believed to be true.

Because correspondents and purveyors of news continue to call choke apples peaches, in hope of improving the fruit, there is any reason that the Government should hesitate to tell us the truth? To be unsuccessful is bad enough; but to be unsuccessful and hummugged too is intolerable.

A WORD TO THE SOLDIERS.

WE assure every soldier into whose hands this paper may come, that the assertion made in one of the New York daily papers during the fearful battles upon the Rappahannock, that the people here were much more interested in a prize-fight of bullies somewhere in Maryland or Pennsylvania than in the success of the Virginia army or the fate of the country, is the foulest falsehood that was ever uttered. If they read carefully the same sheet in which it appeared they will see another statement that the true way to make peace is to compromise with the rebels.

Let every soldier understand clearly the effect if not the object of such statements. In the first place, they inspire confidence in the rebels by insinuating that loyal men have lost all interest in the war, and now willing to make any terms; in the second place, they tend to persuade the army that it is abandoned by the sympathy of its fellow-citizens; and in the third place, they convey to Europe the impression that the cause of the Government is hopeless.

The truth is, that there was never a more general and profound and intelligent interest than in the late movements upon the Rappahannock. The very paper which denied it refuted its own assertion by being mainly devoted to describing the scenes in the Maryland home circle, the wealth in the Free States, except in Mozart Hall and the hearts of its supporters, there were the sincerest hopes, the most ardent prayers, for the success of the good cause and for the welfare of the good men who were defending it—followed by the most absorbing and painful anxiety, and sense of disappointment, which was not childish and crushing, at other times. But the sober and manly, of men who, if disappointed, are not dismayed, and if repulsed, are neither disgraced nor disheartened.

THE PRECISE POINT.

THE point in the debate upon the building and fitting of pirates in England which is constantly made by the Solicitor-General, Lord Palmerston, and all Englishmen unfriendly to this country here and elsewhere is this: that the law of England forbids such proceedings; that any friendly power may complain and ask to have the law enforced; and that the law must be enforced by the British authorities as every other law is, namely upon sufficient information supported by sufficient evidence.

Very well. We suppose then that this Government complains that ships are constantly built, manned, fitted, in English ports and sail from them to destroy our commerce. We suppose that the information and evidence laid before the British authorities are technically insufficient, and that they consequently decline to act. What follows?

It follows that the law of England, enforced according to what the Solicitor-General calls "the established rules of jurisprudence" in that country, is powerless to protect. By his own showing, therefore—since he and Lord Palmerston both say that no new law and no new method of enforcement are to be expected—they must submit to the sweeping of our commerce from the ocean or take the remedy into our own hands.

The British Government, by the Solicitor-General and Lord Palmerston, says, "We are doing all that we can do, and he is a poor Englishman who, like Mr. Sheridan, says we are not doing more." Our reply is, "All that you can do, then, does not meet our complaint." Great Britain shrugs her shoulders and exclaims: "That's none of our business."

No candid Englishman will deny that British built and equipped ships are preying upon the commerce of a friendly power. He will hardly deny that the British Government has been also friendly—when it found that its laws as they stand did not offer sufficient redress, it would, upon fair representation of the facts, alter the laws to secure such redress. If it declined to alter them, after such representation, would it not be with the clearest consciousness that it compelled the friendly power either to submit to intolerable injury or to protect itself in the way that constituted most surely and speedily to stop such ravages?

Is not the very object of the British neutral laws the protection of the rights of belligerents with whom she is friendly? But if, as no man with the Alabama, Japan, Florida, and the rest, before his eyes, will deny, these laws fail of their object, why should British ministers say so tartly that not a comma of the law shall be changed? Do they plead the enforcement of an indifferent law as a reason why we should submit to commercial ruin? If they suffer the law to remain inefficient it can be only because they are willing to see that result; and then, England has ceased to be a friendly power, and has no reason to complain if we treat her as an enemy.

CALLING NAMES.

THAT the controlling public sentiment of England is not averse to hostilities with us is tolerably clear. The ministerial organs and the country wishes under our circumstances to avoid a war, if it be honorably possible, is equally evident. It is undeniable that we used all our force for the work in hand.

At such a juncture recrimination and taunting are childish. Great Britain, indeed, is no friend of ours in any sense. It is true that in many ways we are dependent for her certain great elements of civilization. But we do it with the same haughty mutual jealousy with which differing sects in the same church regard each other. Yet if England is not our friend, neither have we been here. Under the political leadership of those who are now threatening our Government, the country has been enough within the present generation taken a position which justly drew upon us the odium of the world. The Ostend Conference, for instance, was the most infamous political phenomenon in its intention since the partition of Poland. The Democratic ministers met in the dominion of a friendly power to plot the dismemberment of a third, to which at the time one of the ministers was secretaried, and the country hastened to elect as its chief magistrate the one of the three conspirators who was first in position and least in capacity. We officially furnished Europe the right to sneer at us as a nation of buccaneers.

Of course all such men as these conspirators are now rebels or sympathizers with rebellion; and it was partly national shame at the position into which they forced us by a long course of browbeating diplomacy which threw them out of power. It is true that they, the inveterate enemies of England in this country, are now supported by the sympathy of the commercial and aristocratic interest of England in their effort to ruin us. And why not? What more dangerous enemy can England have than a vast government which such men have controlled, and, so far as England knows, may control again? She has no sympathy with the rebels as such. She supports their cause only because their success is the ruin of a huge rival power.

It is short, therefore, in the last extreme to abandy epithets. England is, and except when her kings were pusillanimous tools of France, always has been, a cold, haughty, selfish power. But have we in our national capacity been so conspicuously disinterested, consistent, and unselfish as to challenge comparison? Let us leave taunting aside, and if war there must be, let us be sure that England is wrong in the cause of war. Until her insolence infringes our rights her insolence is permissible. It is our duty to confine ourselves exclusively to the maintenance of our rights, and to vindicate them at such times and in such ways as shall seem wisest. Whether we or England have been the greatest national swash-bucklers may be a question. But there can be no question that for England under a plea of neutrality to destroy our commerce is an invasion of our rights; and for us to prevent her supplying our enemies under the same plea if not an invasion of British rights. So long as we claim to be a living sovereign power we can not tolerate either of these things. But surely we shall use our common sense in deciding how our rights may most wisely be maintained.

BELLIGERENT NEUTRALITY.

The question of belligerent rights is one upon which neutrals and belligerents never have agreed, and never will agree. The public mind of England rages over the seizure of a ship suspected of carrying contraband, as if some outrage had been inflicted upon its rights. And yet when the seizure of the Peterhof is in strict consonance with the letter and spirit of the British dispatch, which declares that every reasonable suspicion of guilt may be detained. To determine what is, abstractly, "reasonable suspicion," is, of course, a hopeless task. But by the necessity of the case the belligerent naval officer is created the judge. The matter is left to his discretion. If the suspicion which he considers to be reasonable turns out to be baseless and he arrests an innocent ship, it is one of the vexatious but unavoidable chances of a neutral commerce in time of war. It is a case which requires, and should receive, the promptest acknowledgment, payment, and reparation from the belligerent government. If the suspicion of such an officer is incessant and incessantly causeless, his Government must, in good faith, will soon learn him from a station for which his want of sagacity unfits him. But if his Government persists in keeping him upon a service in which he ceaselessly harasses an innocent neutral commerce, his Government clearly intends to invite difficulty with the neutral.

On the other hand, if a neutral power takes the risk, for whose risk satisfy it, of transporting contraband with a belligerent, it will happen that every ship sailing under that particular neutral flag in certain regions is, by the general conduct of the neutral, exposed to suspicion. Nor can it justly plead the frequency of detention under a suspicion which is itself awakened. It is inconceivable that the sentiment of the trading class in England is friendly to our rights. It is equally well known that almost every runner of the blockade sails under the English flag. It is no secret that foreign supplies reach the rebels through Mexico and Texas. Under these circumstances a trader under the British flag, in that direction, is obviously more liable to suspicion than a vessel under the Swedish or Italian flags. It is by no fault of ours that she is strictly watched. It is no fault of ours if, in many cases, the suspicion of a naval officer watching her should often become "reasonable"—so often, indeed, as to be exasperating to the trading interest which desires a virtual immunity. If the neutral were indeed neutral frequent detention would be a rare occurrence. But a nation systematically dealing in contraband should not wince at the inevitable consequences. To play at the same time for the privileges of a neutral and a belligerent is a hazardous game. It certainly is not manly in him who attempts to carry water upon both shoulders to complain that he is in danger of getting wet.

It is well upon that Admiral Wilkes has stopped the Peterhof, or any other naval officer upon any vessel, from pure wantonness or simple desire of annoyance, and that he may be summarily dealt with. But no man in his senses will claim that such a motive has been in the least established in any detention or seizure yet made.

LIBERTY AND PRIVILEGE.

In a late discourse upon Edmund Burke, Mr. Richard Grant was alluded to the passage in that great speech on Conciliation with America, in which he says that, wherever there is slavery, "those who are free are by far the most proud and jealous of their freedom." The passage occurs in that part of the oration which is devoted to the consideration of the probable obstinacy of resistance upon the part of the colonies, and it is introduced by the remark that the spirit of religious freedom in the Northern colonies will make them fight, and although this disposition may be checked in the Southern by the prevalence of the Church of England, yet slavery will restore the balance, because wherever there is slavery those who are free are particularly proud of liberty, and may be expected to fight for it desperately. The liberty of which he is speaking is political, not personal, liberty.

This was one of the splendid generalizations and impressive prophecies in which great statesmen sometimes indulge, and which are so often brought to shame by experience. If Mr. O'Gorman did not fell his hearers of the melancholy and utter failure of the expectation of his great countryman's, we prefer to believe that, as a foreigner, he was ignorant of our history, than that, as an exile for the same political liberty, he was pandering to the meanest of all enterprises, a rebellion to perpetuate slavery.

The experience to which Burke prospectively appealed to sustain his assertion laughed his sophism to scorn. He uttered it in 1775, he dismissed his statement from going to war by showing how fiercely slaveholders would fight for liberty. Four years afterward, in 1779, a Committee of the Continental Congress, appointed to take into consideration the circumstances of the Southern States, reported that the State of South Carolina "is unable to make any effectual efforts with militia, by reason of the great proportion of citizens necessary to remain at home to prevent insurrection among the negroes, and to prevent the desertion of them to the enemy; that the state of the country affords great natural security against subduing them, expose the inhabitants to great danger from the multitude of the enemy to excite them to revolt or desert."

As a matter of fact this slaveholding section, which, according to Burke, was the very "proud and jealous of freedom" as to be formidable to the British arms, was the nest of Toryism in the Revolutionary War. The census of 1790 gives South Carolina had a population of 1,954,354; the Northern, 1,968,455. Of Continental troops the Southern colonies furnished 6,417, the Northern, 17,926. Of militia the Southern colonies furnished 12,719; the Northern, 46,068. These last are the figures authenticated by the War Office. By the "conjectural" returns the Southern colonies furnished two militia to one from the Northern. Burke's was also a conjectural estimate.

That the Southerners fight well no one denies, but they fight well because they are not slaveholders in an assertion which is simply silly. Slavery being a system of barbarism, all who are subjected to its influences have a certain rude resemblance to all semi-civilizations, and always attended with fear. But that is not "a high and haughty spirit of liberty," nor jealousy, nor love of freedom. When Burke spoke the Turks and Asiatics were slaveholders, and at once ferocious and cowardly; but Burke would not have inferred that they were braver or had a prouder love of liberty than the British people. The people will always fight hard to defend itself. But it is a degradation of language to dignify attachment to privilege as a high love of liberty. Privilege is the opposite of liberty, and therefore the party of liberty in the long-run always conquers that of privileges.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

MARRIED.

On the 19th inst., by the Rev. Dr. Calculation, Mr. Timothy Scrooge to Miss Patience Penny. No Cards; no Fee; no Entertainment.

This is surely common sense—
To get a wife without expense.
Then all you can from that time save,
To keep said wife you'll find no slave.

Please publish the above without charge, with the compliments of the groom.

An Irishman went into a public house one day, and asked for a mug of beer in a great hurry, stating that he was on a visit to his friend who was dying for a drink. The landlord told him if he would drink it at one draught, without taking an instant to breathe, he should have it and have it for nothing. "Agrah!" said Pat; "and, be the holy Saint Patrick, I'll do that same." The landlord then drew off a gallon of ale, and slyly slipping a red herring into the measure, handed it to Pat. Pat then raised it to his mouth and drank away until the measure had been completely emptied, whereupon, the publican's eyes followed its motion in astonishment, and, looking it in, he exclaimed, "Bedad, I'll be cursed if the divil's got that any thing going down with the beer when you drank it?" "Divil a bit," said Pat, "I kilt him in the first gulp."

BETTER THAN A DOZEN.—CHARLEY OR GEORGE III. was said to have been, there was evidently a method in his madness at times. A sailor, who had formerly served in his royal family, he used the expression, "I believe your Grace has more than a dozen." "Not more than a dozen, sir," replied his "only eleven." "Well," rejoined the King, "is not that better than a dozen?"

Widow Grizzle's husband lately died of cholera. In the midst of the most acute bodily pain, after the hand of death had touched him, he was heard muttering, in a low gentle wife said to him, "Will, Mr. Grizzle, you needn't talk round so, and wear all the sheets out, if you are dying!"

We like fine writing when it is properly applied: so we are delighted to find Shakespeare describing the sun's setting, upon both legs and wings when the Arabian courser bounds in her rear, and the winged lightning leap from the horizon when the thunder-bolt are loosed—so does a little boy describe the sun's setting.

At a Sunday-school the other afternoon, a bright-looking little fellow was asked: "What is conscience?" He answered: "Conscience is a man that lives in Jerusalem." "What is a moulter?" "Oh, one of the iron-dads!"

"Well, how do you like the looks of the varmint?" said a gentleman to a boy who was gazing at a fine young colt with round-eyed wonder, and evidently for the first time, at a large object. "I don't know whether it's a goat without a beard or the Mississippi. "Weal," replied the Yankee, "he ain't a goat, he's only call a Jumbo critter, but he's got a great deal of openness when he smiles!"

A university doctor desiring to see a bird-catcher exercise his amusement requested him to the field. As soon as he saw the birds he hallooed in Latin, "There they are!" The bird-catch looked at him with surprise, indignant at the absurdity of the professor, told him of his error in a few words. The doctor, still determined to doctor, in great astonishment, "who would have imagined that those little birds would have understood Latin?"

An old gouty gentleman, having lost a pair of capacious shoes, said that the worst wish he had was, that the shoes might fit again.

"How dreadful that cigar smells!" exclaimed a clerk to his companion. "Oh no; it's not the cigar that smells," was the reply. "What is it, then?" "Why, it's your nose that smells, of course."

When is a man thinner than a lath?—When he is shaving.

A QUESTION FOR CLASSICAL SCHOLARS.—Were the sacred fowls of the ancient Romans ever used for lay purposes?

All the women of the villages on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico are in the habit of swimming. The young ladies are all diving belles.

CONSUMPTION.—In a thin shoes make one cold, two colds an attack of bronchitis, two attacks of bronchitis one malaise, and—

The discovery has been made that without a mouth a man can neither eat, drink, talk, kiss the girls, nor chew tobacco.

When is a lobster like a mortar?—When it eats its shell.

There are two kinds of cats—one with nine lives, the other with only one. The former always fall upon their own feet, the latter upon others' backs.

When is a soldier like a baby?—When he is in arrear.

Rank and fashion may be all very fine in times of peace, but rank and file must have precedence of them in time of war.

"Come here, my dear; I want to ask you all about your sister. Now tell me truly, how do you spell her name?" "No, it's the janders she's got, the doctor says."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

The operations of the Army of the Potomac on the south side of the Rappahannock are fully chronicled on page 321. General Hooker recovered his army safely on 6th and 7th inst., and, at last accounts, had crossed the old camps. Some divisions are reported to have crossed the night again; but of this we have no reliable information.

DEATH OF STONEWALL JACKSON.

General "Stonewall" Jackson was badly wounded in the arm at the battle of Chancellorsville, and had his arm amputated. The operation did not succeed, and gangrene setting in, he died on Sunday, 10th inst., at Guinea, Virginia.

The losses in the battles appear to have been about ten thousand on each side.

GENERAL HOOKER'S ORDER TO HIS ARMY.

The following order has been issued by General Hooker:

GENERAL ORDERS—NO. 49.
HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
April 6, 1863.

The Major-General Commanding tenders to this army his congratulations, and his acknowledgments for the last seven days.

If it has not accomplished all that was expected the reasons are well known to the army.

It has fulfilled all that was in a character not to be foreseen or prevented by human sagacity or resources.

It is without blame. It has met the bulk of the enemy back before delivering a general battle to our advantage. Its army has given to the country and to the confidence it itself and its fidelity to the principles it represents.

In fighting it was its knowledge we would have been recreant to our trust, to ourselves, our cause, and our country. Fredericksburg, the battle subsequently to the last seven days.

It will also be the guardian of its own history and its own honor.

By our celerity and secrecy of movement our advanced had passed the Rappahannock unopposed, and on our withdrawal not a rebel returned to follow.

The army has but to be itself to be proud with pride the hearts of every officer and soldier of this army.

We have destroyed the enemy's bridges at Bank's Ford. We have made long marches, crossed rivers, surprised the enemy in his intrenchments, and driven him. We have fought we have inflicted heavier blows than we have received.

We have taken from the enemy five thousand prisoners and fifteen stands of colors, and have captured nine pieces of artillery, and placed hors de combat eighteen thousand of his choicest troops. We have destroyed his depots filled with vast amounts of stores, damaged his communications, and have made reconnoissances deep into the rear of his capital, and filled his country with fear and consternation.

The enemy has been beaten in his own chosen field by the best of our brave companions, and in this we are consoled by the conviction that they have not fought as well cause ever submitted to the arbitrament of battle.

By command of MAJOR-GENERAL HOOKER.
S. WILLIAMS, Assistant Adjutant-General.

GENERAL BURNSIDE'S ORDER.

The following address has been issued by General Burnside to his army on leaving it:

GENERAL ORDERS—NO. 39.
HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI,
Camp Burnside, January 7, 1863.

With heart-felt gratitude the General Commanding expresses to the army his sense of the heroic conduct displayed by officers and men in the recent operations in which they have just been engaged.

Exposed to the inclemency of the wind and storm you attacked the enemy, strongly intrenched in the depths of a tangled wilderness, and drove him from a line of breastworks, fifteen miles distant, and, by the valor that has triumphed in so many battles, you have added one more to wreath around the Sapphanock.

To you this glorious victory entitles you to the praises and gratitude of the nation, we are especially called upon to express our profound thanks and give glory of victory for the signal deliverance He has wrought.

It is, therefore, earnestly recommended that the troops unite on Sunday next in assisting to the Lord of Hosts in the temples dedicated to His name.

Let us not forget in our rejoicing the brave soldiers who have fallen in defense of their country; while we mourn their loss let us receive to emulate their noble example.

The army and the country alike lament the absence for a time of one who has been so long with the army and so much indebted for success.

The following letter from the President of the Confederate States is communicated to the army as an expression of his appreciation of its services:

"I have received your dispatch, and reverently unite with you in giving praise to God for the success in which He has crowned our arms.

"To you, and the gallant people I offer my cordial thanks to yourself and the troops under your command for the signal victory you have achieved, and for the great results which your army has achieved.

"The valuable supplies derived by this happy result will be mingled with a general regret for the good and brave who are wounded among the killed and the wounded."

R. E. LEE, General.

STONEMAN'S RAID.

The success of General Stoneman's expedition is admitted by the rebels themselves. His forces were divided into three columns, and commanded by himself, and by the others by Generals Averill and Buford. All performed their work gallantly by cutting the railroad communications between Lee's army and Richmond, and destroying all the bridges within five miles of the rebel capital. One party of the cavalry went to Louisa Court House, cutting up the railroad there. Another pushed on to Islandora and Goochland, on the James River, breaking the canal and railroad, and destroying rebel stores and property to the amount of a million of dollars. Another party got within a mile and a quarter of Richmond.

The information which Kilpatrick's command received King says, in his official notice of his arrival at Gloucester Point: "They found the rebels in a state of consternation, destroyed three large trains of provisions in the rear of Lee's army, drove in the rebel pickets to within two miles of Richmond, and have lost only one lieutenant and thirty men, having captured and paroled upward of three hundred prisoners. They have marched nearly two hundred miles since the 24 of May. They were inside of the fortifications of Richmond on the 4th, burned all the stores at Aylett's Station on the Mattapony on the 5th, destroyed all the ferries over the Pamunky and Mattapony, and a large depot of commissary stores near and above the Pamunkatown, and came in here in good condition."

AFFAIRS ON THE PENINSULA.

Our army on the Peninsula is not idle. All the bridges to the vicinity of White House have been destroyed. West Point is now in possession of our troops. General Keyes, writing to the Secretary, reported that Colonels Fitzpatrick and Davis had destroyed the Chesterfield line with 700 cavalry without losing a man.

GENERAL BURNSIDE'S RAID.

It is rumored that General Burbeck's light cavalry have gone as far as the Allegheny Ridge, in Virginia, and cut the Richmond and Tennessee Railroad in several places, destroying, at the same time, large quantities of rebel stores intended for the Army of the Potomac.

CAPTURE OF FORT GIBSON,

General Grant has captured Port Gibson and taken five hundred prisoners. He drove the enemy, eleven thousand strong, from the place after a hard contest. The loss was only fifteen hundred in killed and wounded. The enemy returned to-day Vicksburg, discovering the heavy guns the two forks of the Bayou Pierre. These were rebuilt, and the pontoon was constructed. The General-in-Chief telegraphs; and he also reports a brilliant feat of Colonel Grierson with his cavalry in Northern Mississippi, from whence he progressed rapidly southward, destroying bridges, railroads, locomotives, and stores of all kinds, and was at last accounts supposed to be on his way to Baton Rouge.

AND OF GRAND GULF.

"The official report of Admiral Porter, recording his great success in the capture of Grand Gulf, Mississippi, was received at the Navy Department last week, and created much excitement in Washington. The possession of this point places the formidable rebel strong-holds at Vicksburg and Port Hudson in the rear. Admiral Porter says that he now holds the door to Vicksburg. The fight lasted five hours, and the fleet was struck by shot and shell to pieces by the fire of our vessels, but all the guns captured by our troops were in working condition. The rebel Grand Gulf were the most formidable ones the rebels possessed in the vicinity of Vicksburg. Admiral Porter is now commanding the guns. Many of the rebels who fled from Grand Gulf were captured in the pursuing forces.

GENERAL GRANT'S OPERATIONS.

A dispatch from Grant to Halleck says that, according to the Memphis Bulletin, Jackson is already invested, and that the rebel force on the way of getting out of it, but by cutting their way through the national forces. A dispatch from Memphis, dated Saturday, May 9, 1863, says that the Union troops were required the day previous to abandon Jackson, on the Big Black, after four hours' severe fighting.

AN UNSUCCESSFUL CAVALRY RAID.

General Grierson's cavalry sends an account of his bloodless raid of our cavalry raid in Georgia. He describes the consternation among the citizens, whose only able bodied manhood from point to point, resulting in the capture of Colonel Forrest's command by the Union men near Rome. General Bragg claims one thousand six hundred prisoners, which is a gross exaggeration.

A NEW REGIME IN NEW ORLEANS.

General Banks has been issuing some important general orders. Lieutenant Colonel Irwin is dealt all with out to the enemy; another orders the registered enemies of the United States to proceed to leave the State designated by the 10th of May, and another forbids sheriffs and other to execute civil writs for the rebel army, in pursuance of the action of the Louisiana Legislature.

THE CONSCRIPTION ACT.

The President has issued a proclamation preliminary to the enforcement of the Conscription Act—defining the position and duties of deputy marshals, under that law. Persons of foreign birth who have ... lared their intention to become citizens, may, by this proclamation, pronounced liable to be drafted, if after the expiration of sixty days from the date they shall not have filed such intention within the territory of the United States.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

DEBATES ON AMERICAN AFFAIRS.

On April 23d the Marquis of Clanricarde, in the House of Lords, called the subject of the detention of British merchant steamers while in the Mississippi trade, and interrupted against the proceedings of Admiral Wilkes. In the course of his remarks he also alluded to the fact that Minister Adams had granted a passport to a steamer carrying arms and munitions to the Mexican, and character. Lord Lyons had remonstrated on the matter, but received no answer. After remarks by other members, Earl Granville, on behalf of the Government, disclaimed any disposition to question the formation, and the subject was dropped. In the House of Commons, Mr. Roebuck, on the 24th, moved for the same copies, and delivered himself of a strong philippic against the Government of the United States. Lord Palmerston gave assurances that the Government was giving due consideration to the matter, and that it had been already consulted in the House of Lords as to day, when the Earl of Clarendon read the proceedings of the American Government as monstrous. The case of the Alexandra was also under discussion. Mr. Gregory, interrogated on behalf of her brokers, that she was not designed for the rebels. Lord Palmerston defended the policy of his Government, and other members denounced the absurd trade in contraband.

MINISTER ADAMS'S EXPLANATION.

It is stated in the London Star that Mr. Adams, the United States Minister, has made a "frank explanation" respecting the "ticket of leave" system in the Mexican troops, and that no diplomatic protest on the part of England is necessary in consequence.

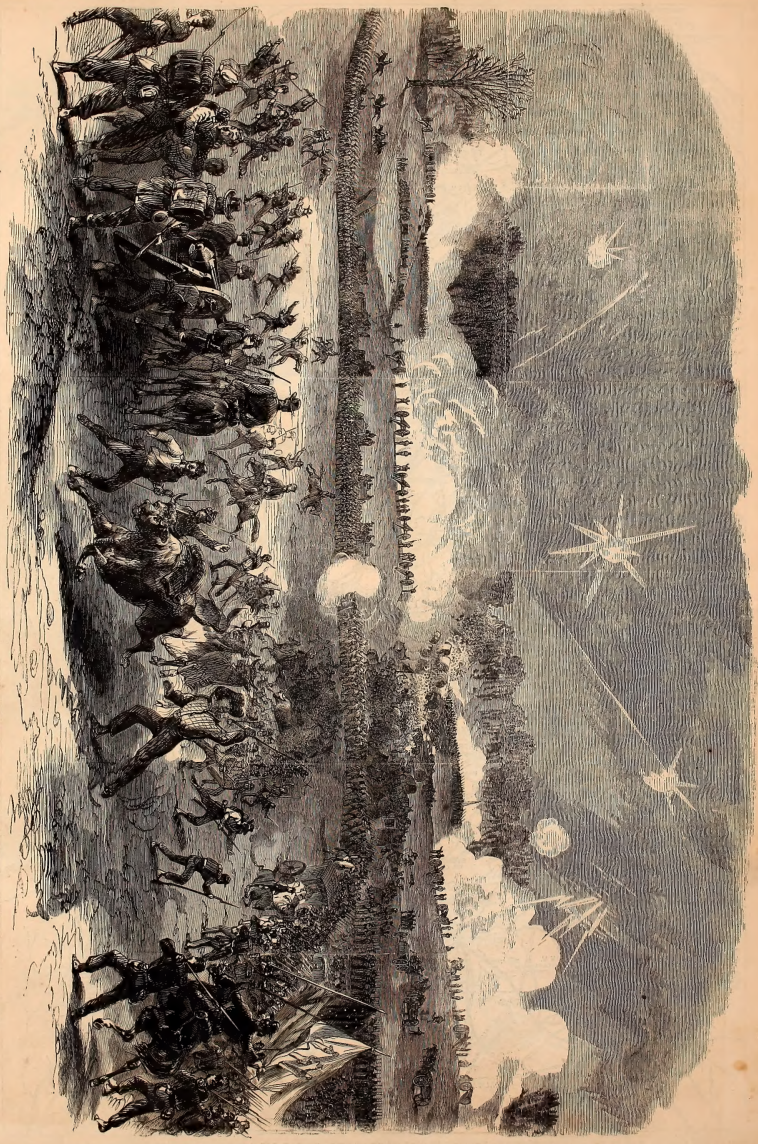
THE EMIGRATION QUESTION.

Earl Russell had called Mr. Adams's attention to the fact, that it had been reported to the Government in London that Union agents were recruiting for the Federal army in Great Britain. Mr. Adams expressed surprise and warmth on the subject. The large number of able-bodied young men who had left Ireland this season otherwise was attributed by the Earl in support of the charge. Mr. Adams denied that United States agents had been employed, and quickly suggested that the "alleged distress" existing in Ireland might account for the emigration to the Transatlantic.

POLAND.

THE INSURRECTION.

Affairs in Poland remain unchanged. Russia has received her proposals for settling the Polish question and declined the intervention. A Russian courier has arrived in London, bearing, it is supposed, Mr. Lucas's reply to Earl Russell's dispatch on Polish affairs.



MEXICO.

THE SIEGE OF PUEBLA.

The latest news from Mexico is to the 16th ult., by way of San Francisco, reporting the condition of affairs at Puebla to the 15th ult., at which time the French had gained nothing since the 6th. At that time they had built a block in the city and the Castle of San Javier. They were fortifying themselves in the streets of the city, which had failed to capture. General Comonfort still held the road between Puebla and the City of Mexico, and General Forey is confident that he can maintain Puebla against all the assaults of the French.

VERY HARD CASH.

By CHARLES READE, Esq.,

"THOU OF "IT IS NEVER TOO LATE TO MEND," ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.

"Where have you been, Julia?"

"Only as far as the park," she faltered.

"Who was your companion home?"

"Oh, don't be angry with me! It was Alfred."

"Alfred! His Christian name! You try my patience too hard."

"Forgive me! I was not to blame this time, indeed! indeed! You frighten me. What will become of me? What have I done to be looked at so?"

Mrs. Dodd groaned. "Was that young coquette I watched from my window the child I have reared? No face on earth is to be trusted after this? What have you done' indeed? Only risked your own mother's esteem, and nearly broken her heart." And with these words her own courage began to give way, and she sank into a chair with a deep sigh.

At this Julia screamed, and threw herself on her knees beside her, and cried, "Kill me! oh, pray kill me! but don't drive me to despair with such cruel words and looks!" and fell to sobbing so wildly that Mrs. Dodd altered her tone with almost indecent rapidity.

"There, do not terrify me with your impetuosity, after grieving me so. Be calm, child; let me see whether I can not remedy your sad imprudence; and, that I may, pray tell me the whole truth. How did this come about?"

In reply to this question, which she somewhat mistook, Julia sobbed out, "He met me coming out of the school, and asked to s-see me home. I said 'No, thank you,' because I th-thought of your warning. 'Oh yes!' said he, and would walk with me, and keep saying he loved me. So, to stop him, I said, 'M-m-much ob-bliged, but I was b-busy and had no time to flirt.' 'Now that is the n-in-clination,' said he. 'That is not what others say of you,' said I. You know I could not, ma, mamma. So at last he said d-did ever he ask any lady to be his wife. 'I suppose not,' said I, 'or you would be p-p-private property by now instead of p-public.'"

"Now there was a foolish speech; as much as to say indirectly I resist him."

"W-wasn't it? And n-no more they could. You have no idea how he makes love; he is very unlike the rest. I keep advancing and never retreats, nor even st-ops. But I ask you to be my wit-ness, Mrs. Dodd, my witness, please. Why did I tremble? I don't know. I made myself cold and haughty, 'I should make no reply to such impudent questions; say that to mamma, if you dare!' I said."

Mrs. Dodd bit her lip, and said, "Was there ever such simplicity?"

"Simple! Why, that was my cunning. You are the only creature he is afraid of; so I thought to stop his mouth with you. But instead of that my lord said, calmly, 'That was understood; he loved me too well to treat me from that to whom he was indebted for me. Oh, he has always an answer ready. And then makes him such a pe-pe-pet."

"It was an answer that did him credit."

"Dear mamma! now did it not? Then at parting he said he would come to-morrow, and ask you for my hand; but I must intercede with you first, or you would be sure to say 'No.' So I declined that indirectly: 'w-w-what was it to me?' I said. He begged and prayed me, 'Was it likely you would give him such a treasure as Mr. Smith? Was he a friend?' (For he h-he-res Thing turns humble now and then.) And oh, mamma, I begged him implore me to trip and kept saying no man ever loved as he loved me, and with his begging and praying me so passionately, I got passionately. I felt something warm drop from his poor eyes on my hand. Oh! oh! oh! oh! What could I do? And then, you know, I wanted to get away from him. So I am afraid I did just say 'Yes,' but only in a whisper. Mamma! my own, good, kind, dear mamma, have pity on him and on me!!! We love one another so."

A shower of tender tears gushed out in support of this appeal; and in a moment she was caught up with Love's mighty arms, and her head laid on the widow's yearning bosom. No word was needed to reconcile these two.

After a long silence, Mrs. Dodd said this would be a most severe ordeal to judge her child from a distance again, or unheard. "And therefore," said she, "let me hear from your own lips how we stand on an attachment and spring up? Why it is scarcely a month since you were first introduced at this hall."

"Mamma," murmured Julia, b-ur-ying her head, "you are mistaken. We saw each other before."

Mrs. Dodd looked all astonishment.

"Now I will make a clean breast of it," said Julia, impetuously addressing some invisible spectacle. "I tell you I am sick of having secrets from my own mother." And with this out it all came.

She told the story of her heart better than I have. And, woman-like, dwelt on the depths of loyalty and delicate love she had read in Alfred's moonlit face that night at Henley. She said no eloquence could have touched her like it. "Mamma, something said to me, 'Ay, look at him well, for that is your husband; to be.'" She even tried to solve the mystery of accidental sickness. "I was disturbed by a feeling so new and so powerful," but, above all, by having a secret from you; the first; the last."

"Well, darling, then why have a secret? Why not trust me, your friend as well as your mother?"

"Ah! why, indeed? I am a puzzle to myself. I wanted you to know, and yet I could not tell you. I kept giving you hints, and hoped as you would take them, and make me speak out. But when I tried to tell you plump, something kept pull—pull—pulling me inside, and I couldn't. Mark my words! some day it will turn out that I am neither more nor less than mad!"

Mrs. Dodd slighted this ingenious solution. She said, after a moment's reflection, that the fault of this misunderstanding lay between the two. "I remember now I have had many hints. My mind must surely have gone to sleep. I was a poor simple woman when the daughter of Hardie was to be always a child. And you were very wrong to go and set a limit to your mother's love, Julia. It is unreasonable whatever." She added: "I must import a little prudence and respect for the world's opinion into this new connection; but whoever you love shall find no enemy in me."

Next day, Alfred came to know his fate. He was received with ceremonious courtesy. At first he was a good deal embarrassed, but this was no sooner observed by Julia than Mrs. Dodd with tact and gentleness. When her turn came, she said, "Your papa? Of course you have communicated with him, Mr. Dodd?"

Alfred looked a little confused, and said, "No: he left for London two days ago, as it happens."

"That is unfortunate," said Mrs. Dodd. "Your last letter to him was to be sent at once. I need hardly tell you that we shall enter no family without an invitation from its head."

Alfred answered that he was aware of that, and that he knew his father, and could answer for him.

"No doubt," said Mrs. Dodd; "but as a matter of reasonable form, I prefer he should answer for himself."

Alfred could write by this post. "It is a mere form," said he, "for my father has but one answer to his children, 'Please yourselves.' He remembers his own youth, and knows what you want? These are his two formulas."

His line delineated the character given on his father; and Mrs. Dodd, to whom the boy's character was now a grave and anxious study, saw with no common satisfaction this clear, frank, and his eyes moisten, as he dwelt on the calm, sober, unvarying affection, and reasonable indulgence, he and his sister had met with in their lives from the best of parents. Returning to the topic of topics, he proposed an engagement. "I have a ring in my pocket," said he, "and am looking down. But this Mrs. Dodd thought premature and unnecessary.

"You are a boy of age," said she, "and then you will be able to marry, if you are in the same mind." "Then," said the young woman, somewhat conceded even this. "Well," said she, "on receiving your father's consent, you can propose an engagement to Julia, and she shall use her own judgement. But until then you will not even mention such a thing to her. May I count on so much forbearance, Mr. Alfred?"

"Dear Mrs. Dodd," said Alfred, "of course you may. I should indeed be ungrateful if I could not wait a post for that. May I write to my father here?" added he, naively.

Mrs. Dodd smiled, furnished him with writing materials, and left him, with a polite excuse.

ALISON VILLA, Sept. 19.

"MY DEAR FATHER,—You are too thorough a man of the world, and too well versed in human nature, to be surprised at hearing that I, so long invulnerable, have at last formed a devouring attachment. Julia's beauty, goodness, and accomplishments I will not now enlarge upon. They are indescribable, and you will soon see them and judge for yourself. The attachment, though such in words and sentiment, is not a boy's, one in hopes, and fears, and devotion. I should have told you this before; but I was not sure that you would not treat the god of all my nights dreams. There were many obstacles. Julia's mother, a widow, and a lady of great rectitude, and nothing now is wanting to my happiness but your consent. Mrs. Dodd has received me with more than kindness, and I am sure I may say I am not in any danger of incurring her displeasure if I ask you to write to her. The mother of my love and only beloved Julia is a lady of such position, I know, I wanted to get away from him. So I am afraid I did just say 'Yes,' but only in a whisper. Mamma! my own, good, kind, dear mamma, have pity on him and on me!!! We love one another so."

A shower of tender tears gushed out in support of this appeal; and in a moment she was caught up with Love's mighty arms, and her head laid on the widow's yearning bosom. No word was needed to reconcile these two.

After a long silence, Mrs. Dodd said this would be a most severe ordeal to judge her child from a distance again, or unheard. "And therefore," said she, "let me hear from your own lips how we stand on an attachment and spring up? Why it is scarcely a month since you were first introduced at this hall."

"Mamma," murmured Julia, b-ur-ying her head, "you are mistaken. We saw each other before."

Mrs. Dodd looked all astonishment.

"Now I will make a clean breast of it," said Julia, impetuously addressing some invisible spectacle. "I tell you I am sick of having secrets from my own mother." And with this out it all came.

She told the story of her heart better than I have. And, woman-like, dwelt on the depths of loyalty and delicate love she had read in Alfred's moonlit face that night at Henley. She said no eloquence could have touched her like it. "Mamma, something said to me, 'Ay, look at him well, for that is your husband; to be.'" She even tried to solve the mystery of accidental sickness. "I was disturbed by a feeling ing it off, after her fashion. "I can't bear it: it makes me tremble. With fury."

"This will never do, sweet one," said Alfred, gravely. "You and I are to have no separate existence, now; you are to be I, and I am to be you. Please to remember."

"No; you read me so much of it as is proper for me to hear. I shall not like it so well from your lips. But never mind."

When he came to read it, he appreciated the delicate and tender, tempered her curiosity. He did not read it all to her, but nearly.

"It is a beautiful letter," said she; "a little pompous—but dictated and I write. 'The Paternal Roof!' But all that becomes you; you are a scholar: and, dear Alfred, if I should separate you from your pups, I will never estrange you from him; oh, never, never. May I go for my work? for methinks, O most erudite, the 'maternal hand,' the compliment so sweetly hath confided to her offspring the recreation of your highness?" The gay creature dropped him a courtesy and fled to tell Mrs. Dodd the substance of "the sweet letter the dear high-flown Thing had written."

By then he had folded and addressed it; she returned and brought her work; cifarity children's gave chicks to her mother had cut them, and in the height of the fashion, to Jane Hardie's dismay—and Julia was trimming, hemming, contriving.

How demurely she bent her lovely head over her charitable work, while Alfred poured his tale into her ear! How careful she was not to speak, when there was a chance of his speaking! How often she said one thing so as to express in opposite, a sense which she might have taken out a patent! How she and Alfred compared looks, sentiments, and their feelings at each stage of their passion. Their hearts put forth tendril after tendril, and so curled, and clung round each other!

In the afternoon of the second blissful day, Julia suddenly remembered that this was duly to her mother's ear such a thought was to fly to her; and she flew so swiftly that she caught Mrs. Dodd in tears, and trying adroitly and vainly to dash them away.

"What is the matter? I am a wretch. I have left you alone."

"No dear child, no so peevish, love! you have but surprised the natural regrets of a mother at the loss of her daughter."

"Oh, mamma," said Julia, warmly, "and do you think all the marriage in the world can ever divide you from me? You make me lukewarm in my own sweet, darling, beautiful, blessed, angel, mother? Look at me, I am as much your Julia, as ever; and I will be Julia I live. In a new who is a son only till he gets him a wife: but your daughter's your daughter ALL THE DAYS OF HER LIFE."

Divine power of native eloquence; with this trite diction, you made hexameters tame; it pushed from the throbbing heart with a sweet infantine ardor, that even virtue can only pour in when young and pure, when virtuous; and, as the words I have emphasized by the poor device of capitals, two lovely, supple arms were miraculously suddenly seen to be sporting shadowy wings, and then went all round the sad mother, and gathered every bit of her up to the generous young bosom.

"I know it, I know it," cried Mrs. Dodd, kissing her; "I shall never lose my daughter, while she loves me as she does. I am losing my child. You are turning to a woman, visibly. And you were such a happy child. Hence my misgivings, and those sudden fits which you have cheered with a word; see!" And she contrived to smile. "And now, my own child, he may be impatient. Men love is so fiery."

The next day Mr. Dodd took Julia apart and told her that there was an answer from Mr. Hardie. Julia replied, from Alfred, that Jane had received a letter last night, and, to judge by her manner, Mr. Hardie must have left London before Alfred's letter got there. "He is gone to see poor Uncle Thomas."

"Why do you say 'poor?'"

"Oh, he is not very clever. Has not much mind, Alfred says, indeed, hardly any."

"You shall see, Julia!" cried Mrs. Dodd, "what' madness in the family you propose to marry into!"

"Oh no, mamma," said Julia, in a great hurry; "no madness; only a little imbecility."

"Well, imbecility, at this, Julia's answer, but just then her mind was more drawn to another topic. A serious doubt passed through her, whether if Mr. Hardie did not write soon, she ought not to limit his son's attendance on her daughter. "He follows her about like a little dog," said she, half fretfully.

Next day, by previous invitation, Dr. Sampson made his call. He was announced as coming from London he found Alfred sitting very close to Julia over a book.

"London!" said she, "Here's my puppy," and 'm' enthusiast, check by chowl." Julia turned scarlet, and Alfred ejaculated so loudly that Sampson inquired what on earth was the matter now?

"Oh, nothing; only here have I been jealous of my own shadow, and pestering her who 'owns puppy' was; and she never would tell me. All I could get was," added he, turning sharply and gently from gratitude to revenge, "was—that he was no greater a puppy than yourself, doctor."

"I could get no more," added he, turning sharply and gently from gratitude to revenge, "was—that he was no greater a puppy than yourself, doctor."

"All vain people are flat," suggested Alfred, dryly.

"Why should no better than you, young Oxford? Y' have got a hidache."

"No indeed."

"Don't tell lies now. Ye can't deceive me; mam, I've an eye like a hawk. And what's that y'ere studing with her? Ovid, for a pound."

"No, medicine; a treatise on your favorite organ, the brain; by one Dr. Wharley."

"He is chaffing you, doctor," said Edward, "it is logic. He is coaching her; and then he will coach me."

"Then I forbid the chaff-cutting, young Pindar. Logic is an ill plaster to a sore head."

"Oh, but we delight in it, physics pain."

"Jimpun, Jimpun;
Take me a wee cuckoo," retorted the master of Joggrel. "And that is a profounder remark than you seem to think by your grinning, all of ye."

Julia with some question by putting away the book. And she murmured to Alfred, "I wish I could steal your poor dear headaches: you might give me half of them at least; you would, too, if you really loved me."

This sound sense and nonsense escaped criticism by being nearly inaudible, and by Mrs. Dodd entering at the same moment.

After the first greetings, Sampson asked her with merry arrogance how his perscription had worked? "Is her sleep broker still, ma'am? are her spirits up and down? Shall we have to go back t' old Short and his black draught? How's her makin mention?" An her biliary ducks, ar—ahe's off like a flash."

"And no wonder," said Mrs. Dodd, reproachfully.

This subject was dropped, and Sampson liked a game of cards. He could play, yet talk chromatics, as the fine folks call the habits' shoes and imbibe the pottasters of the day.

Mrs. Dodd had asked Edward to bring a fresh pack. He went to his pastdrin and forgot to take them out of his pocket and undo them; presently Julia saw him with a pack clinched hold of them; and found a slip of paper curled round the ace of spades, with this written very clear in pencil:

REMEMBER THY CREATOR IN THE DAYS OF THY YOUTH.

"What is this?" cried Sampson, and read it out aloud. Jane Hardie colored, and so betrayed herself. Her "sweet is seasoned" had strayed. It was the young and comely Edward she wished to save from the diabolical literature, the painted pictures, and put the unconverting old sinner Sampson. He proceeded to justify her preference by remarking that "remember was to tremp your partner's best card, ladies," would be more to the point.

Jane Hardie, even in hardened personage, was thoroughly uncomfortable. As for Alfred, his face betrayed a degree of youthful mortification little short of agony. Mrs. Dodd was profoundly disgusted, but, fortunately for the Hardies, caught sight of his burning cheeks and compressed lips. "Dr. Sampson," said she, with cold dignity, "you will, I am sure, oblige me by making no more comments. Sincerity is not always decency; but it is always reprehensible: it is one of your own titles to esteem. I dare say," added she, with a little sweetness, "your exercises are not so narrow that we need shock any body's prejudices, and, as it happens, I was just going to ask Alfred to sing: open the piano, and try if you can persuade Miss Hardie to join you in a duet."

At this Jane and Julia had an earnest conversation at the piano, and their words uttered in a low voice were covered by a contemporaneous discussion between Sampson and Mrs. Dodd.

Jane. No, you must not ask me. I have forsworn them vanities. Ever since I opened my piano this two years.

Julia. Oh, what a pity! music is so delightful. And surely we can choose our songs, as Alfred has, which, oh, how much more delightful!

Jane. Are you fond of music? I am told music wicked: but I am not sure. At least I found it so. My self-denial was misplaced; and that stirred up vanity: and then I began to sing, with which I had even more reason to repent. Beasts' manna!

Julia. Dear me! I don't find them so. Now you mention it, there is rather a grave one, but dear me, I never think of that. Oh, when they have been sing-ing very ever so long a time. The little unmeaning words are so pretty, and they catch anything so great as Handel.

Jane. I pray daily not to be led into complacency, which I go into it of my own accord.

Julia. Not if you find it a temptation. I suppose I ought to decline?

Jane. Indeed I would.

My conscience is not a nice one. Besides ——— mamma said "sing" and a parent is not to be disobeyed upon a doubt. If Papa were to insist on my going to a ball even, or reading a novel, I think I should sleep; and by the whole code before him.

Mrs. Dodd (from a distance). Come here, my dears. Doctor Sampson is getting so impatient for your song.

Sampson. Hom! for all that, young ladies' singing is a poor substitute for the and even for conversation.

Mrs. Dodd. That depends upon the singer, I presume.

Sampson. Mel—dame, they all sing alike! just as they all talk alike. I can hardly tell one fothergill from another; and nobody can tell one from another. Besides, when they cut out all the consonants. Fa—la—la. This is what I heard sung by a lady once at Rome.

Ee ee Da'el s aa an oo.
By oo ceeeres aa
Ee ee Da'el Vaullee,
Vaullee,
Vaullee! h igh ceaa
An ellin la il ol.

Mrs. Dodd. That sounds like gibberish.

Sampson. It is gibberish; but it's Dryden's talk, notwithstanding mouths. It is

He sung Darius great and good
By too severe a fate
Fallen, fallen, fallen, fallen
Fallen from his high estate
And weltering in his blood.

Mrs. Dodd. I think you exaggerate. I will answer for Julia that she will speak as distinctly to music as you do in conversation.

Sampson (All unconvinced). Of the legs. Time will show. Mamma! A patient—ly term is a wide word, ma'am. Does some spork of silly linger in their mettle bosms? or do they prefer mamma's or papa's linguistic mewin?

Julia, thus pressed, sang one of those songs that come and go every season. She spoke the words clearly, and with such variety and intelligence, that Sampson recanted, and broke in upon the—"very pretty"—"how sweet"—and "who is it by?" of the others, by shouting, "Very weak trash very cleanly sung. Now give us something worth the wear and tear of your orgins. Immortal vairse widded t' immortal sounds; that is what I understand b' a song."

Alfred whispered, "No, no, dearest, sing something suitable to you and me."

"Out of the question. Then go farther away, dear; I shall have more courage."

He obeyed, and she turned over two or three music books; and finally sang from memory. She cultivated musical memory, having observed the contempt with which men of sense visit the sorry pretenders to music who are tuneless and songless among the nightingales, and any where else away from their books. How will they manage to sing in heaven? Answer me that!

The song Julia Dodd sang on this happy occasion, to meet the humble but heterogeneous views of Messrs. Sampson and Hardie, was a simple eloquent Irish song called Aileen aroon. Whose history, by-the-by, was a curious one. Early in this century it occurred to somebody to hymn a son of George the Third for his double merit in having been born, and going to a ball. People who thus apply the fine arts in modern days are seldom artists; accordingly this parasite could not invent a melody; so he coolly stole Aileen aroon, soiled it by inserting sordid and incongruous jerks into the refrain, and called the stolen and adulterated article Robin Adair. An artisan of the same kidney was soon found to write words down to the degraded ditty: and, so strong is Flunkyism, and so weak is Criticism in these islands, that the polluted tune actually superseded the clean melody, and this sort of thing, "Who was in uniform at the ball? Silly Billy!" smothered the immortal lines.

But Mrs. Dodd's severe taste in music rejected those ignoble jerks, and her enthusiastic daughter having the option to hymn immortal Constancy, or mortal Fact, decided thus:

When like the early rose
    Aileen aroon,
Beauty in childhood glows,
    Aileen aroon,
When like a diadem,
Buds blush around the stem,
Which is the fairest gem?
    Aileen aroon.

Is it the laughing eye?
    Aileen aroon,
Is it the timid sigh?
    Aileen aroon,
Is it the tender tone,
Soft as the stringed harp's moan?
No; it is Truth alone,
    Aileen aroon.

I know a valley fair,
    Aileen aroon,
I know a cottage there,
    Aileen aroon.
Far in that valley's shade,
I know a gentle maid,
Flower of the hazel glade,
    Aileen aroon.

Who in the song so sweet?
    Aileen aroon.
Who in the dance so fleet?
    Aileen aroon
Dear are her charms to me,
Dearer her laughter free,
Dearest her constancy,
    Aileen aroon.

Youth must with time decay,
    Aileen aroon,
Beauty must fade away,
    Aileen aroon.
Castles are sacked in war,
Chieftains are scattered far,
Truth is a fixed star,
    Aileen aroon.

The way the earnest singer sang these lines is beyond the conception of ordinary singers, public or private. Here one of nature's orators spoke poetry to music with an eloquence as fervid and delicate as ever rung in the forum. She gave each verse with the same just variety, as if she had been reciting, and when she came to the last, where the thought rises abruptly, and is truly noble, she sang it with the sudden pathos, the weight, and the swelling majesty, of a truthful soul hymning truth with all its powers.

All the hearers, even Sampson, were thrilled, astonished, spell-bound: so can one wave of immortal music and immortal verse (alas! how seldom they meet!) heave the inner man when genius interprets. Judge, then, what it was to Alfred, to whom, with these great words and thrilling tones of her rich, swelling, ringing voice, the darling of his own heart vowed constancy, while her inspired face beamed on him like an angel's.

Even Mrs. Dodd, though acquainted with the song, and with her daughter's rare powers, gazed at her now with some surprise, as well as admiration, and kept a note Sarah had brought her, open, but unread, in her hand, unable to take her eyes from the inspired songstress. However, just before the song ended, she did just glance down, and saw it was signed Richard Hardie. On this her eye devoured it; and in one moment she saw that the writer declined, politely but peremptorily, the proposed alliance between his son and her daughter.

The mother looked up from this paper at that living radiance and incarnate melody in a sort of stupor: it seemed hardly possible to her that a provincial banker could refuse an alliance with a creature so peerless as that. But so it was; and despite her habitual self-government, Mrs. Dodd's white hand clenched the note till her nails dented it; and she reddened to the brow with anger and mortification.

Julia, whom she had trained never to monopolize attention in society, now left the piano in spite of remonstrance, and soon noticed her mother's face; for from red it had become paler than usual. "Are you unwell, dear?" said she, sotto voce.

"No, love."

"Is there any thing the matter, then?"

"Hush! We have guests: our first duty is to them." With this Mrs. Dodd rose, and, endeavoring not to look at her daughter at all, went round and drew each of her guests out in turn. It was the very heroism of courtesy; for their presence was torture to her. At last, to her infinite relief, they went, and she was left alone with her children. She sent the servants to bed, saying she would undress Miss Dodd: and accompanied her to her room. There the first thing she did was to lock the door; and the next was to turn round and look at her full.

"I always thought you the most lovable child I ever saw; but I never admired you as I have to-night; my noble, my beautiful daughter, who would grace the highest family in England!" With this Mrs. Dodd began to choke, and kissed Julia eagerly with the tears in her eyes, and drew her with tender defiance to her bosom.

"My own mamma," said Julia, softly, "what has happened?"

"My darling," said Mrs. Dodd, trembling a little, "have you pride? have you spirit?"

"I think I have."

"I hope so: for you will need them both. Read that!" And she offered Mr. Hardie's letter with averted head.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

WE devote the bulk of our space this week to illustrations of the recent campaign of the Army of the Potomac. On page 324 we give the CAPTURE OF THE HEIGHTS OF FREDERICKSBURG by General Sedgwick—a drawing by Thomas Nast. The following, from the Times correspondence, describes the transaction:

It was now eleven o'clock; continuous fighting had been going on for full six hours, and the rebels still held their works. General Sedgwick now determined on having the "Light Brigade" charge the heights. Colonel Burnham, commanding, moved his forces along under the protection of abandoned earth-works, and the hill-side formed by the sloping down of the plain near the city, until he had arrived directly in front of the most formidable position, known as the "Slaughter Pen." Knapsacks and any article of clothing which might impede their rapid movement were cast aside by the men, and they were deployed out in the following order: one half of the Fifth Wisconsin, Colonel Allen, as skirmish line; Thirty-first New York, Colonel Jones, on the left; Sixth Maine, Lieutenant-Colonel Harris commanding, and the remaining portion of the Fifth, in the rear of and supporting the Thirty-first at the same time. At the same time a force consisting of the Forty-third New York and Sixty-first Pennsylvania, and one or two other regiments, were sent up the road at the right of the stone-wall. Going on to the regiments of the Light Brigade, prepared for a charge, were the Thirty-sixth New York and Seventh Massachusetts, and still further on other regiments. At twenty minutes past eleven the lion-hearted men rose from their feet. Every one of the thousand spectators on the hills in the rear held their breath in terrible suspense, expecting to see them all the next moment prostrate in the dust. "Forward!" cried the General, and they dashed forward on the open plain, when instantly there was poured upon them a most terrific discharge of grape and canister. Many lay dead, but not one faltered. Full 400 yards must be passed over before gaining the stone-wall. As they press forward, delivering the battle-cheer, which is heard above the roar of artillery, the rebel guns further to the left are turned upon them. But they falter not. A moment more they have reached the stone-wall, scaled its sides, are clambering the green bank of the bluff, and precisely as the city clock struck they rush over the embrasure of the rebel guns, and the Heights are ours. The enemy, with the exception of the cannoniers, fled in wild confusion, secreting themselves in the houses, woods, and wherever a place of concealment was afforded. The guns captured proved to be the Washington Artillery, the battery so highly complimented by General Lee in his report of the last battle of Fredericksburg, and which has figured more or less since the outbreak of the rebellion. "What men are these?" was the interrogatory of one of the astonished and terrified members, as our brave boys appeared over the ramparts. "We are Yankees, —— —— you; do you think we will fight now?" was the response from one of our men. "Boys," remarked the commander of the battery, "you have captured the best battery in the Confederate service." The Sixth Maine were the first regiment to reach the scene. Lieutenant-Colonel Harris, with unparalleled bravery, rushed right up to the mouth of one as it was belching away, and through the mist and smoke his form could just be discerned as he cheered his men forward. He, together with Captain Furlong, were the first to lay hold of the rebel pieces.

On pages 328 and 329 we illustrate the FIGHT AT CHANCELLORSVILLE, on May 1, from a sketch by Mr. A. R. Waud. This affair is thus described in the Herald correspondence:

About two o'clock on Friday afternoon the enemy were discovered advancing in force down both the old turnpike and the plank road, thus approaching our position nearly from the east. Although these two roads enter Chancellorsville at right angles—one from the east direct, and the other from the south—they join and make a single road near Tabernacle Church. When the discovery was made of the approach of the enemy, General Hooker immediately returned to his head-quarters at Chancellorsville and made his dispositions to meet them. It was yet uncertain whether the attack would come from the east or south, and it was therefore necessary to be in readiness at both points. With this purpose the Fifth Corps, Major-General Meade, was formed on the front facing the east, Sykes's division of regulars occupying a line north of the old turnpike road, and the other two divisions taking the line of the Banks Ford road, on the left of Sykes. The Second Corps, Major-General Couch, was held in reserve to support the right wing of this line, and the Second Division, Major-General Berry, of the Third Corps, Major-General Sickles, to support the left.

On our south front two corps—the Eleventh, Major-General Howard, and the Twelfth, Major-General Slocum—were deployed, the latter in double line of battle, with its left resting on the plank road, and the former on the right of the Twelfth. The two remaining divisions of Sickles's corps—the First, Brigadier-General Birney, and the Third, Brigadier-General Whipple—were ordered up as supports for this line.

Sykes's division was formed in the open field, directly on the slope southeast of and scarcely a quarter of a mile distant from General Hooker's head-quarters. Immediately behind them, on the extreme elevation of the plain, three batteries of field artillery were planted. General Sykes's skirmishers advanced down the field and into the woods, where they waited the approach of the enemy. Soon the brisk cracking of rifles and muskets announced the rebel proximity, and our skirmishers, in compliance with orders, gradually fell back upon the main line of battle. This manœuvre drew the enemy outside of the woods, from which they emerged close after our retreating skirmishers, yelling and shouting like a tribe of wild Indians. The sight was both exciting and amusing at first, and all movement on our part was momentarily suspended, while our brave men gratified their curiosity in scrutinizing their gray-backed adversaries. But the charge of the rebels was not a trifling matter, and as column upon column of them, and line after line came dashing out of the woods, it seemed as though that one little division stationed there to check them would be swallowed up. It was one of those skillful manœuvres for which General Lee is particularly distinguished—the hurling of an immense body upon a small force of his antagonist. The rebel force, as it charged out of the woods, was certainly three times as large as that of General Sykes; yet the latter showed no disposition to quail; but, after giving a moment's glance to satisfy their curiosity, every soldier brought his musket to his shoulder, and five thousand bullets were sent into the rebel line. Such steadiness appalled them. They were unprepared for it. Their front rank quailed before it. The sudden thinning of their numbers amazed and frightened them. They discharged their pieces recklessly and broke in confusion. But there was no flight for them. The heavy bodies behind them, to whom the front rank had been a bulwark, protecting them from the murderous volley of the Union Regulars, were steady and determined. They absorbed the front rank in the second, and still moved forward—firm, unshaken, confident. Meantime our men had reloaded their pieces, and simultaneously a volley was fired from both sides, and then from the brow above our artillery opened with canister and grape, throwing over the heads of our own men and dealing destruction and confusion to the enemy. And as the loud cannon continued its work with fearful rapidity the order was given to our men to "fire at will"—an order that was copied by the enemy—and the continuous roar of musketry that followed almost deadened the reports of the artillery. It was the first fight of the great battle, and for nearly twenty minutes both parties stood firm, as though nothing should lead them to give the prestige of a first success to the other. But, although outnumbered, we had an advantage in the support of artillery, which, while our infantry held the rebels in check, made huge gaps in their ranks. Still they yelled and shouted defiance, and attempted charges and continued their firing, rank after rank of them being broken and thrown back in confusion, while their officers shouted, and ordered and stormed, and cursed, in the vain effort to rally them to a persistent, determined charge. They fought well. They fought as none but Americans dare fight. But with musketry alone they could not contend against both artillery and musketry. It was simply murder on the part of their officers to attempt to hold them to it, and their officers began to appreciate the fact when nearly half their column had been placed hors de combat; and then the order was given to retire.

And then came our turn to shout. The rebels were retreating. Our force was sadly thinned and broken; but there were enough left to send up a shout after the retreating rebels that made the woods ring with the echo. Even the wounded joined in the glad cheer, many of them staggering into an upright position and throwing up their hats in their excess of gladness at the victory. The charge had been right gallantly met, and the host of the enemy finely repulsed. It was the first achievement of the great struggle—an augury of success in the end. Our men had stood like veterans, and they had a right to cheer.

THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE BATTLE ON SATURDAY, 2D, also from a sketch by Mr. Waud, is illustrated on the same pages. Of this we take the following description from the Times correspondence:

In the morning, as we stood on the balcony of Chancellor's house, the attention was aroused by a sharp rattle of musketry coming from a column of rebels coming up by the main Fredericksburg plank road, directly in front of us. Knapp's Battery, however, which was planted directly in front of the position, opened upon them, and after a few rounds caused them to retire.

Immediately afterward a battery opened from the height which I have mentioned as having been gained by Sykes yesterday, and then abandoned by us. The position was rather upward of a mile distant from the cleared space, and its object was to damage our ammunition train which was visible to the rebels from the tops of trees on the height. One of our batteries was, however, immediately opened in reply. The third shot blew up one of the caissons and a subsequent shot blew up another, and this settled their account.

Subsequently a reconnoissance was sent, on our part, consisting of the Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteers (Carr's brigade, Berry's division, Sickles's corps), on the same road by which the rebels had approached in the morning, for the purpose of feeling their strength. They went out on the plank road, deployed on both sides in the form of a letter V, chased the rebel skirmishers a couple of miles, till they came to a heavy double line of battle, with artillery in position, when they retired, bringing us that piece of intelligence.

Another reconnoissance was next sent out on our right, consisting of Berdan's sharp-shooters. They met the enemy's pickets, drove them handsomely, and at 4 o'clock returned with fifty prisoners of the Twenty-third Georgia.

At 4 the rebels are moving down in force on the plank road, where we had a little before made the reconnoissance. Geary's division of Slocum's corps is sent in on the double-quick into the woods—their bayonets flashing in the sunlight. A sharp contest ensues, and in a few minutes they come back in disorder. A portion of Kane's brigade, composed of raw troops, had broken and thrown the column into confusion.

An aid from Slocum comes to ask General Hooker if he can have reinforcements. "No! he must hold his own. Howard will, of course, support him from the right. Let Geary's division, however, be thrown to the right of the road, so that the artillery may be able to sweep the enemy on the left." This treatment presently repaired the damage, and checked the hope of the rebels being able to pierce our centre.

Finally, on page 325 we illustrate the terrible PANIC WHICH OVERTOOK THE ELEVENTH CORPS on the afternoon of the same day. This also is from a sketch by Mr. Waud. The following graphic account of the affair is from the Herald letter:

The Eleventh corps had been ordered to advance on the right of Birney, and moved forward to take the position assigned to them on Birney's flank. One brigade succeeded in getting up the hill, and reported, by its commander (whose name I have unfortunately lost), to Generals Sickles and Birney. The rest of the corps met the enemy in force when about two-thirds of the distance up. Here they had a short engagement, in which it does not appear that they had even so large a force to contend against as that which Williams, with his single division, had fought so bravely. Headed by their commander, the gallant Howard, the German corps charged boldly up to the rebel lines. Here they were met, as the rebels always meet their foe, with shouts of defiance and derision, a determined front, and a heavy fire of musketry. The German regiments returned the fire for a short time with spirit, manifesting a disposition to fight valiantly. But at the time when all encouragement to the men was needed that could be given, then some officer of the division (one, at least, as I am informed) fell back to the rear, leaving his men to fight alone. At the same time General Devens, commanding the First division, was unhorsed and badly wounded in his foot by a musket-ball. Thus losing at a ciritical moment the inspiriting influence of the immediate presence of their commanders, the men began to falter, then to fall back, and finally broke in a complete route. General Howard boldly threw himself into the breach and attempted to rally the shattered columns; but his efforts were perfectly futile. The men were panic-stricken, and no power on earth could rally them in the face of the enemy. Information of the catastrophe was promptly communicated to General Sickles, who thus had a moment given him to prepare for the shock he instantly apprehended his column would suffer. The high land of the little farm that formed the base of his operations was parked full of artillery and cavalry, nearly all the artillery of the Third corps, together with Pleasanton's cavalry, being crowded into that little fifty-acre inclosure. But Sickles was not to be thrown off his guard by a trifle, and any thing short of a complete defeat seemed to be considered by him in the light of a trifle. With the coolness and skillfulness of a veteran of a hundred campaigns he set to work making his dispositions. He had not a single regiment within his reach to support his artillery; Whipple was falling back, and must meet the approaching stampede with his own force in retreat; Birney was far out in the advance, in imminent danger of being completely surrounded and annihilated; the rebel forces were pressing hard upon the flying Germans, who could only escape by rushing across his lines, with every prospect of communicating the panic to them. It was a critical moment indeed, and one that might well stagger even the bravest-hearted. But it did not stagger the citizen soldier. Calling to one after another of his staff, he sent them all off, one after the other, lest any should fail of getting through, to warn Birney of his danger, and order him to fall back. Then, turning to General Pleasanton, he directed him to take charge of the artillery, and train it all upon the woods encircling the field, and support it with his cavalry, to hold the rebels in check should they come on him, and himself dashed off to meet Whipple, then just emerging from the woods in the bottom land. He had scarcely turned his horse about when the flying Germans came dashing over the field in crowds, meeting the head of Whipple's column and stampeding through his lines, running as only men do run when convinced that sure destruction is awaiting them. At the same moment large masses of the rebel infantry came dashing through the woods on the north and west close up to the field, and opened a tremendous fire of musketry into the confused mass of men and animals. To add to the confusion and terror of the occasion night was rapidly approaching, and darkness was already beginning to obscure all things.

I must frankly confess that I have no ability to do justice to the scene that followed. It was my lot to be in the centre of that field when the panic burst upon us. May I never be a witness to another such scene! On one hand was a solid column of infantry retreating at double-quick from the face of the enemy, who were already crowding their rear; on the other was a dense mass of beings who had lost their reasoning faculties, and were flying from a thousand fancied dangers as well as from the real danger that crowded so close upon them, aggravating the fearfulness of their situation by the very precipitancy with which they were seeking to escape from it. On the hill were ten thousand of the enemy, pouring their murderous volleys in upon us, yelling and hooting, to increase the alarm and confusion; hundreds of cavalry horses, left riderless at the first discharge from the rebels, were dashing frantically about in all directions; a score of batteries of artillery were thrown into disorder, some properly manned, seeking to gain positions for effective duty, and others flying from the field; battery wagons, ambulances, horses, men, cannon, caissons, all jumbled and tumbled together in an apparently inextricable mass, and that murderous fire still pouring in upon them. To add to the terror of the occasion there was but one means of escape from the field, and that through a little narrow neck or ravine washed out by Scott's Creek. Toward this the confused mass plunged headlong. For a moment it seemed as if no power could avert the frightful calamity that threatened the entire army. That neck passed, and this panic-stricken, disordered body of men and animals permitted to pass down through the other corps of the army, our destruction was sure. But in the midst of that wildest alarm there was a cool head. That calamity was averted by the determined self-possession of Major-General Daniel E. Sickles.

Let me here finish with the Eleventh corps. They did not all fly across Sickles's line. They dispersed and ran in all directions, regardless of the order of their going. They all seemed possessed with an instinctive idea of the shortest and most direct line from the point whence they started to the United States ford, and the majority of them did not stop until they had reached the ford.

Other illustrations of the Army of the Potomac are given on pages 332 and 333. The descriptive matter referring to them will be found in the following brief description by the artist Mr. A. R. Waud:

SYKES'S ADVANCE ON OUR LEFT.

This sketch represents the brilliant advance of Sykes's division of Meade's corps. Watson's battery is partly seen hurling shells over the heads of our advancing lines at the rebel position on the top of the hill. In three lines, the gallant Second Brigade leading the attack, with that steadiness which the regiments of the regular army have always shown, they moved up the hill, the line of battle being formed across the road. The fire was to a great extent reserved till the crest of the hill was reached, and the enemy driven in confusion. In this affair the old Fifth Corps well maintained its old reputation; and after, when it was drawn back to take its place in the line of battle then forming, it repulsed with slaughter the attack which the enemy in their turn made upon them.

THE BATTLE IN FRONT OF CHANCELLOR'S HOUSE ON FRIDAY AFTERNOON.

After the attack upon Meade the enemy continued the battle by a vigorous effort to storm our position on the cross-roads at Chancellor's. This was a magnificent scene. The house occupies the right of the picture; about it the orderlies, servants, and pack-mules belonging to head-quarters were grouped—General Hooker and his staff, with Captain Starr's company of the Lancers, forming a brilliant party at the side of the house. Slocum's line of battle is seen formed in front, supporting the batteries in position about the burned chimney, which was surrounded by cherry-trees in blossom. In front are the lines of men moving up to take part in the struggle, which for a short time was very violently contested at this point.

HOWARD'S POSITION ON THE RIGHT.

Dowdall's tavern, head-quarters Eleventh Corps, is seen in the centre of this view. The rifle-pits across the field rendered this place impregnable in the hands of good soldiers. It was expected all day that the enemy would attack this wing in force, and there was plenty of time for preparation. The German troops, however, were not equal to the occasion. Some of them fought well, but the majority fled in panic without firing a shot, throwing into confusion those troops that were preparing to resist the enemy's advance. In the midst of the skedaddle a noble buck and two does left the woods and fled through the fugitives.

COUCH'S MEN FORMING ACROSS THE PLANK ROAD.

While Sickles was returning with his fine corps on the left, Couch's men on the double-quick took up position across the road to try and stem the course of the runaways and Jackson's rapid advance. The batteries, massed in front of this line, poured into the woods a savage fire over the soldiers in front, while a confused mass of pack trains, wagons, ambulances, guns, caissons, cattle, and broken troops, with all the crowd of army followers, rushed down the road in panic, the enemy pounding at their rear and capturing what they could. This part of the battle was truly terrible. The sun had set, and threatening clouds threatened rain, and some lightning added to the gloomy horror of the scene; but the Second and Third Corps stood nobly to their work, and the rebels were hurled back. They captured cattle and supplies, ammunition, etc., and spent the rest of the evening in plundering our wounded.

GENERAL COUCH'S HEAD-QUARTERS ON THE CENTRE.

On Sunday the rebels made the most determined efforts to capture this position, held by Sickles and Meade, but they had no Eleventh Corps to deal with. Savagely they were repulsed, and Jackson's celebrated column of 40,000 men was decimated and defeated.

SKETCH OF THE CENTRE.—ANOTHER VIEW.

In this picture the men of Humphrey's division are represented pouring a deadly fire upon the advancing hosts, whose intention was to capture the rifle-pits and batteries represented in the picture. About this time Humphrey made one of his celebrated charges upon the enemy, driving them with such loss that they never dared to attack in force again.

HOOKER'S HEAD-QUARTERS IN THE WOODS.

After the burning of the Chancellor house, and withdrawal of our line from that point, the General bivouacked in the woods near the front, so near that the rebel shells and even the fire of the sharp-shooters came into the camp. Captain Starr's horse was shot quite close to where the General was consulting with his officers.

OLD MILL.

This was a picturesque spot near the front, used as a hospital for Slocum's corps, and as a rendezvous of skedaddlers.

CATCHING THE DRAGON.

IT was market-day in a small out-of-the-way town on the borders of Wales. As usual, a few farmers from the country had been dining at the Lion, the single inn of any note in the town; and a little lower down in the street, two men were talking about the mysterious robberies which were taking place in the neighborhood. So frequent and unaccountable were these robberies, that there was a story among the credulous people proving Hagley Heath to be haunted by a dragon, which waylaid unlucky travelers and carried off their money, having first rendered them insensible by a scratch of his claw. The two men who were talking over the mystery were in plain clothes, but the one called the other Tipstaff, so we will follow his example.

"It's all nonsense about the dragon," said the one; "but there is something queer about the thing. Old Smith of Hagley Farm swears that when he lost that twenty pounds a thing like a bear's paw came over his shoulder."

"Bosh!" responded Tipstaff gravely—"old Smith had been looking into the pewter. I tell you, it's neither a dragon nor a bear, but I wouldn't be so certain about a lion."

"Eh?"

Tipstaff looked up the street significantly, and nodded.

"Who else would know so well how to hit upon the farmer that goes away with the heaviest pocket? Tell me that. I say it's the lion himself, and if he wasn't as cunning as an old fox, I should have caught him before now."

"You won't get any body to believe that. Why, the farmers all trust him as if he was a brother to 'em."

"The thing is to take him with the money on his person; and he is so keen! Who's in at the Lion now?"

"Nobody but Bobby Jones. Why, this beats every thing; it isn't half an hour since I heard the lion, as you call him, advising old Bobby to go to bed place in which to put his brown holland purse."

"Very likely," responded Tipstaff. "I wish some body would look about and find out how when Mr. Jones starts. The lion knows me."

"All right. I'll do it."

The two men separated; and in due time Tipstaff was informed that Bobby Jones, as he was familiarly called, had just ridden off in the cart of the Lion having been missing for a good half-hour previously. Tipstaff started off briskly in the direction of the distant heath, but his pace gradually slackened, and at last he came to a stand-still and began to think. Having made up his mind, he shook his fist at the dark heath, and left it behind him, going straight back toward the town. It was dark by the time he got to the door of the Lion, and saw that the kitchen was empty of people. Within, there was no light but the fire, which winked out an occasional gleam upon the figure of the landlord's wife, who was sitting on the settle in her bonnet and cloak nursing a baby. Tipstaff looked at her, and an old thought came into his head as he saw the bonnet and cloak. A small table hid the lower part of her dress, and the dim flicker from the fire showed little but the cloak and bonnet, and the small white form of the baby. Then he went in quietly and got close to her. "In the king's name," he said; "speak, and you die. Be still; be silent, and do as I bid you, and you may get off scot-free." The woman looked up and relinquished her first impulse of struggle; but she would not speak. Tipstaff bent down and whispered something in her ear which sounded like "What did you do with old Smith's twenty pounds?" Then, before she could utter the terrified shriek that rose on her tongue, he ran across the kitchen into a small room at the back of the house.

"Now," said he, "all you swear to be quiet and make no noise, or must I use these pretty little things?" You will? The better for you. I want the loan of your cloak, bonnet, and baby. Don't be so foolish; I wouldn't hurt the poor little morsel for the world, and I'll bring it back in half an hour. Give it here."

Tipstaff then locked at the window, which was small, and would not open. He took out his pen-knife, broke the woman and went out, locking the door after him.

In a few time after that hasty footsteps were heard outside the house, and the landlord came in, throwing a quick look round him, which started the woman's wife to the figure of his wife nursing the baby on the settle.

"Here," he said, chucking a purse into her lap; "put it away, and look sharp. Is the old fool abed? I'll be bound he is. I doubt I've given him a handful to-night."

The next moment the landlord, who was examining his muddy clothes, received a harsh tap himself, and, in his utter amazement, became aware that his wife had put down the baby and collared himself, saying in a man's voice, and one which he knew well: "In the king's name!"

The landlord cast one look at the door, but it would not do. He had nothing for it but to submit. The dragon was caught at last, and it wasn't a dragon, but a lion.

Model Story and Sketch Paper OF THE AGE.

The New York Weekly

Employs more literary talent and spends more money for contributions than any other paper of its class published. Anybody before whose notice it is fairly brought, will be glad to subscribe for it, even without any other inducement than its merit; but when, in addition, a Photographic Album is Given Away.

THE RUSH FOR IT WILL BE IMMENSE.

In order to more fully explain ourselves, we hereby lay before the public the following

LIST OF PREMIUMS

TO GETTERS UP OF CLUBS.

To anybody who will send us $5, for two subscriptions to the NEW YORK WEEKLY, we will give a splendid Photographic Album, bound in beautiful leather, and gilt edges, worth $5.

To any one sending us $7 50, for three subscriptions, we will send a splendid $4 Album.

To any one sending $10, for four subscribers, we will send a splendid Album, worth $8.

To any one sending $15, for six subscriptions, we will send the most beautiful $7 50 Album ever made.

To any one sending $20, for eight subscriptions, we will send a beautiful $10 Album.

Those entitled to premiums should be careful to mention the colors of the Album—either Brown, Black, Red, or Fancy Color.

Each Album will be sent on the day ordered.

The New York Weekly

Has been long enough before the people to satisfy them that these offers are made in good faith, and that our extravagances will be faithfully met. Our friends must be careful to whom they entrust their money for subscriptions, as we, of course, can take no risk. Persons sending us money should be particular to mention Town, County, and State.

HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS.—A HUNDRED CURATIVES IN ONE.—Not the least striking merit of HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED BITTERS is the wide scope of its operation as a tonic, alterative and medial preparation. As a protective medicine they ward off all the diseases, and their name in Lepic—that explicate in unwholesome air, impure water, exhausting heat, or other local and atmospheric influences. They are also sufficient to secure for any corrective and alterative medicine a world-wide and enduring celebrity. But HOSTETTER'S GREAT SPECIFIC has a hundred other claims to the confidence and high estimation of the public. In dyspepsia, liver complaint, chills and fever, bilious remittent fevers, cholera morbus, cramps, colic, constipation, general debility, premature decay, female irregularities, sexual disability, constitutional weakness, sea sickness, diarrhœa, dysentery, flatulency, vertigo, fainting fits, hysterics, and all complaints proceeding from imperfect digestion, and a disordered condition of the liver and bowels, HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS are the most powerful speedy, harmless, and agreeable of all remedies ever employed by the press, or administered in family practice.

All of the above list of Goods will be sold for one dollar each. Certificates, stating the various articles, and on what each one can have, are first put into envelopes, sealed up, and mixed; and when ordered, are taken out without regard to choice, and sent by mail, thus giving all an equal chance. On receipt of the Certificate, you will see what you can have, and then it is at your option to send one dollar and take the article or not.

In all transactions by mail, we shall charge for forwarding the Certificates, paying postage, and doing the business, 20 cents each, which must be inclosed when the Certificate is sent for. Five Certificates will be sent for $1; eleven for $2; thirty for $5; sixty-five for $10; and a hundred for $15.

AGENTS.—Those selling as Agents will be allowed ten cents on every Certificate ordered by them, provided their remittances amount to one dollar. Agents will collect 20 cents for every Certificate, and remit 15 cents to us, either in cash or postage stamps. Great caution should be used by our correspondents in regard to giving their correct address, Town, County, and State. Address

July 31th, 1862,

Duryea's Maizena

Was the only "preparation for food from Indian Corn" that received a medal and honorable mention from the Royal Commissioners, the compilation of all prominent manufactures of "Corn Starch" and "Corn Flour" of this and other countries notwithstanding. The food and luxury of kings, without a single fault. One trial will convince the most sceptical. Maker Puddings, Cakes, Custards, Blanc Mange, &c., without an egg, and with few or no eggs, at a cost astonishing the most economical. A child's dinner to ordinary Wheat Flour greatly improves Bread and Cake. It is also excellent for thickening sweet sauces, gravies for fish and meats, soups, &c. For Ice Cream nothing can compare with it. A little boiled in milk will produce rich Cream for coffee, chocolate, &c. Put up in 1 pound packages, under the trademark "Maizena," with directions. The most delicate article of food for children and invalids of all ages. For sale by Grocers and Druggists everywhere.

Manufactured at Glen Cove, Long Island.
Wholesale Depot, 166 Fulton Street.

Mason & Hamlin,

Manufacturers of Cabinet Organs, Harmoniums, and Melodeons, take pleasure in referring to the musical profession generally as to the superiority of the instruments, which they claim to be unsurpassed by any in the world. They have had the honor of receiving the only Gold Medal ever awarded to such instruments in this country, and though constantly exhibiting their instruments, have not, even in a single instance, failed to carry off the first prize. M. & H. respectfully invite attention to their new Cabinet Organs, which are winning golden opinions from the highest source. Among the distinguished organists who pronounce them the best instruments of their class in the world are Morgan, of Grace Church; Zundel, of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's Church; Wels, of Trinity Church; Morgan, of Dr. Poe's Church; Mosenthal, of Calvary Church; Berg, of Zion Church; William Mason, and many others. Prices of Organs, with one and two stops, $70 to $150; with six or seven stops, $265 to $350 each. Warerooms, Nos. 5 and 7 Mercer Street, New York. Address MASON BROTHERS.

HUBBARD BRO'S
IMPORTERS OF WATCHES
NEW YORK.

Have the pleasure of announcing to their numerous Friends and Patrons in the Army, that they are prepared to fill orders and transmit parcels by mail, with the utmost care and promptitude. Watches so forwarded are registered; we take upon ourselves all risks of transportation, and guarantee a safe delivery. Each parcel, by Reception steamers, several large importations of that description have arrived.

Railway Timekeepers,

WITH HEAVY STERLING SILVER CASES, SPECIALLY ADAPTED FOR ARMY SERVICE! The Army and Navy Gazette, of Philadelphia, in its Number of May 9th, reviewing this watch, says: "We are pleased to see that the importation of the firm of Hubbard Bros. is meeting the encomiums due their extraordinary enterprise and energy in richly merits. These watches are novelties produced by no other house, and are especially adapted for Army use, far exceeding other manufactures in point of accuracy and elegance. A leading point of comparison in their favor under the house a desirable medium for traders in the Army. The RAILWAY TIMEKEEPER has HEAVY SOLID STERLING SILVER CASES, beautifully white enamel dial, handsome gold hands, and is fitted with the most reliable movement, warranted to run and keep excellent time! Price per case of a half dozen, $24. Parcel, $1 00 additional for postage. Should retail readily at from $30 to $50 each. Not sold in quantities of less than six. Address

MAGIC TIME OBSERVERS

THE PERFECTION OF MECHANISM, BEING A LADY'S OR GENTLEMAN'S WATCH IN ONE, AND A HUNTING AND OPEN-FACE COMBINED, WITH PATENT SECS-SECONDS INDEPENDENT. THE N. Y. Illustrated News, in its issue of Jan. 10th, 1863, on page 27, emphatically says: "We have now shown a most pleasing novelty, of which the HUBBARDS, of New York, are the sole importers. It is called the MAGIC TIME OBSERVER, and is a Hunting and Open Face Watch combined. One of the greatest conveniences, and decidedly the best and cheapest timepiece for general use which we ever offered. It has within it and connected with its machinery, its own winding attachment, rendering a key entirely unnecessary. The cases of this Watch are composed of two metals, the outer one being like pure gold. It has the improved ruby action lever movement, and is warranted an accurate timepiece." Price, securely wrapped, per dozen, half dozen, $204. Sample Watches, in neat morocco boxes, for those purposes, by express, or wholesale, $20. If sent by mail the postage is 36 cents.

TERMS CASH, INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE IN ALL INSTANCES. Remittances may be made in United States money or drafts payable to our order. If sent by express or mail, to a registered letter at our risk. No Circulars or Agents.

Ef WE CAUTION THE PUBLIC AGAINST BUYING AS STATED CAN ONLY BE FORWARDED BY MAIL. Address

EQUAL TO ANY IN THE WORLD!!!

MAY BE PROCURED

At FROM $8 to $12 PER ACRE.

Near Markets, Schools, Railroads, Churches, and all the blessings of Civilization. 1,200,000 Acres, in Farms of 40, 80, 120, 160 Acres and upwards, in ILLINOIS, the Garden State of America.

The Illinois Central Railroad Company offer, ON LONG CREDIT, the beautiful and fertile PRAIRIE LANDS lying along the whole line of their Railroad, 700 MILES IN LENGTH, upon the most Favorable Terms, for enabling Farmers, Manufacturers, Mechanics, and Workingmen to make for themselves and their families a competency, and a HOME they can call THEIR OWN, as will appear from the following statements:

ILLINOIS

Is about equal in extent to England, with a population of 1,722,666, and a seat capable of supporting 20,000,000. No State in the Valley of the Mississippi offers so great an inducement to the Settler as the State of Illinois. There is no part of the world where all the conditions of climate and soil so admirably combine to produce those two great staples, Corn and Wheat.

CLIMATE.

Nowhere can the inducements to farmer secure such immediate results from his labor as on these deep, rich, loamy soils, cultivated with so much ease. The climate, from the extreme southern part of the State to the Terre Haute, Alton, and St. Louis Railroad, a distance of nearly 300 miles, is well adapted to Winter

WHEAT, CORN, COTTON, TOBACCO,

Peaches, Pears, Tomatoes, and every variety of fruit and vegetables is grown in great abundance, from which Chicago and other Northern markets are furnished from four to six weeks earlier than immediate vicinity. Between the Terre Haute, Alton, and St. Louis Railway and the Kankakee and Illinois Rivers a distance of 115 miles on the Branch, and 126 miles on the Main Trunk), lies the great Corn and Grass growing portion of the State.

THE ORDINARY YIELD

of Corn is from 40 to 80 bushels per acre. Cattle, Horses, Mules, Sheep, and Hogs are raised here at a small cost, and yield large profits. It is believed that the system of country presents greater inducements for Dairy Farming than the Eastern States. A branch of farming to which but little attention has been paid, and which must yield sure profitable results. Between the Mississippi and Illinois Rivers, and Chicago and Dunleith (a distance of 50 miles on the Branch and 127 miles on the Main Trunk), Timothy and Spring Wheat, Corn, &c., are produced in great abundance.

THE AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

of Illinois are greater than those of any other State. The Wheat crop of 1862 is estimated at 18,000,000 bushels, while the Corn crop yields not less than 140,000,000 bushels, besides the crop of Oats, Barley, Rye, Buckwheat, Potatoes, Sweet Potatoes, Pumpkins, Squashes, Flax, Hemp, Broom Corn, Clover, Cabbage, Onions, Tobacco, Sorghum, Grapes, Peaches, Apples, &c., which go to swell the vast aggregate of production in this fertile region. Over Four Million tons of produce were sent out the State of Illinois during the past year.

STOCK RAISING.

In Central and Southern Illinois uncommon advantages are presented for the extension of Stock raising. All kinds of Cattle, Horses, Mules, Sheep, Hogs, &c., of the first breeds, yield handsome profits; large fortunes have already been made, and the field is open for others to enjoy with the fairest prospects of like results. DAIRY FARMING also presents its inducements to many.

CULTIVATION OF COTTON.

The experiments in Cotton culture are of very great promise. Commencing in latitude 39 deg. 30 min., see Map from the Branch, and Assumption on the Main Line, the Company owns thousands of acres well adapted to the production of this fibre. A settler having a family of young children, can turn their youthful labor to a most profitable account in the patch and garden culture of this plant.

THE ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD

Traverses the whole length of the State, from the banks of the Mississippi and Lake Michigan to Cairo. As its name imports, the Railroad runs through the centre of the State, and on either side of the road along its whole length lie the lands offered for sale.
